The good intentions of the authors and advocates of Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Eleven are the only things in its favor. It is not only needless and inconsistent with the spirit of the constitution, but subject to serious abuses and questions of construction.

As our constitution stands today the parties to a mortgage or deed of trust are perfectly free to determine by a clause therein which of them shall pay the mortgage tax. No one has ever found any serious fault with this condition of affairs. It is claimed, however, that the law is now open to certain ambiguities which have existed since the repeal of section five of the constitution, which declared void any contract that required the mortgagor to pay the mortgage tax. It is also suggested by its ablest advocate that the proposed amendment will save the work involved in making separate assessment rolls showing the mortgage interests and the "bothersome element of pro-rating delinquent or unpaid mortgage taxes" in the cases of transfers of real property.

In fact, Senate Constitutional Amendment Number Eleven adds nothing to the substantial rights or privileges of either party to a mortgage or deed of trust, and deprives them of the convenient means of exercising a privilege they now possess which may be of considerable value in certain cases where it may be of special importance to one or the other party to know in advance the exact amount of his income or obligation.

It declares "that a mortgage, deed of trust, contract or other obligation by which a debt is secured when land is pledged as security for the payment thereof, together with the money represented by such debt, shall not be considered property subject to taxation." What does this mean? Why exempt the money represented by such debt, and how far is it to be followed before it becomes "property subject to taxation?" The main purpose of the amendment is to exempt the debt secured by the mortgage, etc., from taxation, but the proposed amendment fails to do this and depends upon a strained construction for its accomplishment.

The supreme court has held, notwithstanding the language of section four, which it is proposed to repeal, that a mortgage, as such, is not property subject to taxation, but that the assessment should be made of the debt which the mortgage was given to secure. What will be the effect of the repeal of section four, which, among other important provisions, contains the following: "A mortgage, deed of trust, contract or other obligation by which a debt is secured, shall, for the purposes of assessment and taxation, be deemed and treated as an interest in the property affected thereby?"

This will leave debts secured by real property upon exactly the same basis as those secured by personal property. As the supreme court has held, and the proposed amendment declares, these mortgages will not be deemed property subject to taxation, but the credits secured thereby will become taxable as solvent credits. Surely the supreme court will not strain a point to exempt debts secured in whole or part by a real property mortgage while similar debts secured by personal property mortgages remain taxable. Exemptions from taxation are never accomplished by inference or strained construction. The repeal of section four will leave all solvent credits, whether unsecured or secured by real or personal property upon the same basis—all subject to taxation. Had the proposed amendment of section one exempted the debts or credits secured by the mortgages, deeds of trust, etc., instead of the money represented thereby, the purpose of the proposed amendment would have been clear. Had section one been left unchanged and section four been changed but slightly this purpose could have been accomplished in an unobjectionable manner.

The fundamental principle upon which the whole system of taxation in California has been based is clearly expressed in the first section of the article of the constitution upon revenue and taxation. This section, which stands for the "antiquated" system of equal and universal ad valorem taxation, as against special exemptions and special taxes for designated property owners, has remained unchanged in the constitutions of California since its organization. Lest the spirit of the constitution as expressed in this section should be violated the legislature is expressly enjoined from passing any local or special laws exempting property from taxation. It is now proposed to amend section one by the insertion of a parenthetical clause which is open to interpretations and abuses not contemplated by its author or advocates and inconsistent with the principle of general and equal taxation of all property. Following is a copy of the section with the proposed amendment in black letter:

Section 1. All property in the State except as otherwise in this constitution provided, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law, or as hereinafter provided. The word "property," as used in this article and section, is hereby declared to include moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises, and all other matters and things, real, personal and mixed, capable of private ownership (provided, that a mortgage, deed of trust, contract or other obligation by which a debt is secured when land is pledged as security for the payment thereof, together with the money represented by such debt, shall not be considered property subject to taxation); and further provided, that property used for free public libraries and free museums, growing crops, property used exclusively for public schools, and such as may belong to the United States, this State, or to any county or municipal corporation within this State shall be exempt from taxation. The legislature may provide, except in the case of credits secured by mortgage or trust deed, for a deduction from credits of debts due to bona fide residents of this State.

Assuming that the proposed amendment will accomplish the purposes of its advocates, it will do more. It will enable the owner of any solvent credit, however large or however long its term, to have it exempted from taxation by taking a mortgage to secure it on a piece of property of but nominal value. The solvent credit may be the note or bond of an individual or corporation of great financial strength and the piece of property involved may be of no substantial value. Any large loan or debt or venture bond otherwise taxable as a solvent credit can be rendered non-taxable by this subterfuge. No limitations as to relative amounts or values are contained in the amendment, nor do the advocates of this amendment question the possibility of such evasions. Their answer is that solvent credits should not be taxed under any conditions. If so, why not exempt them expressly?

THE TAX-REFORM AMENDMENT

By Carl C. Plehn

Article No. 8

The first of these articles gave an outline of the amendment; the second and third discussed the evils of the present system; the fourth advanced some reasons for the separation of state from local taxation; the fifth presented the reasons why the larger corporations should be taxed by the higher authority, the state; the sixth discussed the advantages of the gross earnings tax; the seventh set forth the effects of the amendment on the taxation of real estate. This one takes up some of the so-called objections that have been raised.

In matters relating to taxation the voters are naturally inclined to be ultra conservative. Hence when the opponents of any new scheme of taxation raise objections they make a very strong appeal to the timidity of the voters. It is quite natural to think that although the frying pan may be hot, the fire is probably hotter. If the plan which is under consideration were an untried experiment we might hesitate to adopt it, no matter how strong the theoretical and practical arguments in its favor might be. But plans of tax reform based on the same principles have been worked out in other states, in many of them, and have proven so uniformly successful that we need have little fear of the results in our own case.

The objectors fall into five groups:

First, there are those whose taxes will be raised. They have no case because the amendment does not require them to pay more than is just and equitable, and they are now paying too little.

Second, there are some who favor the principle, but object to some minor feature. Among these are some who want the taxes on the corporations made even higher than is proposed. If they are sincerely in favor of the principles they should support the amendment now and work for its betterment, if it be found to need betterment, later.

Third, there are those who favor some new theory of taxation or of government, or who want to see the tax system used for some purpose other than the mere raising of the revenues for the support of government. The amendment rests on the theory of taxation that has been in vogue in this country for over two centuries and which has come to be known the world over as "the American system"; namely, that taxes should be equal in proportion to property. Theories as to an income tax, or as to the expropriation of special privileges fall outside the field of taxation for revenue purposes. Such questions as whether the taxing power should not be used to curb the growth of private fortunes, or for the control of corporate power should be set forth by themselves and not as a rider to a revenue bill.

Fourth, there are a number of politicians and office holders who fear that their emoluments of office may be unfavorably affected by the change. These have been particularly active in giving out misleading statements in regard to the reform plan.

Lastly, there are a not inconsiderable number of persons who are misinformed as to the actual provisions of the amendment and who object to things that are not there at all.

Among the current misconceptions are:

(1) That the real estate of banks, insurance companies and the non-operative property of public service corporations will be withdrawn from local taxation. The exact reverse is the case. All the real estate of banks and insurance companies will be taxed locally as now. As to the other corporations the amendment withdraws only such property as is used exclusively in the operation of their business as public service corporations.

(2) That the withdrawal of the operative property of public service corporations means a reduction in local revenues. This overlooks the fact that by saving of the state tax the taxpayers save far more than they lose by the withdrawal of the above mentioned classes of property. In other words, there will be just as much money as ever for local purposes, but the aggregate tax rate will be much lower.

(3) That it is a hardship to ask the cities and counties to protect corporate property when the taxes thereon go to the state. This overlooks the important fact that the state already does and will hereafter relieve the local governments of expenses purely local in character that run to about $7,000,000 per annum. Out of the taxes on the corporations the state will continue to take care of the schools, the prisons, the asylums, orphans and half orphans, and many other things that are of direct interest to every locality, and there will be no state tax on property in general. It makes no difference arithmetically whether the state takes one-third of the taxes on all property, or all the taxes on one-third of the property. But it does make a difference as to the possibility of equitably distributing the burden of taxation and equitably distributing the proceeds thereof, which plan be adopted.

(4) That the amendment favors the corporations either by reducing their taxes or by "fixing" them in the constitution, while other taxes are left to increase. It has already been shown in the preceding articles that the amendment will increase the aggregate taxes of each of the different classes of corporations. If here and there a corporation be found whose taxes will be reduced it is safe to assume that that corporation is now paying too much. Nor can the rates be called "fixed" when they can be changed by a two-thirds vote in the legislature. Moreover, gross earnings taxes have a way of increasing more rapidly than a property ad valorem tax can be made to increase.

(5) There is the persistent misstatement that if an ad valorem tax be necessary to make good a deficit the corporations would not be called upon to pay it. The fact is that the amendment provides just the opposite, it is share and share alike for all. With this goes the false statement that the corporations will not be called upon to pay their share of local bonded indebtedness.

(6) That the administration of the new taxes will be in the hands of the state board of equalization and that this board has always been subservient to the railroads. If that board is so subservient to the railroads, by what accident was it that they have raised the taxes of the railroads seventy-five per cent in the last three years alone? But aside from that the amendment does not make the state board of equalization the administrative board for these taxes, except for the banks. In this case all they have to do is to record the amount of the capital, a fact that is also recorded by the superintendent of banks, and is always known to all the public. Moreover, whatever board or officer is given the administration of these taxes by the legislature will have no discretionary powers to exercise. Just as in the case of the banks they will simply apply a mathematical rule.

In short, the objections, so-called, are based on vague and untenable theories, or on selfish interest, or on misstatements and misunderstandings as to the provision of the law. In the last days before the election, two years ago, the state was flooded with circulars bristling with false statistics and misstatement. Most of these circulars were anonymous, but the resulting confusion added, as it was intended to, to the vote against the reform. Probably the same tactics will be pursued this time. Let each voter read the amendment for himself.

("Exposition Building"—Concluded)

If we are willing to sacrifice a few acres of plaster shacks and some conservatism we can have a few artistic and permanent buildings, and there is no reason why all the improvements aside from the various temporary buildings could not remain to beautify and adorn the park. Many of the states and foreign countries will spend from $5,000 to $25,000 in erecting special buildings; why not contribute a part of this cost, providing permanent buildings are erected? Each state building would become a permanent exhibit of the state in question. It would be a museum, an art gallery, an industrial exhibit, a state headquarters, etc. In the same way the various foreign buildings would add greatly to the permanent exhibition, and each of these buildings would serve as a permanent industrial exposition and commercial display. The California building should contain permanent exhibits from the various counties, and should be one of the most artistic structures in the grounds.

A few objections may be urged against this proposed permanent fair city; it will require some original thought; it will reduce the acreage of lath and plaster buildings; such an amusement city will draw too many people from the downtown theatres, cafes and saloons; it will cost something to maintain the permanent features as outlined. But there will not be so much danger of fire, and while the exposition will not cover so many acres as the St. Louis exposition, it will be far more pleasing and artistic, and I am sure that the gate receipts would not be reduced by one penny if the progressive plan were carried out as indicated. The advantages to San Francisco will more than counterbalance all the disadvantages which may be urged against permanent features.

In a short article it is only possible to mention briefly some of the more important features of the proposed plan. A little thought will disclose many points of interest that can be adduced in favor of the suggestions herein made. In preparing the plans one building should be constructed so that it could be used as a permanent mammoth convention building, to be given free of charge to any national organization desiring to use it; if San Francisco is to become a convention city, a modern convention hall is necessary.

In fine, since San Francisco is to invest at least $10,000,000 in the proposed fair, why not plan to receive some lasting benefit? To spend $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 on a passing entertainment, a holiday pageant as it were, is a very serious and even questionable undertaking; many thinkers consider that such an expenditure is financially, ethically and morally a mistake; some would use the term "financial folly." But if we can save permanent and artistic improvements to the value of several million dollars from the scrap pile we can point to a new era in the history of big expositions. Paris reserved the Eiffel tower from the junk pile when the curtain fell on her big show; let us remember this and do better.

Would you like to know more about the work we are doing in the way of preparing for, and placing young men in, good positions in the great busy new San Francisco?

SAN FRANCISCO
BUSINESS COLLEGE
MARKET, POWELL
& EDDY STS. S.F.
WRITE FOR CATALOGUE

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial
(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)
526 CALIFORNIA ST., San Francisco, Cal.

Guaranteed Capital $1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash.... 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds.... 1,555,093.05
Deposits June 30th, 1910..... 40,384,727.21
Total Assets 43,108,907.82
Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co's. Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President and Manager, George Tourny; Third Vice-President, J. W. Van Bergen; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, A. H. Muller; Assistant Secretaries, G. J. O. Folte and Wm. D. Newhouse; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, George Tourny, J. W. Van Bergen, Ign. Steinhart, I. N. Walter, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Streets. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Heyer, Manager.

HONOLULU

And the Volcano

THE TRIP MOST COMPELLING and worth while, excelling all others for grandeur, beauty and pleasure. And this splendid trip can be made in two weeks and a day by sailing on S. S. SIERRA (10,000 tons displacement). The Volcano of Kilauea, the largest in the world, is tremendously active just now, and a few quick dispatch trips have been arranged. Never before has it been possible to make this desirable trip with such speed and comfort, and the price is low, $110, first class, to Honolulu and back, and $41 for side trip from Honolulu to volcano, including rail and auto to Kilauea; hotel at Hilo, also Volcano House. No other trip compares with this. Be sure to visit the islands, and DO IT NOW, while the volcano is active. S. S. SIERRA sails Oct. 22, Nov. 12, Dec. 8. Write or wire.

OCEANIC S. S. CO.
673 Market Street, San Francisco.

John O'Donnell D. E. Alexander

ALEXANDER & O'DONNELL

ATTORNEYS AT LAW

Tels.: Sunset Douglas 1538; Home J 1508
845 Pacific Bldg., Market and Fourth Sts.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

705 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD
The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed $1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital 300,000.00
Surplus 400,000.00
Profits 45,000.00

DIRECTORS—James D. Phelan, President; John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt, Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R. D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.

Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy.
Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

Entrance to the First National Bank

THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK

POST & MONTGOMERY

Checking Accounts Cordially Invited.

CAPITAL $3,000,000.00
SURPLUS and PROFITS 1,900,000.00

FIRST FEDERAL TRUST COMPANY

POST & MONTGOMERY

CAPITAL $1,500,000.00

3½% per annum on deposits.

ARMOR PLATE SAFE DEPOSIT VAULTS

JED soon conquered peace and reinstatement in the good favor of his fellows. He had only to show that he would not be imposed upon to remove the tendency to impose upon him, and, after a few strenuous days, cordial relations were restored, but during those days whoever said "Nanny" or "Sissy" to him got a fist bang in mouth or eye without preliminary declaration of war or other formality. Perhaps the teacher had been forewarned by the Elder, anyhow tales told of what Jed had done reached deaf ears and, by the end of the first week, tranquility reigned.

So wore away fall, winter and early spring, when school became tiresome and again Jed began to hunt excuses for staying out of school. He heard of an opportunity to drive a breaking team of oxen to tear up the prairie sod out in the country and he teased and teased father and mother to let him take the job. He was to have a pony to ride after the cattle in the mornings, and whenever he wanted to while not at work hawing and geeing the three-yoked team. He looked upon the offer as that of a picnic lasting all summer, and having in mind Jed's "bad summer" the year before, and thinking that there would be no mischief for him to get into out in the Sandy bottoms, his parents let him go.

What an experience that was! In the team was a wild Texas steer that bellowed and kicked at and tried to gore everyone who came near him and who, for the safety of all concerned, had to be kept yoked to a stout old black bull day and night, year in and year out. Of course Jed could not resist the temptation to set him off at every opportunity, which did not in the least facilitate his domestication. Then there were the "swing" steers who lost themselves in the brush as often as they got out of sight, causing Jed to get scolded for a late start in the morning and, what was more to his dislike, causing his employer to rout him out in the morning while it was hardly daylight that he might round up his cattle for the day's work.

All day long then, except for an hour or so at noon, it was trudge, trudge, trudge through the rapidly growing grass beside the oxen, cracking the whip and admonishing the oxen to "get up," while they strained and tugged in their yokes at the thickly tangled sod; and nearly every day interest was intensified by a more or less narrow escape from treading upon and being bitten by some wriggling, rattling "sauger" coiled in the grass.

As Jed and his employer "bached" the food was more abundant than delectable, yet never without the sauce of appetite. Notwithstanding the toilsomeness of the life, the storms of wind and rain, the taciturnity of his employer, who had less of patience even than of worldly goods, there was not a moment when Jed would willingly have given up the job to go back to school. He had discovered what few grown-ups come to realize that mental work is the hardest work, that brain fog is the tiredest fog and that the weary brain rests more slowly than any other part of a weary body. In forsaking the schoolroom for the prairie, the school book for the long lash, the hours of study for the all-day trudge, trudge, trudge by the side of his ox team, Jed was merely taking the direction of least resistance. Go into any reform school and call for volunteers to lay aside their books to go out and dig trenches in the mud for laying sewer pipe and half the boys in the class room will throw down their books with a slam. It is only when learning becomes a passion that the drudgery of it can be endured by an untrained mind, and the mind of Jed was, as yet, as untrained as that of a colt on the range.

So passed the spring and early summer, the oxen straining in their yokes, Jed trudging through the tall grass, geeing and hawing and swinging his whip, the sod ripping after them like the tearing of new muslin, while his querulous employer held to the plow handles and mentally chalked up the dollars earned as the virgin acres were transformed from grazing land into broken prairie.

Then came the dog days! The corn fields had been "laid-by," richly green and full of promise, when out of the southwest there came a puff of wind dry and fetid as though it might have come from the throat of some

RECOLLECTIONS OF JED

SOME POIGNANT EXPERIENCES

BY

A. JUDSON

ravaging beast. The mercury went to a hundred-ten in the shade and held there for days. The rustle in the corn and grass changed to a rattle. The heat throbbed, Jed trudged and the oxen exuded dry sweat. It was not in flesh and blood to stand it long, but there was another "land" to finish before the turf should change to sundried brick, the prairie to pavement. Every "round" meant dimes, every day meant dollars, and dollars meant to Jed's employer another heifer turned loose on the range to increase the nucleus of a herd farther west where wife and babies were holding down a claim, so there was no mercy to be shown oxen, boy or man.

Every day had been like every other day for more than a week, but there came a day that was different. Night came to Jed that day while the sun was yet not half way down the western slope and, when morning came to him, as he thought, it was night and he was at his own home, in a wet pack, with broken ice applied to head and spine and that wild, untameable Texas steer, that had been bellowing in his ears, was transformed, while Jed looked at him, into the gruff old doctor sitting by his bedside with father and mother bending over him with strained, anxious faces. "They can't skunk you, can they, boy?" the old doctor demanded, half laughing, "although they came rather nearer it this time than when they tried to feed you to the rattlesnake or to the gray wolf."

For the rest of that summer Jed lounged about, saying little and taking little notice of what transpired. There was some "peripheral difficulty," the doctor explained, "which Jed will probably outgrow," but it may be doubted if he ever did, quite, for sunstroke has no power to facilitate cerebration or give tenacity to the memory. Fortunately for his ratings at school that winter there was a new teacher, a return of the chronic inability on the part of Jed's class to solve the riddles in fractions and so the work he went over was as familiar to Jed as the road between school and home, and equally devoid of interest.

How it came about no one quite knew, but somehow or other that fall and winter there was a mighty outpouring of The Spirit upon the people of York and vicinity. It had not come through any traveling evangelist. There was no corresponding wave sweeping over the state. There were no magnetic personalities in the community to account for it. Some thought that the oft repeated, stentorian exploration of old Judge Piper, "Oh, Lord, come down and 'revive' thy work in this thy great moral 'winnard,'" had at last made itself heard at the throne of Jehovah. Anyhow, the community became profoundly concerned for the salvation of souls. Night after night the mourners' benches were filled by men and women who first knelt with heads bowed in tears and then groveled on the floor groaning in despair. From out of the number now and again someone would spring to the feet with shining face, waving the hands for joy and singing at the top of the voice, "I am saved, I am saved, saved by the blood of the Lamb," whereat hallelujahs would be sung and those who had "come through" before would fall into line and file by extending the hand of fellowship with paeans of praise.

Old men and women affirmed that never before in their lives had they witnessed such an outpouring of the spirit upon any people. Sometimes the very prodigality of the return for effort expended made some of the workers impatient of delay and Brother Butterfield would break out with, "Well, go to hell if you want to; Brother Cook and I cannot waste our time with a lot of hardened sinners while there are so many calling to us who really want to be saved." Then Old Father Cook would pour oil upon the ruffled feelings of the audience, pleading with them to watch for the faintest whisper of the still, small voice and to beware as they valued their own souls lest they commit the unpardonable sin of barring the door of their hearts against the Holy Spirit when it passed that way and knocked to be admitted. For, often, Old Father Cook declared, there was only the gentlest tapping, tapping at the door of the soul, such a tapping as a refined lady might make with delicate fingers at the door of her friend. The idea was a hobby with Father Cook and he discoursed upon it often and eloquently, which made no little impression upon the mind of Jed.

Yet Jed sat through all this preaching and exhorting, testifying and praying, for many weeks unmoved. He arose for prayers with the rest rather than suffer himself to be counted with the goats, but, although he listened for that still, small voice, he failed to hear so much as a whisper. He saw others leap to their feet in ecstasies while he sat unmoved. He felt of himself as one may feel his own pulse, to see if perchance he might detect some symptom of ecstatic feeling, but he found no intimation of anything of the kind. Sometimes the humor of incidents that took place during these revival meetings so appealed to him that it was with difficulty that he refrained from laughing outright, which he knew would be utterly reprehensible and certain to make him a target for reproach; but the revival was the talk, and almost the occupation, of the town and Jed continued to attend the services with regularity.

The experience meetings were the most interesting and convincing of all, Jed thought. What was said seemed to come so straight from the heart and was told so simply that the sincerity of those who "stood up" and "spoke for Jesus" could not be doubted, and yet those testimonies meant little to Jed. He sat through them all unmoved and unconcerned, except that his unresponsive condition of soul exactly corresponded to that of those who had committed the unpardonable sin, as frequently and graphically depicted by Father Cook, white of hair, serene of countenance, rapidly nearing his four score years and tremendously anxious to snatch a few more souls from the burning before he, himself, should be called home.

Gradually the conviction forced itself home to the mind of Jed that he had, somewhere, somehow, he knew not when, committed the unpardonable sin. Perhaps he might have done it when he was asleep, for had not Father Cook told of many who had awakened out of sound sleep to find themselves face to face with a consciousness of their lost condition but for the "free grace of a dying Savior's boundless love" already welling up in their hearts? Perhaps the Holy Spirit might have knocked at the door of Jed's heart during "that bad summer" and, not being admitted, had gone on by the soul of Jed forever! The more Jed pondered over the mystery the more miserable he became. A sense of loneliness oppressed him and, instead of love for God and his Christ, there came into his heart only fear, fear of a roaring, crackling hell that should blaze around him forever and ever, such a hell as the horse-thief, Monroe Scranton, had told him of, a hell that was hotter than the furnace under the limekiln and wider than the earth and the sky. Timid by nature, fear developed into something akin to terror, terror of death, of life, of everything, even of the darkness of the night, of the loneliness of the woods that he had always loved, of the river brink where he had liked to lie and listen to the lappings of the eddying waters as they flowed.

At this juncture there came into Jed's spiritual vision sweet-faced, sharp-nosed, white-eyed Ida. His initial acquaintance with her had not been propitious. He had tossed a ball to her, she missed it and it hit her on the nose and made it bleed profusely. By way of palliation for his offense he passed her little presents, but they were returned the next morning with a, "Mamma says no," after which Jed was more than ever certain that he was in outer darkness.

Ida was about Jed's own age, but whereas she was in those days a bud of sweet promise Jed distinctly was not. He was awkward, strident of voice, as uncouth as a morbid self-consciousness could make him, and he had among mammas a bad reputation not yet lived down; but that did not hinder Jed from worshipping afar or from "showing off" in Ida's presence as often as opportunity offered, and he contrived to keep her in view much of the time. Sometimes she was gracious, more often aggressively oblivious and, occasionally, repulsively partial to some of the other fellows. At all times she was self-poised, modest and obviously a saint. She led the singing in the children's meetings and her talks in their experience meetings were beautiful. Her joy in her salvation was as spontaneous as the bubbling of a spring.

When at last Ida's mildly obdurate father "went forward" she sprang from her seat and followed him, threw her arms about his neck and wept convulsive tears of joy upon his bosom. Jed sat where he saw it all. What was that tugging at his own heartstrings, then? The fervor of the audience was tense. A sudden impulse seized Jed to go forward, too. He went, snuggled in and knelt at the mercy seat next to Ida and her father. Through her tears she smiled at him and reached out a hand which Jed took. She squeezed his hand just a little. There were prayers and rejoicings for Jed, for at last his father's family had been broken into. For Jed there was tranquility of spirit. He had made his election sure.

In those days, in York, there was no fear of evil consequences from having the Bible in the public schools. It was always there. What is more, the revival broke into the schools and there was no more zealous toiler than Beecher Pierce, the principal. He held seasons of prayer and heard testimony for Christ in school hours. Sometimes a whole period between noon and recess, or recess and four o'clock, would be given over to prayer, song and exhortation. He called upon different ones to lead in prayer. One day he called upon Jed, who bravely did his best, but got the big words he had heard used at the meetings so tangled up that if the Lord understood the purport of what Jed said he had the advantage of Jed, but Jed got through with it somehow, his face aflame from blushing.

A week after Ida had passed in her name for church membership Jed had passed in his, and the Sunday after she was baptized in the rapid waters of the Indigo, Jed was buried beneath the same wave. Ugh! but wasn't it cold! It was March and a chill wind blew. Was it any wonder that Ida gave a little squeak as she went under or that Jed came up puffing like a porpoise?

All his doubts and misgivings Jed now put aside. He was safe in the arms of the church and the thing to do was to live up to the part, outside, if not always in kindness at home. If Ida now and again placed her hand upon his shoulder as he sat at his desk, or ran her fingers nimbly through his hair, there was thrill and ecstasy and new birth enough for him in that, and he threw himself into the revival with a fourteen-year-old enthusiasm. Perhaps it was the possession of an exceptional imagination, perhaps a frankness that made him always much of an open book, perhaps a prenatal suggestion springing from a clergy ancestry. Anyhow, his tongue was loosened, and people said, "a born preacher," and helped and encouraged him on. The missionary spirit was in him and the first thing he did was to lay siege to the jail.

Now a new jail had been built in York, the farthest west that was any stronger than a box car, and to it were committed for safe keeping pending trial as fine a selection of horsethieves and murderers from as many as five counties as ever decorated a telegraph pole, a railroad bridge or a spreading cottonwood by the river's brim. When Jed went forth to find sinners he went where sinners were to be found. The prisoners were hungry for things to read and Jed carried them magazines and papers from the printing office, tracts from the church and half an hour or more each day he read to Big Ike, who could not read, and as many of the others as cared to listen, from the new testament and the old. The kindly jailer admitted Jed to the jail corridor while the men were locked in their cells until, one day, he came blundering upon a dashing "trusty" hugging the jailer's wife in a blind corner of the jail corridor, after which Jed was mysteriously ruled out of the jail and had to carry on his propaganda from an uneasy perch on the stone window ledge outside, high from the ground and in momentary danger of slipping off. As the season advanced, Jed carried his prisoner friends flowers from the home garden, peddled peaches about town until he had sold enough to pay for the basket and then took the rest as a much appreciated good-will offering to his friends behind the bars.

Was Jed to be blamed if he over-estimated the good results of his efforts? Certain it is that he was signally successful. These prisoners were about the easiest lot to be induced to sign the total abstinence pledge, and to avow their faith in the redemptive power of the blood of a crucified Savior, that ever missionary came across. And, what was more, they were all unfortunate men, misguided and faulty, as Jed himself had been, but wholly innocent of the grave charges written into their commitment papers. Of the truth of this Jed became entirely convinced, but, somehow, as they were taken one by one to their respective counties to be tried, one at least was hanged, some were sent to the state prison, one or two were returned to the jail for a further probationary period, one was hanged by a mob on the way home, one was shot and killed while trying to escape from the custody of the sheriff who had him in charge. The sole one of all Jed's converts who was acquitted and turned free had a place found for him with an honest farmer down in the Sandy bottom, where he tarried half a year and then ran away with the wife of the farmer and her two children, with the aid of a light spring wagon and span of bay mares. The farmer got back his mares and children, but that was the last seen of Jed's convert or the farmer's wife.

Notwithstanding the poverty of this experience the missionary spirit in the bosom of Jed in no wise abated. When, in the experience meetings which intermittently continued through the fall and winter following, Jed rose to tell of the work he had done for the Lord he could tell of the night school he had organized among the negroes, just then flocking up from the South, where he was teaching them to read and cipher and was trying hard to make clear to old Edom, what was not at all clear to himself, the mysteries of Revelation, the mind of Edom running more to the marvels of prophecy and eschatology than to practical Christian ethics. Before spring Marcus Alexander was tried and sent to state prison for trying to kill his near-white wife for failure to repulse the advances of white men, and Jed's only true blue, colored Christian convert, Joe Pack, eager to do right and eager to learn, went out as cook for a haying crew working on a government contract, was surprised by the Cheyennes, killed, scalped and burnt to a cinder in his own campfire. When Jed's own hog disappeared from its pen, and he had hunted three days for it in vain, finally chancing to look over the high rim of Black John's pen and there finding it, he was greeted with: "Is dat you' hog, chile? How do you reckon dat hog ebber climbed dat fence into my pen?" Jed had to confess that he reckoned it never did and that Black John would do well to load it into his wagon and fetch it home as quickly as he could, which he did. So ended Jed's missionary work among the blacks.

Jed next turned his attention to the demon rum and joined a temperance lodge. He was the youngest member of the lodge and deeply in earnest in trying to fetch into it those who most needed its sustaining influence. Much was his surprise the morning after to be greeted on the street by one of the most ne'er-do-wells in all York with, "Earnest labor brings success, Jed"—the password solemnly given him the night before to be guarded with jealous care. He reported the fact to the next meeting and was both applauded and laughed at for his zeal for the preservation of fraternal secrets. Pretty much all the young folks of both sexes in York belonged to this lodge and, with much billing and cooing in corners, they paired off for a good time if not always for life, leaving Jed and a few others to burn themselves up with their zeal for temperance if they chose.

Now in York lived one Charley Arman, with as little harm in him as anyone could have who had been brought up to treat when he had the money, and to turn not away when invited by another to "take something." Jed cultivated his acquaintance. He was a bit out of the social swim, was not much invited anywhere; in fact, from boyhood, for no very good reason, had been passed by on the other side. He felt it, felt that he did not wholly deserve being socially ostracised for doing only what so many others did, and Jed led him to believe that the way into good society led through the lodge. With many doubts and misgivings, he finally permitted Jed to propose his name for membership. "He ain't nice, don't you know," Jed heard whispered around, which prompted him to make an impassioned plea for his friend from the floor of the lodge. He set forth the palpable truth that the lost were those the lodge was especially sent to save, and was warmly applauded for his speech, but Charley was handsomely blackballed just the same. No judge ever more keenly dreaded to pronounce sentence upon a condemned criminal than Jed to convey the result of that ballot to Charley in outer darkness, but he might have saved himself even that bitterness. The "good joke on Jed" was told over every bar in town that very night, and that night, too, Charley heard of it, went on one more glorious drunk, packed his valise and left the home of his childhood never to return.

When the eyes of Jed were opened he found it accounted smart to come to the lodge with a flask of whisky in the pocket, to be passed around in the anteroom. When the pairing off had been about completed the lodge died down and was not resurrected until there was another batch of young people who needed pairing. Not a few of those who trifled with their solemn obligations, in recompense for their peridy, quaffed afterwards of the hemlock.

But the soul of Jed had meantime sickened. Nothing that he had done had proven worth while. The converts in York of a year-and-a-half before had about all back-slidden; his own zeal had burnt itself out; the call of the wild rang in his ears much as it had done "that bad summer"; the "bud of rich promise," had removed with her family to a distant city, not for ten years to cross Jed's path again, and then only for a blissful instant within the sheltering folds of a convenient portiere, "for auld lang syne," she said, and then passed out into the world's cut and shuffle to be lost to Jed for ever and aye.

The period of questioning had come and, in the lone watches of it, Jed had to confess to himself that, in very truth, he had not, to his knowledge, felt so much as the flutter of a wing of the Heavenly Dove against the cage bars of his soul; that what he had experienced was the ecstasy of love for thin-nosed, sweet-faced, white-eyed Ida, and that that love had been the love of a calf. Thence followed those hazards of that illiberal and unknowing radicalism, commonly called infidelity, through which many a questioning, truant-souled Thomas must walk, sometimes far down into the valley and shadow of fear and fog, which experiences may sometime form the burden of another chapter in the "Recollections of Jed."

It was at a Fourth of July meeting in the little city. The mayor, William Smith, rose, and at dignified length read the Declaration of Independence. There was a pause; then from one of the mayor's old schoolmates came the loud whisper: "Bill never writ that. He ain't smart enough."

"I see you have your arm in a sling," said the inquisitive passenger. "Broken, is it?" "Yes, sir," responded the other passenger. "Meet with an accident?" "No, broke it while I was trying to pat myself on the back." "Great Scott! What for?" "For minding my own business." "I see. Never could happen to me, could it?" "No." "And if it did I wouldn't be blame fool enough to tell it." Then there was silence in the car.—Chicago Tribune.

A Scottish parson remarkable for the simple force of his pulpit style was enlarging one Sunday upon the text, "Except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish." "Yes, my friends," urged he with solemn earnestness, "unless ye repent ye shall all surely perish," devoutly placing his left forefinger on the wing of a blue-bottle fly that had just alighted upon the reading desk the while the parson's right hand was uplifted, "just as surely as, my friends, I flatten this poor fly." But before the threatened blow descended the fly got away, whereupon the minister further "improved the occasion" with ready wit, exclaiming, "There's a chance for ye yet, my friends!"—Scraps.

"They quarrel dreadfully, I'm told." "Yes; I think she would sue for a divorce but for the fact that he has nearly enough tobacco coupons to get a piano."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Department No. 4.

Action No. 22818.

FLORENCE E. BEMIS, a widow, formerly
FLORENCE E. DORSEY,

Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof,

Defendants.

H. L. BREED, Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Florence E. Bemis, a widow, formerly Florence E. Dorsey, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point in the Northerly line of Carl Street distant thereon One Hundred and Fifty (150) feet Easterly from the point formed by the intersection of the Easterly line of Stanyan Street with the Northerly line of Carl Street; running thence Easterly along the said line of Carl Street Fifty (50) feet; thence at a right angle Northerly One Hundred and Thirty-seven (137) feet Six (6) inches; thence at a right angle westerly Fifty (50) feet; thence at a right angle Southerly One Hundred and Thirty-seven (137) feet Six (6) inches to the Northerly line of Carl Street and the point of beginning.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that her title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be met in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 30th day of August, A. D. 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By J. J. McDONALD, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM.

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 2nd day of September, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff.

NAMES.	ADDRESSES.
City and County of San Francisco,	San Francisco,
a municipal corporation.	California.
H. L. BREED, Attorney for plaintiff, 1102 Broadway,
Oakland, Cal.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Department No. 1.

Action No. 22819.

KATIE B. CHILDS, a femme sole,

Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof,

Defendants.

H. L. BREED, Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Katie B. Childs, a femme sole, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at the corner formed by the intersection of the Northeastly line of Twenty-sixth Avenue with the Northwestly line of J Street, running thence Northwestly along the said line of Twenty-sixth Avenue Seventy-five (75) feet; thence at right angles Northeastly One Hundred (100) feet; thence at right angles

Southeasterly Seventy-five (75) feet to J Street, and thence Southwestly along the Northwestly line of J Street One Hundred (100) feet to the point of commencement.

Said lot or parcel of land being known and designated as Lot Number Sixteen (16) in Block Number 485 upon a certain map entitled "Plan of the Property of the Bay View Homestead Association," surveyed August 1871, Wm. P. Humphreys, City and County Surveyor, which map was filed in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, on the 19th day of June, 1872, in Map Book C.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that her title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be met in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 30th day of August, A. D. 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By J. J. McDONALD, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM.

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 2nd day of September, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff.

NAMES.	ADDRESSES.
City and County of San Francisco,	San Francisco,
a municipal corporation.	California.
H. L. BREED, Attorney for plaintiff, 204 Oakland
Bank of Savings Building, Oakland, Cal.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Department No. 8.

Action No. 22696

E. J. MONTGOMERY and
MARGARET F. MONTGOMERY, his wife,

Plaintiffs,

vs.

ALL PERSONS claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described or any part thereof,

Defendants.

LEO C. TUCK,

Attorney for Plaintiffs.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of E. J. Montgomery and Margaret F. Montgomery, his wife, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above-entitled court and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Beginning at a point on the northerly line of Broadway distant thereon seventy (70) feet westerly from the corner formed by the intersection of the northerly line of Broadway with the westerly line of Hyde Street, and running thence westerly along said line of Broadway twenty-two (22) feet; thence at a right angle northerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet, six (6) inches; thence at a right angle easterly twenty-two (22) feet, and thence at a right angle southerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet, six (6) inches to the point of beginning.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That their title to said real property, and to every part thereof, be established and quieted and that all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said real property and in and to every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description, be ascertained and determined by the judgment in this action and that it be adjudged and decreed that the plaintiffs are the owners in common in fee simple of the said real property, and of every part thereof, and that each of the plaintiffs is owner in fee simple absolute of an undivided one-half of the said real property, and of every part thereof, subject to no conditions, liens, encumbrances or claims of any kind, character, or description, and for such other relief as the Court may deem meet in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and seal of said Court, this 19th day of August, A. D. 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By J. J. McDONALD, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM.

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 26th day of August, A. D. 1910.

MEMORANDUM.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

NAMES.	ADDRESSES.
The City and County of San Francisco,	San Francisco,
a municipal corporation.	California.
LEO C. TUCK, Attorney for Plaintiffs, Balboa Building, San Francisco.

8-26-10

NOTICE OF STOCKHOLDERS' MEETING

Notice is hereby given that in pursuance of a resolution and order of the Board of Directors of the Buclimo Mining Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, unanimously adopted at the regular monthly meeting of said board, duly held on the thirtieth day of August, 1910, at the office of said corporation in San Francisco in said State, a meeting of the stockholders of said corporation is hereby called for, and will be held at the office of said corporation at Room 941 Monadnock Building, No. 681 Market St., San Francisco, California (said place of meeting being at the principal place of business of said corporation and at the building and place where the Board of Directors usually meet), on TUESDAY, THE TWENTY-NINTH DAY OF NOVEMBER, 1910, AT 8 O'CLOCK P. M. on said day, for the purpose of considering and acting upon the proposition to increase the capital stock of said corporation from One Hundred Thousand (100,000) Dollars, divided into One Hundred Thousand (100,000) shares of the par value of One Dollar each, to Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) Dollars divided into Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) shares of the par value of One Dollar each. The amount to which it is proposed to increase the capital stock of said corporation is Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) Dollars.

By order of the Board of Directors.

Dated September 1, 1910.

THOMAS E. HAVEN,

Secretary Buclimo Mining Company.

9-23-10

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Department No. 4.

Action No. 22744.

JOHN CHARLSON,

Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof,

Defendants.

A. M. DE VALL, Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:

To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of John Charlson, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Chapultepec Street (now Winfield Avenue), distant thereon seventy-five (75) feet southerly from the southerly line of Esmeralda Street; thence running southerly along said easterly line of Chapultepec Street (now Winfield Avenue) twenty-five (25) feet; thence at a right angle easterly seventy (70) feet; thence at a right angle northerly twenty-five (25) feet; and thence at a right angle westerly seventy (70) feet to the point of beginning.

Being lot No. 393 of Gift Map No. 3, as per map on file and of record in the office of the Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be met in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 24th day of August, A. D. 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By J. J. McDONALD, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM.

The first publication of this Summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 9th day of September, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

NAMES.	ADDRESSES.
G. S. Crim,	2360 Howard Street,
	San Francisco, Cal.

9-9-10

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of ELIZABETH CHASE PHILLIPS, deceased.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned executors of the last will and testament of Elizabeth Chase Phillips, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said executors at the office of J. S. Hutchinson, Rooms 710-714 Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned select as their place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said Elizabeth Chase Phillips, deceased.

WALTER Y. KELLOGG,

GEORGE KNOX.

Executors of the last will and testament of Elizabeth Chase Phillips, deceased.

Dated, San Francisco, September 21, 1910.

J. S. HUTCHINSON, Attorney for Executors, 710-714 Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, Cal.

TITLES RESTORED

TITLES RESTORED UNDER McENERNEY ACT, complete for $35.00. Burnt Records Title Co., 951-953 Monadnock Building, ninth floor, Market Street, near Third.

JULIUS GALMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office,
30 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491.

Residence,
1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4590.

SAN FRANCISCO

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The State Board of Forestry

California was the best forested state in the Union and it may be doubtful if any part of the world of equal area excelled it. The heritage was and is priceless. But it has been consumed under forced draft. From 1899 to 1904 the cutting of timber averaged at the rate of 83.7 per cent over the preceding 5-year period, and there has probably been no diminution in the rate since then. Very few of the areas cut over are in process of reforestation. Most are laid waste to grow up in chaparral. The headwaters of our streams are involved and the destruction of the forestation of the drainage areas results in the destruction of the valleys, the rivers and the bays. The region "Beyond Jordan," once rich, populous with some of the most wonderful cities of the world and living in the glory of Greek culture, for hundreds of years has been a wilderness, all owing to the destruction of the forests. Shall the fate of "Beyond Jordan" be the fate of California? That is the problem, and this lesson in citizenship has to do with the meeting of that problem.

Years ago the California Water and Forest Association took up the subject in earnest and fought hard. It procured from the Forest Service of the United States government the drafting of a model forestry law and sent it to the legislature to be enacted. Then arose opposition. The Southern Pacific Company was against it, and that company was powerful in the legislature. Still, a few devoted friends fought on. They permitted the cutting out of first one feature of the measure, to meet the objections of one opponent, and then another feature to meet the objections of another, finally holding to an irreducible minimum that would serve for little more than to commit the state to a forestry policy of some sort—to at least a beginning, but they would not have secured that had not Governor George C. Pardee come to the rescue with executive influence. That helped, and a beginning was made.

This beginning consisted in creating the State Board of Forestry consisting, in the main, of those three over-worked officials constituting, in part, at once the state board of examiners, the state lunacy commission and the state board of forestry, viz: the governor, secretary of state and attorney general, to whom were added a state forester. It is a clumsy arrangement and one that ought not to exist. Only the state forester knows anything of forestry, and it is a state department of forestry, with a state forester at its head, that the state needs. The three officials above mentioned are clogs on the wheels of progress and should be eliminated, except that the governor should be responsible for the state forester and the state forester should be responsible to the governor and help to make up his cabinet or council.

The forestry office of California now consists of a state forester with a salary of $3,000, a deputy forester with a salary of $1,800, an assistant forester in receipt of $1,600, and a stenographer-clerk whose salary is $1,200. This is the force that has more or less control over some 34,000,000 acres of forested, or once forested, lands in this state. Out of this immense area, fortunately for California, the forestry service of the United States has reserved and controls 28,968,510 acres, but, scattered through it are many private holdings not under federal authority, so that there is more or less of co-operative work, as there should be, between state and nation in controlling the forests of California.

The two enemies to the forests of California are the wood-butcher of avaricious lumbermen and fires. The state forester and his associates have been lessening the destructiveness of the first enemy not a little by education, by persuasion, by teaching better methods of lumbering and by insisting upon leaving seed trees, also by aiding and encouraging private owners in the protection of their forests from fires.

But nothing at all adequate can be reached along either of these lines until California announces the doctrine that private ownership of forests is subject to the well-being of the whole people, that the owner's right to cut timber must be subject to the public's right to have a new forest take the place of the old, to have the watersheds of the streams protected from sudden and injurious denudation and subjected to fire patrol, and to have the destruction of the "slashings" left after the timber has been cut, rigidly enforced. The doctrine must be established that all private property is owned subject to the common welfare, and then the state must have a forestry department big enough and strong enough to see to it that the public welfare does come first.

So much law as we now have permits co-operation, not only between federal and state governments, but between state and county. The state forester appoints all the federal forest rangers as fire wardens, which gives them both federal and state authority, and then appoints such other wardens as counties and private owners may pay for, so that, in all, there are some 650 fire wardens in the state. These fire wardens have the powers of peace officers to arrest persons whom they have reason to believe are guilty of violations of the laws against fires and to warn out fire fighters when property is in danger.

In short, California has made a good beginning with a forest-protection policy and with the induction into office of a free and progressive state government. California can soon be placed in a position to protect, not alone the common rights of all living in the state, and those who are to live hereafter, but the highest interests of the forest owners themselves.

Mrs. M. Wheelhouse of Weser, Idaho, controls a small railway, an electric plant, a fruit farm, a factory and several stores. The thriving condition of all her projects has proved her to be a good business woman. In addition to attending to these enterprises she looks after a family of several children and is said to have more influence with the women voters in her state than any other person.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE

A full line of Theosophical Literature from Point Loma, California, the headquarters of the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society, under the leadership of Katherine Tingley, is now on sale at A. M. Robertson's, 222 Stockton St., S. F., and at Smith Bros., 462 13th St., Oakland, California.

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

California Optical Co.
Makers of Good Glasses

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
Invisible Bifocal Lenses
181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

13TH & MISSION STS.
PHONE MARKET 13

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Los Angeles 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

Day School---Night School

Electrical, Mining, Civil

AND

Automobile Engineering

Architectural Drawing

Wireless and Morse Telegraphy

BOOKKEEPING : SHORTHAND

Our Graduates in Every Department Secure Good Positions

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO

16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY: OCTOBER 28: '10 FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH · GOOD COURAGE · GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, In Advance. No. 49.

Alas! Peary

WAS IT NOT ENOUGH to gird at Peary for exposing the pretenses of faker Cook, and to question that he, himself, placed his farthest north any farther north than 89.6, without digging out of the must and dust of three centuries records to show that the pole was discovered in 1630? If there be services so great that they can be paid for only with ingratitude the polar researches of Commander Peary must be set down as one of them.

Scalding Tears

NOTHING SINCE THE WEEPING of Twain at the tomb of Adam, and of Marse Henry at the graves of Ananias and Sapphira, has equalled in pathos the scalding tears shed by the able editor of the Argonaut over the discomfiture of La Follette and Bristow, Cummins and Norris, because of the return of the Lion Hunter in the nick of time to grab up the glory of insurgency and make off with it. Was it not more in the nature of the coming of Blucher at the strategic moment to make the Waterloo of Cannonism the more complete? And if those for whom the Argonaut feels so strongly are not heard to complain why should one who cares for neither La Follette nor Bristow, Cummins nor Norris, Roosevelt nor a progressive Republicanism, permit himself to be made miserable by that which so little concerns him?

Are They Not Asking Too Much?

THERE HAS BEEN SOMETHING of a tempest in certain theological circles, in the disputations of which The California Weekly is little concerned, over, among other things, the verity of the fish story in which Jonah is reputed to have figured. Without going into the merits of the discussion, if it have merits, is it quite fair to ask of us moderns more than was asked of the whale? All that was asked of him was to swallow Jonah with permission to spew him out again in three days, whereas we are gravely required to swallow both Jonah and the whale and keep them down.

Presto, Veto, Change!

POSTMASTER GENERAL HITCHCOCK is reported to have reduced the annual postal deficiency from $17,000,000 to a little more than $6,000,000 while increasing salaries, extending rural routes, employing more labor, and without either impairing the postal service or diminishing the compensation to the railroads. How did he do it? By what magic? Was it by practicing black art? Inquisitive Americanism will not be satisfied with less than a full explanation of the where and the how.

Doing His Best

JOHAN D. ROCKEFELLER is not giving his money away as fast as it is coming in, but he is doubtless doing his best. Lately he has added nearly $3,000,000 to the fund devoted to medical research work, that fund now totaling $8,240,000. It is none too much, and there is no state in the union or country in the world that should not be doing medical research work on its own hook. Doubtless the time will come when all states and countries will set aside a fund for that use. We honor Rockefeller for leading the way, and yet we cannot forget how he made his money, and is still making it. The Standard Oil is still selling below cost to kill off rivalry and taxing the losses up to communities that cannot help themselves. That isn't playing fair.

Journalism As It Is

IT COMES TO US, one remove from the principal, and yet not so incontrovertibly that it would not be libelous to use it with particularity, that persons interested in defeating the Islais Creek bond proposition approached the responsible head of a San Francisco morning paper to learn if the influence of that paper might be had to defeat the proposal. It could not, but for a consideration of five thousand dollars the paper would agree to say nothing for two months, after which it would pursue such a course as sound policy might dictate. Is there not some way to make the doing or proposing to do such a thing a felony? Infamous it certainly was.

The Chronicle's Get-Together Talk

THE KIND OF HELP the San Francisco Chronicle is giving the Republican ticket is the sort that the copperheads gave to the cause of the union back in the sixties. It votes the war a failure and calls upon the victors to surrender to the vanquished in the interests of harmony. The rivalry for disreputability raging between the organs of De Young and Calhoun, the Chronicle and the Post-Globe, is getting to be downright exciting.

Nine Thousand Failures

IT IS NOT THE ONE who fails who is a failure, unless he permits himself to be counted out. Thomas A. Edison has scored nine thousand failures at a cost of two and a half million dollars in making a storage battery that will meet the requirements of a street car service, but he now feels that he has scored a success. Grit like that deserves a crown, even though a multitude of other sins might have to be covered by a mantle of charity, which, however, may not be the case with Edison.

Those Moral Platitudes

FAULT IS FOUND with Theodore Roosevelt because he revamps for repeated use those moral precepts that were ages old before he was born, instead of adding anything to the world's new store of knowledge. In the language of one who has seen more than ninety years of life in this world, "Democracy is impossible with any people that has not a moral sense," and not for nineteen hundred years has the world had a man who has so revived and vitalized the moral sense of a forgetful humanity as has this same "preacher of platitudes," Theodore Roosevelt. And what a fight he is now making in New York for just the things that Hiram Johnson is fighting for in California and with precisely the same influences marshaled against him behind the mask of an unobjectionable but pliant personality!

Charles Reynolds Brown

THE LOSS TO CALIFORNIA of Rev. Charles Reynolds Brown, pastor of the First Congregational church, Oakland, will prove serious. His place in the intellectual and religious life of the state will not be easy to fill, but he had better be lost to California than lost to the world, and California's loss will be the world's gain if, as possible, he shall devote his remaining years to the cause of peace through arbitration. One who fancies that ministers are lazy fellows who live without work would change his mind if, like Dr. Brown, he were called upon to bear for fourteen years the sorrows and delinquencies of a church membership now exceeding 2,000 and a floating congregation of as many more. God be with him wherever duty calls!

Who Began It?

Everybody laments the personal turn that the election contest in this state has taken. The question, "Who began it?" is being asked on every hand. This paper has attempted to trace the matter to its unhappy source. To fix the responsibility for the beginning of the trouble necessitates a review from the start. Once begun, the keeping of it up is as easily accounted for as the sweeping of the mountains by a forest fire after being kindled. There does not seem to be any good place to stop it.

The two party conventions were held at practically the same time and both parties, in their platforms, declared for practically the same things. The campaign then promised to be one in which The Interests would be able to take no interest, and reactionaries would be left to sulk in their tents with no one to comfort them or heed their existence.

Theodore Bell's only legitimate chance to be elected governor of California this time was lost when Hiram Johnson won the Republican nomination. Had Curry or Anderson or Stanton won in that fight Theodore Bell could have taken up the fight where he left it four years ago with a fighting chance to win. Four years ago he drew thousands of free Republicans to his standard. This year, fighting the old fight as he fought before, in opposition to any of the candidates except Johnson, free Republicans would have flocked to his standard by tens of thousands.

But Hiram Johnson was overwhelmingly nominated. Then Mr. Bell's only chance to be elected lay in attracting to his standard the element of the Republican party that had fought Johnson in the primaries. This could not be done fighting on the lines of four years ago. Therefore Mr. Bell modulated his tone. Radical before, he was now conservative. Knowing that the criticism of Johnson would be that he is dangerously radical (which he is not) Mr. Bell became safe and sane in his utterances and placed emphasis on his own moderation. Everybody who heard or read what he said knows that this is true. He unsaid nothing that he had said, took back nothing, compromised himself in no overt way, but the Bell of 1910 was not the Bell of 1906. The tone was different. He had not the old ring. This moved Hiram Johnson to say that "No sane man will lie awake nights devising methods by which Mr. Herrin and the Southern Pacific Company can get a square deal in the government of this state, because, as always in the past, they will take a square deal and more without any of our valuable assistance; and when I observe our Democratic friends expending all their energies in telling the people of the State of California how square a deal they are going to give Mr. Herrin and the Southern Pacific Company I grow just a wee bit suspicious of their hope of accomplishment and of their design in this government should they, unfortunately, in November next, be successful."

That was not much to say. It was what thousands of others were thinking, but it sufficed to uncork the vials of Democratic wrath and to precipitate that campaign of abuse of Johnson that has drawn to the Bell standard about all the disreputable elements in the political life of this state. It was "good politics" to do exactly as the Democratic management has done, but it was mighty poor political morals. Mr. Bell should have hewed to the line exactly as he did four years ago. His tone should have been as rich and as strong in 1910 as it was in 1906, but his desire to win to his own standard, "those who differ from Mr. Johnson," modulated his tone and swerved him from the right line.

What the result of the new alignment will be no man can foreknow, but certain it is that about every untoward element in our political

THE STAFF
A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager
 Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094
 Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.
 Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage. Sample copies sent free on request.
 News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.
 Advertising rates submitted on application.
 Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.
 Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.
 The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Moir, 330 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

life is now openly arrayed on the side of Bell, whereas there should have been no room for that element to choose between the parties or the men. Mr. Bell is a trained politician who weighs what he says and has a care for what he does. Mr. Johnson is no politician at all, but he is a fighter for what he believes to be right, a fighter who thrusts rather than parries, one who neither asks for nor gives quarter. The lure of victory has proven too much for the California Democracy. No dog Tray was ever in worse company.

The Robeson Taylor View

Whatever former Mayor Taylor has to say is to be listened to with respect and with as much patience as one may be able to muster, but when he places the great contest that is now convulsing the nation on party lines he taxes the patience of every student of public affairs.

It is true that the Republican party of this state and nation has, in large measure and at critical times, been dominated by special interests, but it is equally true that at crucial times The Interests have been able to command and receive all Democratic help needed. There are certain underlying tendencies that differentiate political parties. There are men who are temperamental Republicans and others who are temperamental Democrats, but on moral issues, on the issues of subversion to oligarchical tendencies, party lines are not and cannot be drawn.

Furthermore, The Interests will not stay out of any political party if put out. They will insinuate themselves into any party that promises to be useful to them. Set apart by themselves they would be powerless. Their cohorts would be relatively as few as Grant's coyotes after they were counted.

To insist that no political party can purify itself is to preach the gospel of hopelessness. Every political party must purify itself and its work of self purification must go on within itself, as it is now going on in the Republican party of California and of New York, and in the Democratic party of New Jersey and Georgia. It must go on as constantly as the work of self purification goes on in the human body. There must be sleepless vigilance or disease and death will enter in.

The deplorable condition in India, for instance, is not due, as commonly supposed, to over-population, but to inherent rottenness in the lives and institutions of the people, and the only hope of India lies in its self-purification. It is so with political America. A rottenness has pervaded its political life and party lines have not proven effective for barring it out. In California and New York the Republican party is purifying itself and the Democratic party, in both states, appears to have thrown open its doors to receive the corruption which the Republican party casts out. In New Jersey, at least, the situation is reversed, and the Democratic party is purifying itself with the door of the Republican party open to receive the Satans that the Democratic party casts out.

When the campaign opened in this state it opened under the most fortunate imaginable conditions. The heads of both tickets were clean men and the weaknesses in one ticket were generally countervailed by respectability in the ticket of the other party. 'Woe to California that the fight did not proceed on the lines upon which it started out! To the Democratic management, if not to the head of the ticket, the chance for success led it into commiserating with, and extending hospitality to, the common enemy of all mankind and persistent effort has been made to cause it to appear that what is in fact a revolution in the Republican party is nothing more than an insurrection, a mere factional quarrel. The pending issue is not an issue of party. It is an issue of men and of country and the whole nation is awaiting the result in California with as breathless an interest as awaited the issue in '61. With all due respect to Edward Robeson Taylor, veneration for his years and honor for the splendor of his public services, what he says ain't so.

Our Foreign Trade

Our foreign trade is regaining its senses. Importations were held back pending the passing of the new tariff bill in anticipation of substantial reductions, but as soon as the bill became a law that obstruction gave way and imports surged in. More than that, the depression of 1907 had spent its force and the globe trotters and European shoppers loosened their purse strings and imported millions upon millions of dollars' worth of fineries that during the hard times they had been doing without. This thing has been going on for more than a year and we are still importing more than prudence warrants, but our high prices at home had prevented exportations and the balance of trade was, for some months, against us. Now prices at home have somewhat subsided and exports are going forward at such a rate as to turn the European balance of trade in our favor more than $50,000,000 per month. We at all times need a heavy balance of trade in our favor in dealing with Europe because we are a great borrower of European money and Europe is the great American pleasure ground where the greater part of our joy money is expended. These are a heavy drain upon the productive energies of the American people, but we can afford to borrow and to buy if we can produce and sell. This we are now doing and trade conditions are righting up, at least so far as dealings with Europe are concerned.

A Water Front Exposition

Just so surely as the Panama-Pacific exposition is organized on lines similar to the expositions that have gone before will the whole proposal fail to interest the people. Any traveler would prefer to take ship and go through the canal itself, turn about and go through it again and go home, than to attend any such exposition whether held in San Francisco or New Orleans. Expositions, as expositions go, have palled on the palate of the world.

But San Francisco has an opportunity to afford something new under the sun and at the same time to derive a permanent advantage from having expended its money and put forth its exertion. Attention is called, therefore, to our leading article for the week that deals with this subject. Without undertaking to pass upon the feasibility of all its suggestions, we feel certain that the attentive reader will find in it great possibilities, something to kindle the imagination and inspire hope.

The fear is in many minds that special influence will somehow, in the holding of this fair, misdirect the common effort to private advantage. Once assured that the public will get the benefit, as the public will bear the expense, the enterprise will be taken hold of with such enthusiasm as will make the Panama-Pacific exposition second in achievement only to the completion of the great canal itself. Read our leading article on a Water Front Exposition, sleep on it, and dream of it and then make sure that the idea be not thrown aside except for good cause shown, some better cause, for instance, than advantaging some private real estate speculation.

Organization Plus Mobilization

At the state convention of the Federation of Labor, lately held at Los Angeles, discussion was had relative to the organization of migratory unskilled labor. Such labor needs to be organized and it needs to be mobilized. Here is an opportunity for organized labor to perform a service of great value to labor and to California.

There is need, insistent need at certain times and places, for much help that at other times is not needed at all. There is at the same time, but not at the same places, much unemployed labor, much labor that is migratory in a vagrant way largely because it does not know where it is needed. Unionism needs to undertake to supply as well as to regulate the labor market. Too often it has confined itself to regulating without supplying, to the distress of industry and the injury of labor itself.

It would be possible to so organize and mobilize available labor as to be able to throw whole regiments of busy workers into the cherry-picking orchards, the apricot, the peach, the prune, into the raisin vineyards, the beet fields and the orange and lemon districts. It would be necessary to so organize as to be able to contract for supplying one hundred laborers or five hundred, as the Japanese and Chinese do, but so co-operatively as to prevent at once the padrone system of south of Italy and the coolie system of the orient, yet secure a reasonable wage for the untrained worker and at the same time develop him into a trained worker.

There are large possibilities in this idea. Labor does not flow from where it is idle to where it is needed automatically and expeditiously, the more especially that kind of labor commonly classed as unskilled. Private, individual contracting in that class of cases is an exasperation to the employer and unsatisfactory to the employee. Collective bargaining there fits the need as nowhere else and affords an opportunity to demonstrate the advantages of it in other fields.

Besides, the whole labor ladder can never be lifted from the rungs nearest the top. If it would be lifted into its fitting place power must be applied to the bottom rung. Migratory, unskilled labor is on that rung. These suggestions are commended to the special committee having this service in charge. Let that committee not only so organize migratory labor as to make it well paid, but so mobilize it as to supply needs that are now sought to be supplied by importations of coolies and peons and undesirables from the south of Italy and east of Europe. There is here a field not only of great strategic but of industrial advantage.

What Next?

The very mild declaration of Hiram Johnson that he had grown "just a wee bit suspicious of the hope of accomplishment and design" of those who expended their energies in telling the people of California how square a deal they were going to give the Southern Pacific Company, has been made the pretext for heaping upon him as vile slanders as ever were hurled against candidate. The latest was brought forward in the form of guarded but insinuating questions as to whether or not Mr. Johnson did, as attorney for Dalzell Brown, receive as his fee $55,000 in the stock of the Western Pacific Company, the property of the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company. It should be plain enough to anyone that if it can be shown that any shares of that stock, or of any other, were stolen from the Safe Deposit Company the property of that company can be recovered from whoever has it, but Mr. Johnson meets the charge by declaring that he never received or held a single share of such stock of such company in his life, and that the whole story is a lie out of whole cloth. But somebody will hear of the accusation who will not hear of the denial and that was the purpose of it. Of course Mr. Bell is not responsible for this outrage! It was one of those acts of those miserable friends of his of whom he is at once heartily ashamed and thankful for their aid. What next? The character of the fight being made against Mr. Johnson is proof of the want of characters of the militant portion of his opposition. There is not an untoward influence in the state that is not arrayed against Johnson. That alone should persuade right minded persons how to vote.

The Plaint of the Clearing Houses

The clearing houses of San Francisco and Los Angeles have joined hands against amendment number one because of the increase of the tax rate from six-tenths of one per cent to one full per cent, and they allege for reason that it will be a large increase in bank taxation. So it will. That is what it is for. In the language of the tax commission, under our laws as they now stand, "The national banks are really not taxable at all. What they do pay is a gift of free will. The state commercial banks can easily evade taxation almost entirely, and probably two-thirds of what they pay is a free gift, while the whole amount (paid) is insignificant. The savings banks on the other hand are 'soaked' to the full extent of the law." It was to prevent just that condition that the legislature amended the amendment in accordance with the original views of the commission after it had given years of study to the proposition.

The clearing houses declare that if this amendment is adopted it will be equivalent to a tax of 8.50 per cent of gross earnings of the banks, 19.18 per cent of net earnings, or 32.89 per cent of dividends or 47 per cent of excess earnings reserved for losses, undivided profits and surplus. Those figures do look big.

But by their own confession the banks were willing to be taxed six-tenths of one per cent, which also would have amounted to 5.1 per cent of gross earnings, 11.51 per cent of net earnings, 19.43 per cent of dividends or 28.2 per cent of excess earnings reserved for losses, undivided profits and surplus. Taken by themselves those figures also look "mighty skeery," and yet the banks were "minded to pay" that much.

Look out for the banks, they are fooling you! The increase in the taxation of the banks of California, as their capital, undivided profits and surplus now stand, will be exactly $599,000, no more and no less and, to earn it they had, according to the latest figures obtainable, resources amounting to $952,859,000 and if, as they threaten to do, they pass all the increase to the borrower to be paid it will cost him less than one dollar per year on each thousand dollars he borrows.

The truth is that the banks of California have been shirking their share of the common burden of taxation. They have been paying less than one-half of one per cent on what they are worth, while others have been paying twice to three times as much. Moreover, if the people have got to pay this $599,000, they may as well pay it in added interest as in added taxes, for if the banks do not pay it other property must. Vote for Amendment Number One. Don't let the "poor banks" fool you.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

"I have drifted on into a dreary middle age, poverty stricken and friendless, and I view with alarm the prospect of a dependent old age. I never was fitted to cope with this workaday world." So he wrote and then quaffed that which took him out of a world to which he was unfitted, and into one he knew not of. Life has no pathos exceeding this.

Where was the fault? The Socialist will be quick to affirm that it is in our unregulated social system, and straightway his inventive genius sees in the clouds of a more or less foggy mentality such an organized social system as shall perforce put such an one into a niche carved out for him where he shall earn his keep through the performance of some task suited to his strength and capacities, at once free from worry and free from the galling sense of being dependent, also free from responsibility for self-direction, free from opportunity to develop that splendid initiative and courage without which men are children all their days.

"I never was fitted to cope with this workaday world." There, in a single sentence, is the whole lamentable story. But who, at the beginning, is so fitted? At the beginning we are all of us seven to ten-pound lumps of fat and pliable gristle, with power only to suck and to wail as prenatal suggestion, or discomfort under the swaddling band, may prompt us. It is our business in life to fit ourselves for life and, inasmuch as this is a workaday world, it is our business, and the business of those who fetch us into this life, the business of the public, to conspire to fit us into just such a world. Is society, are parents, doing quite all that needs to be done to help to fit the unfit "to cope with this workaday world?"

"I have drifted into a dreary middle age." In following up this tragedy to unravel it here is another clew, very important. Why was he without chart and without compass drifting in a world that has the Christian religion and the life lines of thousands of men who have navigated life's waters successfully? What shall we say of one who puts to sea thus unprovided? What right has such an one to expect anything but shipwreck and disaster? True it is that, with the best appliances for steering that the world knows of, wrecks do occur. They cannot all be avoided. Some of those who go down to the sea in ships, and some who embark on the bosom of life's river, must and will perish, but to set forth wholly unprepared is to make destruction sure.

Set our courses as best we may, adverse winds and currents, yes, economic pressure, too, like the pressure upon the crust of the earth that causes the strata to slip and the earth to quake, will crowd us aside from the right way. Things happen. There is good fortune and ill, commonly called luck, that modify all results and sometimes fetch crushing defeat, and yet, making allowance for all variations from the true course we have mapped out, it is still as true as can be that the only way is to map out a course and follow it. We may drift for a holiday, if there be no rapids below, but to drift on into middle life is to make sure of the rapids and to de-serve them.

Every wreck has its lesson which a pains-taking investigation may put to good account in preventing other wrecks. The wreck of this victim of suicide enforces these conclusions: The child cannot be trusted to set its course; the youth must be persuaded, aided, lent a hand; the man, having been so prepared to be a man, must make his chart, steer his course and upon no account must he drift into or through middle age. He may fail, anyhow, but if he drifts he is sure to face the alternative of death, either by his own hand or some other how, or a dependent old age. And it is right and proper that it should be so! To have it otherwise would be to gather figs from thistles.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Continuous Supply of Radium Assured

It is announced that the work of securing radium from the pitchblende mines in Cornwall, England, is proceeding so satisfactorily that a lack of sufficient supply of the precious substance need not be anticipated. Already it is being obtained at the rate of more than a half-gram per month, which is as much as has heretofore been secured in a year, and preparations have been made for the production of a gram a month. This is good news, for now that the world has learned the value of radium it would not like to do without it; and yet it is amazing how little of the metal suffices. To illustrate, it is to be produced, in sufficiency, at the rate of a gram a month. Does the reader realize that, at that rate, it would require more than thirty-one years of constant mining to produce a pound troy of the substance? Babies would have become middle-aged men, and middle-aged men would have grown old, while this lone pound of radium was being secured for the use of the world. Looked at from this point of view the result seems insignificant, but viewed in the light of capacity to benefit the world of men this single pound becomes vastly important. Multum in parvo—the phrase was born before radium was dreamed of in the philosophy of the world's Horatio, but never was it so applicable to aught else.

Health Certificates for Brides

Switzerland, which is well to the front in answering questions that have to do with the betterment of mankind, apparently is about to take a step which will be regarded with interest by thoughtful people everywhere. Acting upon the suggestion of the Swiss society of public utility for women, it is considered likely that the government will enact a law providing that prospective brides be required to present a physician's certificate of health to their fiancés in advance of a wedding, so that the man who marries a girl must do so with his eyes open to her physical condition. Next year, if the plans are carried into effect, all young women, married or otherwise, must submit to such an examination. Which is all very well, perhaps, but why confine this antinuptial proceeding to the women? Has the experience of the world taught that they alone bear the ills to which flesh is heir and hand them down to their children? As a matter of fact, are not men the more likely to be afflicted with the most loathsome of diseases? The Swiss plan seems subject to the objection that it is too much like the handle of a pitcher—entirely on one side. To be sure, Swiss men are examined when they go into the army, but there is time for much to happen between then and marriage. With the invidious distinction between sexes removed, this Swiss scheme should work well.

Consumption of Alcohol in France

Fifty years ago the consumption of alcoholic liquors in France averaged little more than two quarts per citizen annually; at the present time the consumption is nearly sixteen quarts. The French people drink about eight times as much alcoholic liquor as they did a half-century ago. During the same time the Scandinavian peoples, who have been recognized as hard drinkers, have decreased their consumption by about one-half, or from two gallons to one gallon annually. Today the bad pre-eminence in this line belongs to the French. Their capital city has more than five times as many saloons as London, although much smaller. Those who are acquainted with the facts attribute this increase in drinking largely to the fact that absinth is the principal drink, and each glass of absinth is a demand for another. The growth of the absinth habit is demonstrated by statistics. In 1884 the amount of this liquor consumed in France was 1,300,000 gallons; since 1905 the annual consumption has averaged about 780,000,000 gallons. In twenty-one years the amount drank multiplied itself by 600. Such figures almost suggest the inebriation of an entire nation, but so many Frenchmen have remained sober that strenuous efforts are being made to secure a better condition of affairs by helpful and judicious legislation.

Be Careful How You Wash Your Hands

In the good old days before man, under the wise tutelage of the doctors, began his ceaseless struggle against bacteria, our worthy grandparents thought they had done a good and effective thing when they had carefully washed their hands with soap and water. We, who are wiser and more microbe-haunted than they, if we have kept abreast with the discoveries of science, know better. We know, what our grandsires never once dreamed, that soap and water thus applied really is injurious instead of beneficial, inasmuch as it softens the skin and gives a swarm of microbes a chance to enter through the pores and begin house-keeping. This unforeseen discovery, which should put soap and water out of business, was made by Dr. Schomburg, a surgeon on the general staff of the German army, and its merit has received official recognition. What, then, are we to do, do you ask? Are we to permit our hands to go unwashed and uncleansed? Not at all. Buy alcohol, and wash with that, and it will remove bacteria. It may prove a trifle expensive, but what is expense when compared with microbes and other bugs? Use alcohol for cleansing purposes. That is, use it until the doctors tell us that it is injurious, and when they do they probably will suggest something else that can be purchased, as they generally do.

Another Non-Fatal European Duel

Another European duel has been fought without serious consequences, but with intense satisfaction to honah. The parties to the affair were Herr Joachim von Bethmann-Hollweg of Runowo (of whom it is difficult to believe that he would smell as sweet by any other name) and Count Heinrich von der Goltz. The circumstances leading to the duel are not publicly recorded, but they were so grave that it was agreed that the parties should continue firing at each other until one of them had satisfied his honor by incapacitating the other. With this understanding, the bullets of the honor-stricken ones began to make long, smooth holes through the atmosphere, the seconds having first secluded themselves behind a stone barn which they had previously assured themselves was at hand. The first interchange of shots was futile; on the second a ball from Bethmann-Hollweg's pistol struck a tree, ricocheted and hit the count on a belt-buckle or something of the sort. Then arose an interesting question in duelling morals. The man with the double-jointed name was not wounded, he was not hurt except in his feelings—was honah satisfied? After due and grave consideration, it was decided that honah was satisfied, or if it were not it should be ashamed of itself. So the doughty foemen honked rapidly away to a place of which they knew, where foamy nectar was dispensed. Thus ended another tragedy unmarred by gore, and honah quotations in the market appear to have been unaffected.

The Azure Blood of Eton College

Perhaps the duty we mortals owe ourselves to see to it that we are born of the right kind of parents to insure us a soft snap in life is nowhere more strikingly exemplified than at Eton college, England, which is attended by the sons of families of rank and wealth. In this school there are at the present time two princes, viz: George of Teck and a son of the king of Siam, and sixteen peers or heirs of peerages, including three sons of dukes, one of a marquis, and twelve sons of earls. Two of these children yet may sit on thrones, while the other sixteen, who were only less judicious in the selection of their parents, will inherit 53 titles of peerage, an average of about three and one-third titles apiece. Moreover, the latter will inherit 42 castles or manors and 680,000 acres of land, an average of 42,500 acres apiece, which should necessitate their getting up in the morning rather early if they are to farm successfully. All because they selected their parents with great care, and for no better reason. What a howling farce it all is! Yet we solemnly accept it as the will of the gods or something akin thereto.

Uncle Sam Pays the Fiddler

Just now Uncle Sam, like the rest of us, is engaged in paying the fiddler. Stating the case in another way, he is paying his share of those increased costs of living which hit some of us so hard. To be sure, what he pays out goes first through our pocketbooks, but he is paying it out. An example of this truth is found in army expenses. Last year the cost of a soldier's ration was placed at 19.65 cents. For the current fiscal year the appropriation was made on a basis of 20.7 cents per ration, and the estimate for next year places the cost of a ration at 23 cents. Here is an increase of about 16½ per cent in two years. In about twelve years at this rate the cost of food would be doubled, and other expenses of living keep pace with it. It is admitted that the price of food may go so high that the 23-cent estimate will not cover the cost of a ration, but it is believed and hoped that it will not, and to such a hope no one who desires to continue to live will breathe a nay.

Lady Stout, wife of Sir Robert Stout, chief justice of New Zealand, says that the infant death rate is lower in her country than in any other place in the world except Victoria. According to her statistics 214 babies die before they are one year old out of every 1,000 born in Hungary; in Germany, 190; in France, 149; in England and Wales, 174; in Scotland, 125; in New Zealand, 77; in Victoria, 70. Lady Stout also says that before the granting of equal franchise to the women of New Zealand and Victoria the birth rate was very low. For the first few years after the decline continued, then the birth rate took an upward turn, which has continued ever since until now it is higher than that of England and Wales. These are, in Lady Stout's opinion, two strong arguments in favor of equal franchise.

Mrs. John Curran of St. Louis, president of the Woman's Missouri Development Association, is working hard to have the 12,000,000 acres of untitled fertile land in her state brought into cultivation. One of the means by which she hopes to accomplish this is by having agriculture, at least the rudiments, taught in the public schools. The association is offering prizes to school children under 16 for the best essay on "Missouri and Her Resources."

According to investigations made by Miss Mary Van Kleck, one woman out of every four in New York is a wage earner, and only 47 per cent of this army of workers receive more than $6 a week. Miss Van Kleck is the secretary of the woman's committee of the Russel Sage Foundation.

Miss Sheila O'Neill recently showed and explained in London a model of a tandem monoplane which she has just completed. This exhibition was given under the auspices of the Woman's Aerial League of London. Miss O'Neill is the only woman allowed to drive a motor car in the Irish reliability motor trials. She has won many prizes in motoring, has patented several inventions and is at present perfecting a new splash device for motors. She went out as a nurse during the Boer war, and holds medals from both the king and queen of England.

Mrs. F. W. Gerard, chairman of the forestry committee of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, has worked in behalf of forestry for more than twenty years. The other members of the committee are Mrs. Mary Maury, who has prepared a handbook on the trees of Kentucky; Mrs. A. B. Avery, who has secured the passage of a resolution by the Louisiana Yellow Pine Association for such regulation of cutting timber as will comply with the conditions of supply and demand; Mrs. F. H. Tucker, who has written outline studies of conservation, and Mrs. Lowell White, who helped to save the big trees of California from destruction.

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

ONE HAPPY ENDING

Mrs. Humphry Ward's reason for giving a happy ending to "Lady Rose's Daughter" instead of following the tragic facts of Mlle. de Lespinasse's life, from which the plot is avowedly taken, appears in the introduction to the new edition of her works announced by Houghton Mifflin company. "At the bottom of my mind," she says, "was the conviction that Julie would in truth have destroyed herself, whatever Delafield might do. But this conviction was met by another equally clear—that I no longer had the nervous energy wherewith to do it. The thought of Julie, ruined and dying, of the wrestling with feeling and realization which lay before me if I was to bring home to myself first, and to my readers afterward, a tale at all akin to that which appears in the letters of Julie de Lespinasse—presented itself to me, as the thought of another rock-face to climb might present itself to one already worn out in a wrestle with the mountains. I simply felt that it could not be done. The very thought of it haunted and terrified me. Deliberately, imagination turned to softer and easier things, and though I confess now that Delafield's interposition on the Paris journey, and all the later scenes of the book, involve, in truth, a forcing of the subject, a certain treachery to the artistic conscience, yet the relief and pleasure they gave me at the moment are not to be described."

FRENCH PLAYS FALSE TO LIFE

"Every one knows that it is in France that the family has reached its apotheosis," says an Englishwoman in the Lady's Pictorial, "that marriage nine times out of ten is a reasonably happy and safe adventure to undertake, and yet all French drama and most French novels depict a curious society, in which all the characters of an attractive age are engaged in breaking the Seventh Commandment. "Now French society—one of the best organized and cohesive in the world—could not endure for a year if such a state of things really existed. As a matter of fact these unlawful intrigues are no more typical of French family life than of English family life; indeed, I should imagine rather less so."

"The young French wife is observed, chaperoned, surrounded by mothers-in-law, aunts and cousins, who watch all her doings with lynxlike assiduity and she has to account for her time to a whole circle of affectionate but experienced women of the world. In summer and autumn they fill their villas and chateaux with relatives, and not with friends, so that the chances of monsieur or madame being able to indulge in a love affair or even the mildest 'flirt' are exceedingly remote."

"To the chateau come the sons or daughters-in-law and their children, uncles, aunts, grandmothers and cousins from the most distant provinces, but rarely does the French host or hostess have a succession of 'house parties' such as we are accustomed to in England. The young wife must sit in the drawing room of an afternoon and of an evening, surrounded by her husband's female relatives, assiduously doing fancy work, making clothes for the poor of the village or embroidering a new altar cloth or a robe for the Madonna in the little parish church."

"She is the woman in Europe who is least able to live her own life, to go about without malicious comment or to see masculine friends with any sort of cordial intimacy. Then again there is the tie of her religion—the necessity of confessing all her misdoings—to make her adhere to the narrow path of duty."

For the origin of the "Encyclopaedia Britannica" the forthcoming publication of the eleventh edition of which, by the University of Cambridge (not the Times this time) is exciting so much interest we must go back to the year 1771, when the modest forerunner of the now celebrated work was issued in weekly numbers, which when completed filled only three small quarto volumes.

Californian Poets' Corner

MAGDALENE

By Lyman R. Goodman

They left her dark hair floating wild,
With finger-tips they touched her lips,
And laid no flowers upon her breast,
But only sighed and said, "Poor child!
Perhaps 'tis best!"

I knew no sin, for I was young;
I only heard the night-air stirred,
While spirit music rose and fell
Upon my ears, and voices sung,
"Sweet Christ, 'tis well!"

A BALLAD OF LOVE

By Clarence T. Urmy

I.
O sweet the buds and the silver dew
And the blush of the dawning day,
And O, if the skies were always blue,
And if it were always May!
The heart is the fairest bud of all,
And love is its silver dew,
Alas! for the years, the pain of years,
And the dreams that come not true

II.
O sweet the buds and the silver dew,
And the blush of the dawning day,
And O, if the skies were always blue,
And if it were always May!
O, sad the wind and the dusty path,
Alas! for the birds grown dumb,
For hearts that wait at the harbor-gate
For the ships which never come!

III.
O, sweet the buds and the silver dew,
And the blush of the dawning day,
And O, if the skies were always blue,
And if it were always May!
Alas! for roses that turn to dust,
For dew that changes to gall,
For hearts that break for love's dear sake—
Alas! for the end of it all!

REALITY

By Chas. S. Greene

Shut in by walls of brick and stone, all day
I work and worry, like the crowd, for gold,
Till only that which can be bought and sold
Is real,—higher things but fancy's play.
Yet when the quiet evening shades of gray
Dim earth and sea, ah then, no more controlled
By sordid cares, I cut the bonds that hold
To toil and strife, and on the peaceful bay
Am borne content. And when my eyes I turn Back to the town, it fades before my sight,
All vague and ghostly in its smoky pall;
While over it in sunset glory burn
The high, the beautiful, in living light,
The true realities, enfolding all.

TO THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

By Charles Keeler

Here, where the gentle hand of God, outspread
In benediction, has bestowed such blue
And purple mist upon the bay, such view
Of ocean far through golden portals led,
Or, in the gloaming, such a royal red,
Sweeping the tide and spreading high its hue
Like banners of Cathay flung wide, there grew
A consecrated pile to learning wed,
O may the stones here reared make mute appeal
With their dumb eloquence for beauty's dower,
And may they be the center, whence shall steal
A presence through the land, a might, a power
Shaping the West to ends more fair and strong,
Finding expression meet in toil and song.

BESSIE ABBOTT, "YSOBEL"

Bessie Abbott, who will create the title role in Mascagni's new opera, "Ysobel," is one of the most interesting of American prima donnas. The New York Times says of her:

Miss Abbott made her debut at the Opera in Paris in 1901 in the role of Juliet. She sang there for two years, and her other parts included the bird in "Siegfried" and Gilda in "Rigoletto." She sang with Jean de Reszke during his final Paris appearances. In 1903 she went to the Opera Comique, where she made her debut in "Lame." She was also heard there as Zerlina in "Don Giovanni" and in "Traviata."

It was here that Heinrich Conried heard her and determined to engage her for the Metropolitan Opera House. The story of that engagement has never appeared in print before.

Mr. Conried sent for Miss Abbott and after he had talked with her a while he offered her a contract to sing here. After considering the contract for some time, she decided to refuse it.

"I am too young, Mr. Conried," she said. "I haven't had enough experience yet. Let me wait two more years before I sing in New York."

Mr. Conried was obdurate. "Come now or not at all," he said. "I control the operatic situation in America, and if you do not come with me now you can never come."

At that time, it should be explained, Mr. Hammerstein's opera house did not exist. Miss Abbott came to the Metropolitan, therefore, and then it began to be a question why Mr. Conried had wanted her so badly. The singer made her debut in "La Boheme." She had never sung the part of Mimi before, and she had never sung Italian before. Yet she had just a week to learn the part in. She was naturally very nervous. Her further appearances during that season were made under similar circumstances. Once Mme. Sembrich fell ill and she was asked to sing the title role of "Marta" at the shortest possible notice. Many weeks she did not sing at all. After two years—her contract was for five years—Miss Abbott rebelled.

Her quarrel with Conried was one of the picturesque features of the end of the season of 1907. Miss Abbott refused to sing at the Metropolitan any longer and started a suit. Mr. Conried spoke harshly to those who mentioned the matter to him. The following season, however, Mr. Conried's last as director of the Metropolitan, found the affair settled. Miss Abbott returned and sang Gilda, Filina in "Mignon," and "Marta." Her appearances on these occasions were made under the best possible auspices.

Since then Miss Abbott has sung in concert at Lisbon and at Monte Carlo. She created the title role of the one-act opera "Naristhe" at Monte Carlo. She has sung Marguerite and she knows the leading parts of the Queen of the Night in "The Magic Flute," Rosina in "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," and "Lucia." She is still a young woman. Mascagni has had her voice, which is a lyric soprano, constantly in mind while he has been composing "Ysobel," and he has been careful not to make the music too great a strain. It is intended that she shall appear in it five times a week during the season.

Giorgi and Gaudenzi are the two Italian tenors who will alternate in the leading tenor part. Rovescalli of the Scala, in Milan, is painting the scenery, and the costumes, armor and properties are being made by Carramba, the designer and costumer of the same theatre. The opera, of course, will be sung in Italian and the company, with the exception of Miss Abbott and certain members of the chorus, will be essentially Italian.

Miss Abbott has taken an especial interest in the matter of the chorus herself. She is desirous that the girls shall not only be able to sing well but that they shall be young and beautiful.

IS ROOSEVELT A MYTH?

By E. FRENCH STROTHER

The editor warned me before I began to write this article that there must not be one particle of information in it. Please remember this.

I have discovered that Theodore Roosevelt is a myth. Like the farmer who sized up the hippopotamus. I have carefully studied this prodigious phenomenon, and "there ain't no such animal."

I will admit, if you please, that there is somewhere a something in human form, weighing over 200 pounds and having familiar eyes and teeth, this something being called Theodore Roosevelt. I will admit that this something is an entity, a physical organism, that it speaks; even, perhaps that it has a soul. In brief, it is a man. But there is nothing startling in that. I am a man myself. But print my name in the headlines and nobody gets excited. Print Theodore Roosevelt in the headlines, and the world is agape. Print my name in the papers, and the few who read it at all may say, "A nobody. Apparently he is a writer." Print Theodore Roosevelt's name in the paper and everybody, reading, sees a vision bulking as vast as the genie that came out of the brass bottle the poor fisherman opened.

Now that comparison illustrates my point exactly. When Theodore Roosevelt was a student in Harvard he was, let us say, five feet six inches high and two feet broad, flesh and blood, hide and hair. When Theodore Roosevelt came back from Africa he was five thousand feet high, six blocks wide, wore a halo that dimmed the luster of Aurora Borealis, breathed thunder and spouted lightning, and the gnashing of his teeth was heard around the world.

I submit that both those descriptions are essentially accurate. And yet, obviously, there is a lie out somewhere. The second does not describe a man, it describes a prodigy. And this materialistic and scientific age has marked the stocks of prodigies down to zero. Hence my deduction is logically inevitable, and so I reiterate my premise, Theodore Roosevelt is a myth. There is no such animal.

Why, the man is impossible. For example, I once sat in an office in New York and overheard a Wall street broker and the treasurer of a great railroad system talk about Roosevelt. They called him uncomplimentary names, plain, hard, one-syllabled Anglo-Saxon epithets. That was intelligible, and I said to myself, "He could be those things. I don't think he is, but he could be." But then they enlarged on the subject and soon soared out of my range. They described him as horned and hoofed and cloven-tailed, more powerful than Colossus, more cunning than Machiavelli, more infernally evil than Mephistopholes, more destructive than holocaust. I left their presence with a picture of T. Roosevelt in my mind comparable only to a sentient and devastating tornado, with a face reflecting Inferno and works reflecting Death on a White Horse.

Then I came West again and heard Roosevelt described. Men spoke of him as a good fighter, an able statesman, an honest man. Intelligible, possible. But the admiring host went on and expanded as the hating host had done. Another prodigy was the result: a god-like being, possessed of all knowledge, all wisdom, all the virtues, invincible and invulnerable, gigantic, hurtling on to emancipate a nation, a race, a world.

Now these two views of Roosevelt are at the poles of all views, they are the ends of the spectrum. In between them you may find every conceivable opinion and estimate of him. Every man ascribes to him a different set of virtues and virtues, every man places him in a different category. Now that means that he has at least one vice or one virtue for every inhabitant of America. Divide them evenly, for the purposes of argument, and you have a man with forty million vices and forty million virtues, or eighty million distinct characteristics. Don't you see that that argument simply destroys itself? There cannot be such a man. Therefore there is no such man. Therefore Roosevelt is a myth.

In fact, Roosevelt is merely a case of national and universal auto-hypnosis. By a process partly of spontaneous generation and partly of infection, the minds of America have unanimously agreed upon two words, Theodore and Roosevelt, to stand as a sort of incarnated algebraic formula representative of the unknown quantity in public affairs. He is the x around which they arrange all their disputations. Everybody uses him as "the case in point." Mrs. Bellamy Storer worked the problem out that x-liar. Wall street worked it out that x-anathema. Jacob Riis says x-saint. Several million voters decided that x-political savior. And all the while they were all talking about a myth, which has no more real existence than Aladdin's wonderful lamp. They were all talking about their imaginary and self-conceived x, whereas the reality is only a short, fat man who is remarkable chiefly because he is energetic as well as fat.

I find this myth really very puzzling. I sit in a gathering of people, real flesh and blood people, and one man mounts the platform and talks about the tariff and direct legislation and all that sort of thing, and all these people continue to listen attentively and remain to all appearances sane and cheerful. Then, suddenly, the man on the platform emits two words, Theodore and Roosevelt, and that audience is instantly transformed into a lunatic asylum. They yell and clap their hands and stamp their feet. Some even mount chairs and throw their hats away. Why? Don't ask me. They wouldn't cheer an algebraic formula that way, and yet that is all those two words mean. Nor would they cheer Aladdin's lamp that way. Yet they cheer a myth to the echo, wherever that is.

It is certainly odd about these myths—for Theodore Roosevelt is only the most conspicuous example at the moment, and additionally curious because the avatar of the myth happens to be living at the time of his apotheosis. But there are several of these hoary frauds that have deluded the public down the centuries. Take Mahomet, for example. A comely youth who married a rich widow. But for thirteen hundred years some hundreds of millions of people have thought of him not as a corporeal being, with earthly attributes, but of him only as a vision, a law, a prophecy. And today some two hundred million people voluntarily and absolutely abstain from the use of alcohol and from the collection of usury because somebody's great-great-grandfather heard it from his great-great-grandfather that his great-great-grandfather had had an intimation that this incarnated mirage had intimated that these things were distasteful to the Author of the Universe.

And there is Shakespeare. What a colossal myth is here! Clever, clever man! Acute enough in life to know how more prodigious is a myth than is a man, he destroyed nearly every evidence of his living walk and then, when he descended under the concealing earth, shut off pursuit of his reality by that fearful curse which to this day has stayed the most adventurous and sacrilegious hand:

"Good friend, for Jesus sake forbear

To digg the dust enclosed heare;

Bleste be the man that spares thes stones,

And curst be he that moves my bones."

And what do we have? The memory of a man? Indeed, no. The reflection, now roseate, now sombre, of a light that flashed once across the heavens, a glittering comet of intellect and poetry, the repository of every emotion and the transmuting retort of every idea, a meteor, an annus mirabilis, a prodigy. Say Shakespeare, and the word does not connote a beef-eating, ale-drinking man: it connotes a bedazzlement of the ages. Plainly, we have here nothing real—we have a myth.

Only one man—or a group under the inspiration of one man—has ever attempted to puncture this world-embracing delusion. And Ignatius Donnelly made the mistake of leading simply from one delusion to another delusion, from one prodigy to a greater and more inconceivable prodigy. Suppose, metaphorically speaking, that Donnelly had braved the curse on Shakespeare's grave, had played the ghoul in the interests of science, had unearthed the mouldering casket, wrenched off its lid, and exposed the face of Francis Bacon, grinning still in the enjoyment of his age-long hoax, what then? Why, he would have given birth to a myth beside which the Shakespeare myth would pale to puny insignificance. Add the titanic proportions ascribed to Shakespeare to the gigantic proportions ascribed to Bacon, and you would stagger the human mind, you would have what Hugo ascribed to Napoleon: the universe mounting to one man's brain. Peace! forbear! Leave to us those myths that we have learned to grasp. Weigh us not down with visions too mighty to be borne. We can contain our Caesars, Mahomets, Bacons—myths by inheritance. Even the mob can generate its myth—Roosevelt, myth by our own creation. But pile not Ossa upon Pelion. For as our backs break our minds may conceive a doubt: we may remember not only that we are such stuff as dreams are made on, but, as well, that our little lives are rounded with a sleep.

SHEAR WIT

"The bride was young and beautiful," says a Virginia paper, "her chestnut hair being in ringlets about her marble brain." How would you like to marry a girl with a marble brain?—Toledo Bee.

Sir Henry Hawkins was once presiding over a long, tedious and uninteresting trial and was listening apparently with great attention to a very long winded speech from a learned counsel. After a while he made a pencil memorandum, folded it and sent it by the usher to the Queen's counsel in question, who unfolding the paper found these words: "Patience competition. Gold medal, Sir Henry Hawkins. Honorable mention, Job."—Argument.

"All the summer long you were growling about hard times, but how does the world look now?" "Ah, me!" he groaned. "There's no hope in it. We air now afflicted with more prosperity than we kin git away with!"—Atlanta Constitution.

Having to explain the statement that the sun never sets on the British empire, a youthful essayist wrote as follows: "The sun sets in the west. Now the British empire lies in the north, south and east."—Strand.

Emperor—I do not care to hear your proposition, sir. Everything that is submitted must first be put through the prime minister. Subject—Nothing would please me better. I wanted to show you the new bayonet which I have invented for army use.—Judge.

Willie—How vain you are, Ethel. Looking at yourself in the glass. Ethel—Vain! Me vain! Why, I don't think myself half so good-looking as I really am.—Syracuse Herald.

Little Willie—Oh, Uncle George, did you bring your horn? Uncle George—My horn? Why, I have no horn. Little Willie—Then I wonder what papa meant when he said you were off on a toot last week?—Philadelphia Record.

Here are a few of the best Sunday school "howlers" which the Manchester Guardian has selected from a Sunday school examiner's note book: "Eve sinned out of curiosity more than liking for that particular fruit." "The Semitic races were the half breeds, from semi, half." "The Sanhedrin was composed of seventy men of reclining years and great learning."

Mrs. Myles—Is she bringing up her daughters properly? Mrs. Styles—Oh, yes; they're all hobbled!—Yonkers Statesmen.

Mrs. Gordon Green is a licensed pilot on the Mississippi. She is the wife of the owner of a line of steamers and began her study of the river twenty years ago, and finally took charge of a steamer plying between Cincinnati and St. Louis.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

The Case of Josh Simmons

Josh Simmons would set on a grocery cheer
An' argue our country is all out o' gear,
An' he'd tell how our gover'ment orto be run
If things they was did es they orto be done.
"W'y, look," he would say, "at the poor an'
the rich!

The diff'rence is shockin'; there shouldn't be sich;"

An' he'd vow that he reckoned some day he would rise.

An' then what he'd do, it would be a supprise;
An' he'd tell what to do to git riches an' pelf—
But somehow he never did nothin' himself.

Josh Simmons, he felt our condition, he did,
An' his grief fer the gover'ment couldn't be hid,

An' the tears frum his eyes, they would fall like a rain

When he said, "That our leaders is traitors is plain;

But sometime," he added, "I'm goin' to show Them faithless mis-leaders how things orto go."

Then he'd borry a pipe of terbacker of me, (An' the style that he did it was pleasant ter see),

An' urge that all rascals be laid on the shelf—
But somehow he never did nothin' himself.

Josh Simmons we 'lowed wus the cleverest cuss

That ever made clear our condition to us.
An' sometimes when he was a-talkin' we'd say,
"We'll hurt the dern rascals if you'll show the way."

An' then he'd remark in the dolefullest style,
"Though I'd like fer to lead you, yet, not to beguile,

Nor to lead you astray, though my intent is prime,

I'm sorry to say that I ain't got the time.
(Have you got a chew, Ab?) Lay the rogues on the shelf."

But somehow he never did nothin' himself.

* * *

Conscience, the Alarm Clock

Did it ever occur to you, Cleomenes, that the conscience is the alarm-clock of man's spiritual nature? Calculated to arouse and startle him, to urge him to play his part well in the strenuous business of living, to—but you see how happy is the simile, do you not?

And, of course, you know all about man's relation to the alarm-clock. It is like this:
Recently you have been getting to your work late, and you realize that you must cease dallying with Morpheus earlier. Well, an alarm-clock will yank you out of the land of dreams; in fact, that is its business in life.
Accordingly you purchase a nice, new clock with a warranted alarm.

The first morning you are pained to note that it works almost too well. If there had been a dynamite explosion in your room at half past five it would not have been noisier or more repulsively obtrusive than was that clock. Gabriel's trumpet probably will not waken you so suddenly; and it did almost everything that is noisy and unreasonable except to swear at you. As you remark to your scared wife, you wish you had bought a clock which was less emphatic.

The second morning it is so much better that it doesn't turn any of your hairs gray with fright. The third morning it gives you but a reasonable start. The fourth morning it barely succeeds in getting you out of bed.
A week now has passed, Cleomenes, and that alarm-clock has lost all its influence with you.
It is almost as powerless to disturb you as is the name of a political party to affect the average voter of today.

Right there is where the alarm-clock and the conscience again are alike. Neglect their warnings, fail to pay immediate attention to them, and they soon cease to have any effect upon you; you fail to feel their ablest efforts.

And that, my boy, is what ails many men and women whom you have met or will meet.

The Opinions of Rufus

I want you to notice, Elnathan, that the only thing 'bout an automobile that's extry dangerous is the fool that drives it.

I wouldn't object to wimmen-haters so much if 'twan't fer the fact that so many of 'em
'parently go into the business of gittin' up fashions fer the clothes of our wives an' sisters.

In the minds of most men is a beautiful faith that they'd have made a glitterin' success of 'most any callin' 'cept the one they chose.

Lots of times I've caught fellers writin' poetry when they'd have been a blame sight more useful if they'd been sawin' wood.

It's a good deal easier to evolve brilliant thoughts by readin' 'em in books than it is by settin' down an' diggin' in your gray matter fer 'em.

Josh Bings says it's a mighty distressin' thought that a feller can do things in a minute that he can't undo in a hull lifetime, an' I reckon Josh is right.

I calc'late that if the poet that said, "Sing though the cup be bitter," had heered me sing he'd a-offered some other suggestion.

If some men wan't married I don't know es there would be much of anything 'bout 'em to recommend.

Some people's lives is like some books:
They're considerable attractive—after they've been carefully 'nough expurgated.

'Tain't much of a philosopher that hain't observed that middlin' often the hardest part 'bout doin' a thing is the thinkin' 'bout it beforehand.

I've noticed that the fellers that allow they would do a heap of good with their money if they was rich mighty seldom are the kind that are rich.

* * *

What Could You Expect of Men?

We men are a queer, wobbly lot. Looking within our own souls, let's admit it at once.
We drink whisky—at least, some of us do—when we have none too much sense while sober; we support boodlers and grafters, knowing them to be such, when in our heart of hearts we realize that much of that sort of thing will wreck our country and spell ruin for our children; we—but you well know what we do, so why continue?

But what could you expect. Are we not the sons of our mothers, and are not our mothers, being women, the abject slaves of fashion-makers? Slaves, I said, and slaves is the right word, for never did black man under southern sun respond more certainly to an overseer's lash than do our women to the nod of Queen Fashion. They are going into the hobble skirt today, and the surprising result is that they generally look as if they had been whit-tled down or wish that they might be. One month ago they vowed that they would not be caught dead in a hobble skirt; now men see them and snicker every day.

They wouldn't wear bustles; and they did, whether they needed them or not. They never would wear balloon sleeves; and directly the whole brigade of them looked like incipient angels, of a suspicious character. They wear short skirts or long, waists under their arms or waists at their knees; they have hips or they never have heard of hips; they wear hair plastered to their heads, and they wear it in towering masses composed of selections from the heads of all the children of earth; they manufacture and unmanufacture themselves—all at the behest of Dame Fashion. They do this largely without regard to cost or personal appearance, and all they do or buy today must be thrown away within three or six months, for so Fashion wills.

What could you expect of men, I say. Are we not the sons of women who make and unmake themselves, build and rebuild, beautify and uglify, all at the behest of a shadowy something which lacks even a throne for its power? Foolish? Of course we are, but think of our lineage!

'Tis Thus the Prize Is Gained

Before earth's sweetest song was writ
Some poet-heart had throbb'd* to it,
Had throbb'd and yearned until it heard
The music mated to the word,
And, bowing low, reached out to seize
One note from Nature's symphonies.

Ere man God's whitest truth proclaimed
Some soul, where midnight candles flamed,
Had strongly striven, greatly yearned,
And crying, "I am blind!" had turned
To face doubt's wall of black despair—
And found God's message written there.

Ere life's divinest deed was done,
And Calvary's cruel height was won,
Was heard the Doer's tearful plea,
Deep hid in dark Gethsemane:
"Let this cup pass!"—Oh, precious tears,
To wash the stains from all the years.

So it has been, will be again;
The good we prize is bought by pain,
And some the crown of thorns must wear
That others smiles of peace may wear.
Man's savior still he crucifies,
But, lo! the message never dies.

* * *

The Candidate's Tribute To His Rival

"I pause at this time," said the political candidate to his audience, "to pay a deserved tribute to my distinguished opponent. He is a man of superior intellect, except for those gross deficiencies which everybody notices; of highest moral character, when there is nobody around to compare him with; of great purity of purpose, although his friends deprecate that he doesn't show it oftener; of loftiest patriotism, which would insure his refusing to accept boodle if anybody were looking; a candidate for whom all men would be delighted to vote, if they could do so rationally.

"Nobody could appreciate my rival's sterling qualities, thus briefly set forth, more than I do, and I regret only that they are so difficult to find; yet if one only had time and a microscope they might repay investigation.

"After this brief and merited digression, my fond hearers, we now will return to our discussion of the notable difference between a Demopublican who votes for an Aldrich-Payne tariff and a Republicrat who votes the other way."

* * *

Some Political Maxims

The loudest campaign orator doesn't necessarily catch the most votes.

If the tenderloin had no vote some of our ablest politicians would go out of business.

If there were less men who voted for their party right or wrong, the party wrong would be a less frequent phenomenon than it now is.

There is no man who loves his party so undeviatingly as the man who wants an office.

The objection to personal recriminations in politics is that you may not be able to say meaner things about the opposing candidate than he does about you.

Vote for a party because you deem its principles best at this time, but not because your grandfather voted for it. Perhaps the old gentleman is no more dead than are the party policies he upheld.

Abraham Lincoln was a great and good man, but probably he would be surprised to learn that some consider Nelson B. Aldrich a representative Republican.

There may be bad men on good tickets: It is recorded that Satan once was a resident of Heaven.

Even if Alameda voters can't manipulate a voting machine successfully, they ought to be gratified to feel that somebody is making money out of their mistakes.

We may not know where Hiram Johnson was four years ago, but we know that four, six and eight months ago he was lifting his voice against Southern Pacific dominance of California, when elsewhere all was silence.

One good vote offsets only one bad one, but that is sufficient to warrant polling it.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

In the Final Throes Of The Quadrennial Agony

The campaign is drawing to a close. "Watchman, how goes the battle?" As well as can be expected, thank you, so far as the battlefield may be seen through the dust and the smoke, and the lines are growing plainer day by day. All men who look no farther than to the party ensign have done their rallying, and the Republican rallying ground is the fuller of the two. There is no question about that, but if Mr. Bell were to attract to his standard all the Republican conservatives, all the pro-graft element, all the saloon vote, all who cannot get a promise out of Johnson or his associates for either political preferment or immunity from removal in the event of his election, and at the same time hold to his own standard all Democrats of progressive tendencies and all Herrinites of whatever persuasion—if these should all rally to the support of Bell he might possibly gain the election. That is his only chance and that is not a very good chance, because there is no human likelihood that he will succeed in attracting all these unhomogeneous elements to his standard. It will take them all to win, for the reason that the Lord so loved Republicans that he made more of them, especially in California, than of any and all other kinds. The situation looks good to The Watchman.

What The Watchman Is Particularly Proud Of

One of the most splendid features of this entire campaign, from the standpoint of The Watchman, is the high plane upon which the new Republican committee has conducted it. Instead of going to great corporations for great contributions no corporation has been permitted as a corporation or as an "interest" to contribute to it at all; contributions from any source whatever have been limited to $1,000, and not one dollar has been received into the party treasury that either expressed or implied any restriction upon the action of the party or the executive office in the event of Mr. Johnson's election. Many dignified gentlemen have proffered aid upon condition, but they were all plainly told that any aid given must be absolutely without condition other than that its expenditure must be for legitimate and lawful uses of the committee. Against all such advances Mr. Meyer Lissner and Mr. Uhl and their associates have proven "Rocks of Chickamauga," immovable, hurling back every line hurled against them. And, too, the people themselves have been appealed to for funds for the first time in the memory of men and that appeal has not been in vain. How unlike all this is to what has been the custom during the last thirty or forty years only those who have known what the past has been like can fully appreciate. While it took James N. Gillett two full years of his administration to redeem pre-election pledges before he could begin to be politically decent, Hiram Johnson will go into office, if elected, without one pledge given either by himself or by any person in authority in his campaign committee, not given to the people of California as a whole. This, of itself, is sufficient to make The Watchman proud of the new Republicanism.

Bell Cannot Say As Much

The Watchman absolves Mr. Bell from having personally committed himself to any interest, but he cannot with truth say as much of the committee that is supporting his candidacy. There are unmistakable indications that whatever goes to that mill is grist. Even though those who come bearing gifts be Greeks their gifts are accepted and their conditions met. This is because that, outside of those Democrats who follow the Democratic banner whoever carries it and wherever it goes, accessions to the Bell ranks are mainly from the spoils fraternity, and Mr. Bell himself has, in his speeches, at least temporized with that element. In speaking of the old Herrin machine Republicans he has taken pains to assure the public that they are all admirable gentlemen whom Mr. Johnson has affronted merely because they dared to differ in opinion from Mr. Johnson. Was, then, the issue of the emancipation of the Republican party from corporation control a mere difference of opinion? That issue was "bond or free," "Herrinism or Republicanism," a "free California or California a political dependency of the Southern Pacific Company." Those who stood for the old order did so either because they did not understand and appreciate the issue, because they smelt the fleshpots of Herrin or because, distrusting the ability of the Men of California to govern their state, they have felt that government by railroad was safer and better. This is no difference of opinion. It is a difference in constitution, spirit, loyalty to liberty and to the state. Mr. Bell has conceded, temporized and compromised until his position before the public is no longer unequivocal, no longer entirely free, and there are following in his train all of those untoward elements that tend to make self-respecting manhood apologetic for, if not ashamed of its species. With much that is good, he has all the bad elements in our political life marshaled under his banner.

Progressive Or Conservative

Frankly, there is a perfectly legitimate line of cleavage in the Republican party of this country, that between progressive and conservative. Mr. Bell is bidding for the support of conservative Republicans on the alleged ground that the progressive Republicans have stolen his thunder and are standing for the things that he stands for. Conservative Republicans ought to be able to resist that temptation to desert their party without putting forth great effort.

Mr. Bell is also trying to beguile the Taft Republicans into voting with him rather than with the Roosevelt wing of the Republican party. Frankly, the element in the Republican party that is in control in California is more with Roosevelt than with Taft, unless Taft is also now with Roosevelt, which recent events indicate that he is; but Mr. Bell will not say from the platform that he stands more with Taft than with Roosevelt. If he were to do so progressive Democrats would desert him in a body.

While the sincerity of Bell is not to be questioned, the logic of his sore needs is deflecting him from his true course more and more every day. He has shown that he yields to pressure. He has become conservative, wonderfully conservative, and as such has small claim upon the progressive element in his own party and, if there are more Roosevelt than Taft admirers in the Republican party of California, so are there more Roosevelt than Parker, Harmon or Bailey Democrats. Mr. Bell is being all things to all men to little purpose.

What Will They Do With the Money?

Report has it that a big corruption fund is being raised by the "interests" in the interest of Bell. Just how much truth there is in the report The Watchman will not undertake to say. Certain it is that a large fund could be raised, if it has not already been raised, to defeat Mr. Johnson just for the reason that Mr. Johnson has made himself odious to rascality by fighting it to the prison doors, but what can they do with the money?

California is not Rhode Island and it is not Delaware. Voters cannot be bought here at $2 per head. The most that can be done with corruption money is to pass it "down the line," into the pockets of macquereaux and tenderloin barkeepers, but Bell will get the greater part of that vote anyhow and why waste good money on bad eggs?

There are a few newspapers that might be bought, but most of these are in the Bell camp already or else are doing practically nothing for Johnson and the Republican ticket.

If any such fund is being raised it is under false pretenses. It is much easier to raise such a fund than to expend it effectively.

Little is to be feared from it. Such a fund was raised and expended during the primary election, but all to no purpose. The man upon whose candidacy it was chiefly expended was third in the race and has not been heard of since. Money has its limitation even in politics.

Where The Watchman Bolts the Ticket

This paper has been taken severely to task by standpat papers for bolting the Republican ticket at all, "inasmuch as it is the official organ of the Lincoln-Roosevelt wing of the Republican party," which it is not and never was, although it fought as hard as it could for the things that that wing of the Republican party stands for. Its one obligation is to observe entire good faith with its readers.

Frank Jordan: No patriotic man cognizant of the career of Frank Jordan can conscientiously vote for him for Secretary of State. He is a marvelous glad hand artist, but he is irresponsible and wholly unfit for an office that ranks, in importance, next to that of governor. His was a nomination not fit to be made and his election would prove a blow to the direct primary, a discredit to the Republican party and a danger to the state. Every Republican who loves party or state or anything but the glad hand should vote for the Democratic candidate for Secretary of State.

For eight years, nearly, Mr. W. W. Shannon has had charge of the state printing office and has failed to put it upon business principles and to do public printing at a reasonable cost. It is time to try some other man, and this paper favors giving Mr. Ravenscroft, the Democratic candidate, that chance.

In the Fourth congressional district this paper advises voters to support Walter MacArthur, not so much because it distrusts Julius Kahn, although he is on the wrong side of most public questions, but because of a recognition of the splendid manhood and abilities, integrity of character and independence of mind, of the Democratic candidate.

As The Watchman views it this is about all the bolting that Republicans have any call to do, except as to the judiciary in which the issue of party has no right to figure at all. There are other weak places in the ticket, but the Democratic ticket cannot strengthen them materially. It will strengthen the appellate bench not a little to elevate James V. Coffey to it, and whoever may be elected to a place on the supreme bench, William P. Lawlor should be elected to one of them. He has proven his steadfastness a thousand times during the last four years when a weaker man would have been as putty in the hands of the tremendous interests banded together to break down the law and drag justice in the mire. Remember that William P. Lawlor was the man whom the higher-ups could not swerve from the line of judicial duty. Vote for him for one of the two vacant places on the supreme bench.

Temerity Of William Kent

The same forces that are fighting Hiram Johnson are fighting just as hard to defeat William Kent for congress in the second district and for a similar reason. Mr. Kent had the temerity to take Francis J. Heney with him right into the enemy's country, for, it must not be forgotten, the Southern Pacific Company claims Sacramento for its own. Our advices are that all possible pressure is being brought to bear to throw the controllable vote of Sacramento to the Democratic candidate. There are other powerful interests in the Sacramento valley to whom Mr. Heney is a red flag of anarchy. They have felt the weight of his hand. They are reported to be out with scalping knives for Kent. Mr. Kent is a national figure. His defeat would be a calamity only second to that of Johnson, but he will not be defeated. His opponent can be given all the vote in that district that hates Heney or loves Herrin and still leave him with a comfortable majority, but Mr. Kent's majority should be made embarrassingly large. There is, however, this difference between Kent and Johnson: Mr. Kent knows the political game and can play it according to the rules, but he won't. He takes risks with his eyes open and jaws shut because his desire to be frank with the people of his district exceeds his desire to be elected. Mr. Johnson does not know the rules of the political game, does not care to and fights for what is right because that is the only thing he knows how to do. They are both Right Men and the nation is watching California to see what she does with them.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK--Continued

Kahn and The Fair A point insistently made for Julius Kahn is that if San Francisco wants the Panama-Pacific exposition it must return Mr. Kahn to congress. It may be observed that when congress reconvenes in December it will have seen a great light and will be in a correspondingly different frame of mind as to sources of influence. And, anyhow, the whole subject of the Panama exposition will have been disposed of before the fourth of next March when Mr. Kahn's present term will expire. There is ever so little in the exposition argument in favor of Kahn.

Another Message From Roosevelt The letter received this week by Judge Curtis Lindley from Theodore Roosevelt, and given to the public on Wednesday, makes it perfectly clear that the concern for the result in California is national. Roosevelt, William Allen White and Senator Cummins all say so and it is so. Leaving Mr. Bell, his personality and what he stands for entirely out of consideration, as properly may be done, still it is true as Colonel Roosevelt states that, "The result of the election in California is of national concern, not only because of what Mr. Johnson is, but for what he stands for. His nomination represented a signal triumph for Popular Rights, and it represented a signal recognition of popular duties. His election means the most effective possible blow against the domination of the special interests in politics, and his defeat will be hailed with joy by every man who believes in perpetuating in this country the rule of that combination of crooked politics and of crooked finance which is above all else dangerous to the future of this republic." This, of course, is true not because of Bell, but because of that element in our political life that is fighting with Bell for the defeat of Johnson and that New Republicanism for which he stands, a part of the New Nationalism for which Roosevelt is splendidly fighting. The friends of Roosevelt are the friends of Johnson in whatever political party they may be found.

Consider The Overturning Theodore Bell has said that, in the event of his election, he will constitute a majority of all boards and commissions of Democrats, but leave on them a minority of Republicans to the end that needless removals need not be made. The idea is a good one, but what will the Democratic majority in each such board or commission think of the idea with a hungry party piling upon their backs eager to get their feet in the trough? There is no more heinous sin than to make the defenseless wards of a state the victims of partisan politics. Four years ago The Watchman, although he detested the action of the Santa Cruz convention, and admired the fight that Bell was making, nevertheless could not bring himself to vote to overturn the institutions of the state by making a change of party. He voted for Gillett, clinging to the hope that, when elected, he would prove himself the free man that he declared himself to be and that he evidently was when he served in the state senate. Alas for that! He could not get away from the powers that made him governor, but at least he did not make the wards of the state greatly the victims of partisan hatred for Pardee and his appointees. He sinned grievously at Folsom and in some other instances, but in the main the helpless wards were not made the victims of putting out persons who had learned how in order to find places for persons who know nothing except that they want a job. This is a consideration that should appeal to voters strongly. Bell is more well-meaning than resolute, more kindly than courageous, and he will not be able to resist the pressure of the place hunters of his party.

Amendment Number One Just a few words on the constitutional amendments: Constitutional amendment number one should be voted for, not because it is perfect and not because its results can be fully foreknown, but because it is reasonably certain of doing what its friends expect of it and because it is based on sound principles: the separation of state from local taxation and taxation in proportion to ability to pay rather than in proportion to property values without relation to productive values. If faulty it can now be easily amended in obedience to an insistent and reasonable public demand whereas, under the two-thirds rule, it cannot be injuriously amended to suit special interests in opposition to public desires. A few bankers will fight the amendment on the general issue of "tight money" and "increased interest," but, as shown in this paper last week, there is nothing to their contention, for, if the whole increase of tax rate on banks, from six-tenths to one per cent, were transferred bodily to the borrower it would not cost him over a dollar on the thousand per year. As to local taxation on real estate the people would be given home rule with the result, this paper ventures to hope, that, finally, improvements will be exempt from taxation and a part of the increment that is earned by all may be taken for the benefit of all rather than continue to mulct enterprise by taxing the man who makes improvements to the advantage of his neighbor who only speculates. Vote for Amendment Number One.

The Bankers' Way Of Reaching the People The bankers who are opposing Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 1 have introduced a new method into politics. They evidently want to disprove the idea of the editor of The California Weekly that they have no sense of humor for the new method is worthy of a place in Alice in Wonderland, if anything so prosaic as taxes ever entered Alice's mind.

The new method is this. They have employed an advertising agent to write up and circulate literature against the amendment. The poor fellow who has the contract is in a terrible quandary. In the first place his whole habit of mind is to "boost" and now he is required to "knock." A psychologist once wore eyeglasses that turned everything upside down, but after a few days he found himself quite at home in his upside down world. Perhaps the same thing will happen to the advertising agent's mind and after this ordeal is over he will be writing "ads" like these: "Udontneeda Biscuit." "Good morning! I hope you have not used Pear's soap." "Throw Postum to the dogs. There's no reason."

In the second place he knows nothing about the amendment and less even about taxation in general or about California taxation in particular. That bothers him less, for when he gets a new ware to advertise he usually goes to the factory to find out about it. So in this case force of habit carried him to the commission to learn about the amendment. Unfortunately the commission is ill supplied with objections, knowing none that are valid. So with the kindest intentions in the world to be helpful, the commission finds itself in the same position a manufacturer would be in if called upon to supply reasons why people should not use his wares.

There is a pleasing naivete about the whole proceeding.

San Diego Harbor Bonds It is proposed that bonds be issued in the sum of $1,500,000 for the construction of a sea wall, piers, a belt line of railroad and other improvements at San Diego harbor. All the harbor facilities there are now at San Diego are in private hands and a great part of this expenditure would result in private advantage, and yet the harbor needs the expenditure. It is proposed that a state wharf be constructed to compete with the private wharves already in service, which is not in accordance with sound policy. The state should own all or none, or at least have control of wharfing charges over all, or else the city of San Diego should have full control in lieu of the state. This is a problem that must somehow be worked out to a reasonable basis and the sooner the better. It is proposed that the interest on these bonds be met from the harbor revenues, but there are no harbor revenues to speak of and what there are are consumed by local salaries. From October 1st, 1906, until September 30, 1908, the total receipts at San Diego harbor were $10,370.05, and the disbursements, in salaries, office rent, etc., amounted to $9,954.90, leaving a balance possible to be applied to interest on bonds of $415.15, which would not go far. To be sure the state bonds, if voted, are not to be sold until the San Diego Harbor Commission is of the opinion that the harbor dues will meet the obligation, but the obligation, if the bonds are sold, will be a valid one against the state whether so met or not. However, these improvements should be made as rapidly as business justifies their making and, if good faith is kept with the state, the state will not suffer injury through the voting of the bonds. Their voting will merely give the San Diego harbor board a credit to draw against as improvements are warranted and needed. Bad faith is the only risk. The Watchman will take that risk in his voting.

Gillett's Good Roads California needs good roads and the state should help to build them, but the Gillett good-roads proposition before the people should be entitled, "A Bonus to Joy Riding by Automobile," for that is the inspiration of the whole eighteen million dollar expenditure. It should be voted down for the following reasons:

The state should not build, but should help build, good roads. The only roads the state should build outright are through the mountains where there is no one to help build them. Elsewhere the state, the county and the neighborhood should join in building roads, share and share alike or something like it.

The roads that are wanted for economic reasons mainly lead from the farms to the nearest railway station, not trunk lines up one side of the state and down the middle. They need to be built where the hauling is to be done.

We do not yet know how to build roads as fast as the automobiles can unbuild them. Years should be devoted to experimentation on sample miles of road under all sorts of conditions, and a credit of half a million dollars to carry on that kind of work would fit present requirements.

The state engineering department, as now equipped, is unfit to undertake this job and the proposed amendment places the whole responsibility practically in the hands of that department, a department that has scarcely erected a single state building within the appropriation made for it.

It is stipulated in the amendment that San Francisco city and county shall pay no part of this tax because no part of the state roads will be built in such city and county, and yet the automobile trade, for whose benefit the proposition is being pushed, is mainly centered in San Francisco. There are other counties in which not a mile of these roads will be built. Why are they not also exempt? There is no more reason why San Francisco should be exempt from this road burden than why Los Angeles or Oakland, Berkeley or San Jose, should be exempt.

The proposal as it is will work an injustice to such counties as Los Angeles and San Joaquin that have already voted bonds to build roads.

The Watchman is a believer in good roads and in the state helping to build them, but under a more intelligent, just and well ordered plan than that proposed by Governor Gillett to the people of California. California needs a Department of Highways with a skilled engineer at its head to work out a plan of co-operative endeavor with counties and communities whereby the problem of road building may first be solved. Vote against Assembly Bill 990, and vote hard.

The Fair Amendments While this paper does not believe that San Francisco should be the Panama-Pacific exposition half as badly as it thinks it does, it thinks that it wants it and that is almost the same as though it really wanted it. Ten years from now everybody will be able to see that some other course would have been wiser. Nevertheless, that is the business of San Francisco and San Francisco should be permitted to do exactly what it thinks that it wants to do and the state should be governed, so far as Amendment Thirty-three is concerned, by San Francisco's desires. So far as Senate Amendment Fifty-two is concerned, the one that permits the state to contribute $5,000,000 to the enterprise—the state can richly afford to do that. So far as the policy of San Francisco's end of the financing is concerned there is room for two opinions, but not so with the state. The holding of such a fair will be worth many times $5,000,000 to California. Vote yes on both of those counts.

Amendment No. Eleven This amendment is to abolish the taxation of mortgages altogether. It is not necessary and not sound. Lenders and borrowers now have freedom of contract to determine which of them shall pay the taxes and that is going far enough. The mortgage interest is a property interest and should be assessed as such. Moreover, by the unskillful drawing of this amendment it is likely that it would be of no effect and, if so, its attempted application would produce only confusion and dissatisfaction. Vote against Amendment Eleven.

Amendment Thirty-six This amendment, if adopted, will enable judges to call in a judge from another county to help them if they get behind-hand with their dockets while they go ahead in their own court with their regular work. That is, another department may be added from time to time as needed by using some of the judges from other counties who are not busy. This is a common sense proposition and will incur little or no extra cost and may facilitate the administration of justice. It is also proposed that, where judicial work cannot be advanced in this way, a judge pro tempore (for the time being) may be selected by litigants themselves by agreement. Such a judge, so selected, will have all the powers of a judge in that particular case, but no other. The device has worked well in other states and probably will in California. This amendment should be supported.

Amendment No. Thirty-eight This amendment is designed to make the division of counties more difficult. It provides that the creation of a new county shall not reduce the population of the old county below 20,000 and that the new county itself must have at least 8,000. The figures, as the constitution now stands, are 8,000 and 5,000 instead of 20,000 and 8,000, as in this amendment proposed. With the increase in electric and other transportation, and the growth of the automobile traffic, the need for new counties will grow less and less from year to year. The limitations fixed in this amendment are preferable to those in the constitution as it now stands. Vote for it.

Amendment No. Forty-four This amendment proposes to classify cities and towns with reference to the banking business, the purpose being to require banks in large towns to have large capital and permitting banks with small capital only in small towns. Every large town is little more than a collection of small towns with little trade centers in each district. Each such trade center has a grocery, a branch postoffice, a general store, shoe shop, etc., about what would be found in a small town and, although within the corporate limits of a larger city, each one has a separate name such as North Berkeley, or South Berkeley, Fruitvale or Richmond. Now the manifest purpose of this amendment is to prevent such local centers having a bank. No doubt swarms of little banks would be harder for the state banking department to watch than a few big institutions, and yet the big institutions might have branches at these local trading centers if public convenience requires.

The Watchman has no very strong convictions as to this amendment, but is loth to limit enterprise needlessly. If a small bank can be watched in a small town a small bank can also be watched in a small subdivision of a large town, and The Watchman is inclined, on general principles, to vote no on this amendment.

Amendment Fourteen This amendment preserves the right of the citizen to fish, at lawful times, from any public lands or lands sold by the state. As with the older countries of Europe, so with us, we are shutting the common people away from participation in the bounties and pleasures of nature and confining them all to the favors of that privilege which the possession of money brings. We should like this amendment better if it went further and prevented the prohibition of fishing in the public streams from any banks, public or private, stipulating only that damage inflicted on property fished from should be paid for. The idea of the crime of "poaching" is repugnant to The Watchman's sensibilities. He will vote "yes" on amendment fourteen.

Those Harbor Improvements The measure before the people authorizing the State Harbor Commission to issue $9,000,000 for the improvement of the harbor facilities for San Francisco should carry. These bonds will be sold in such lots as are required from time to time to meet the cost of improvements as required and are a lien upon the harbor revenues and are not likely to be a tax upon property in any other way than upon commerce. It were probably better to have the state relinquish the harbor control to San Francisco, but in that case the funds for harbor development would have to be raised in the same way, except that the city would vote them instead of the state, but the bonds would still be a lien upon the harbor charges and not upon the property. The Watchman will vote for these bonds.

The India Basin Act This measure proposes that $1,000,000 be voted in bonds, also a lien upon the harbor revenues, for the purchase of sixty-three blocks of water-covered land in San Francisco harbor to be retrieved from private control and returned to

(Concluded on Page 782)

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Luxor Oil Company, a corporation. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Southeast ¼ of Section 22, Township 32, Range 24, County of Kern, California.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 4th day of October, A. D. 1910, an assessment (No. 1) of two cents ($.02) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the above named corporation, payable in U. S. gold coin on Monday, the 10th day of October, A. D. 1910, at the hour of 10 o'clock A. M. of the said day, to H. F. Gordon, the Secretary of the said corporation, at the office of the said corporation on the ground floor or first floor of the building known and designated as No. 219, Sansome Street, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Monday, the 14th day of November, A. D. 1910, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on Wednesday, the 7th day of December, A. D. 1910, at 10 o'clock A. M. of the said day, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

H. F. GORDON,
Secretary of Luxor Oil Company,
a corporation.

Location of office: 219 Sansome Street, San Francisco, California.

The California Weekly
IS PRINTED BY
Donaldson & Moir
PRINTERS
330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

Parcells Safe Co.
SOLE AGENTS
DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

Town and Country

THE city and the country are linked together by Bell Telephone service.

The city man when away can keep in touch with his office and business interests.

In a like manner, the man from the country who is visiting in the city, can telephone his home and find out how things are.

This is possible all over the country because Bell Telephone service is universal.

THE PACIFIC TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO.

A WATER-FRONT EXPOSITION

A DISCUSSION OF SENATOR NEWLANDS' ORIGINAL AND STRIKING PLAN

By GEORGE E. BURLINGAME

Senator Francis G. Newlands is the author of an idea which, for originality and unconventionality, for length, breadth and general boldness of design is fitted to declare that there is, at least in the conception of exposition making, something strikingly new under the sun.

Senator Newlands' idea is more than a departure from the beaten track, it is a straight cut across lots, a sweeping defiance to string fences and keep-off-the-grass signs. He has given to the San Francisco bay community a conception for the Panama-Pacific exposition that outruns by a dozen laps the best that the "World's-Fair" fraternity have heretofore approached in accomplishment.

Quoting from a talk before the members of the San Francisco chapter of the American Institute of Architects at a recent meeting, a resume of which appears in the September issue of the "Architect and Engineer of California":

Senator Newlands' Plan

"Would it not be well," he said, "to consider, with the aid of competent experts, the advisability of a water-front exposition, embracing the development of the water side of East street from Telegraph hill to Rincon hill, including those hills, and if necessary, lands adjacent thereto and possibly Yerba Buena island, in such a way as to promote the utilitarian purposes of commerce and at the same time permanently secure attractiveness of appearance?"

A Waterfront Esplanade

"In forming a conception of such a development," Mr. Newlands continued, "it will be necessary to blot out of mind the ugliness of the present waterfront and imagine it, in connection with Telegraph and Rincon hills, transformed by the genius of the best architects and engineers, in such a way as to combine utility with beauty. The space between the two hills is a little over a mile. On this space buildings resembling the Ferry building could be put up, connected with each other by an elevated esplanade on the water side, for the use of automobiles, carriages and pedestrians, forming the approach to the second story of these buildings, which would be used for exposition purposes, the ground floor being utilized for the present commercial purposes. This esplanade could cross East street at Telegraph and Rincon hills, and on portions of these hills, which would be purchased or condemned, there could be an extensive development, representing the best work of architects and engineers and artists, in the form of exposition buildings, terraces, waterfalls, electric fountains and statuary. The esplanade would be one of the most effective things in the city, affording convenient views of the incomparable scenery of the bay, islands, ocean and mountains, and also of the great commercial activities of shipping and commerce at the wharves.

Railroad Termini at Goat Island

"If the railroad companies could co-operate with the exposition company the probable result would be the erection of a beautiful terminal passenger station by the Southern Pacific Railroad company opposite the ferry, the approach to which from Third and Townsend, it is said, the railroad company has already secured. Then, in addition, with the consent of the federal government, arrangements could probably be made with the railroads and the government for a combined development on Yerba Buena island, which would embrace the existing naval training school, any proposed fortifications, the partial leveling of the island at the expense of the railroads and the construction of a beautiful terminal passenger station, and an extensive development for exposition. * * * The crossing, then, on the ferry would not take more than three or four minutes, and the development of the water front and of Yerba Buena island would make a water scene of almost Venetian beauty."

In the conception of an exposition, of all the elements that enter in for consideration the first is the visitor.

From the standpoint of the visitor, an exposition is, in its broader meaning, first of all an educational undertaking. It is an effort at uplift, toward a clearer visioned and a broader humanity. Its success depends upon the instructive good one can take away with him. It is one thing to have an exposition interesting, it is another to have it interestingly instructive. It is one thing to be handsomely entertained, it is quite another to find entertainment that holds a deeper meaning than the passing show. You may take a piece of Chinese carving and observe it for an hour, following its lines over and under, wondering at the intricacy of its design and the skill and labor of its execution. But though you take away with you a vivid remembrance of the carving in all its details you have only a remembrance. Now go out and walk for an hour along the beach when the moon is full and the surf is pounding and white flecks of foam jump up and scurry across your path. Then go home and go to bed. Though you have seen only the silvery surf and heard its monotonous hammering and felt only the wind of heaven blowing on your face the blood is leaping through your veins and you are a new man with a new grip, a bigger vision, a stronger purpose and an increased capacity to face the future.

Now this is incidental but it has a point, a point that is practical and applicable to the case in hand. We have something worth while to exhibit and something worth while to see and go home and think about. Is it worth while to show advantageously what we have or must we manufacture something out of the genius of our minds and display it out in the back yard?

The Bay San Francisco's Distinctive Feature

That distinctive feature of which we alone, of all the world, can boast is San Francisco bay. This is the excuse for San Francisco, it is the explanation of the community. Its proportions are magnificent, its islands and inlets, its shores bordered with hills that catch the light and gather the shadows and suggest the valleys and forests beyond—this bay, as a thing of impressive beauty is our first and greatest show place.

But the bay is more than a thing of great natural beauty, it is a harbor. It signifies trade. It represents commercial capacity. With its one hundred miles of waterfront, its possible four hundred and seventy miles of berth room—sufficient to handle twenty times the present commerce of London and to accommodate a population of fifty millions of people—this bay stands for investment opportunity and net returns on dollars.

Adjunct to the bay and of equal interest to the visitor are its ships and shipping. To one there is a poem in every mast, a romance in every weather-beaten hulk. To another every craft, from scow to steamer, signifies a link in the chain that binds the world together in commercial fraternity.

An Exhibit of Commerce

The bay, its shores and its shipping, its craft and its commerce, are the best we have to show at any time. But at this time, if there is any significance in this exposition, if it is to be the dedication of the greatest oceanic commercial undertaking in the greatest of all commercial ages, then double interest and significance lends itself to the bay and its activities.

We can do no better than stop right here and think over the meaning of this exposition and whether its meaning should be emphasized. Of all the great multitudes of people who have attended any exposition of recent years the percentage of those who take away with them a clear idea of its specific meaning (if, indeed, it has had any) is negligible. Now this is not as it should be. An exposition should have a clear and unmistakable significance. Our failing is that we assume that this is the last chance for the world to see and that, therefore, all things must be crowded upon its vision. This is an error not only from the standpoint of the good the visitor gets out of the fair but also from the standpoint of his enjoyment of it.

We are moving in the direction of good sense in many things: We no longer decorate our houses with a separate ornament for each square foot of exposed surface, and it is no longer good taste to pile our mantles and stein shelves with bric-a-brac, or to fill up our yards and gardens with every kind of shrub, tree, flower and vine. We carry a single harmony of decoration and furnishing through our entire house, and we find in it restfulness and comfort that are not to be had in distracting heterogeneity. We would not expect a man to take a full college course in a week and come away with a clear idea of any single truth propounded. We would certainly not turn loose upon him a dozen professors all shouting their formulas at once in artistic pandemonium and expect him to assimilate a very wide range of fundamental facts. With our expositions, however, we set our visitors down in the midst of detail, some of which fairly shrieks for attention, and the result follows naturally that their first impression is of a gorgeous confusion. This impression is promptly followed by brain fatigue, then nervous collapse and then the intense desire to go somewhere quick and rest and recuperate.

There should be a single dominating feature to this exposition, the feeling of its character should cling to a man everywhere he goes. And whether he is here for an hour or for a month he should go away with the indelible impress of its meaning upon his mind. In holding the exposition upon her waterfront San Francisco achieves in one master stroke this character and meaning which she must otherwise secure imperfectly, if at all, only with effort and sacrifice.

More Funds Available

Mr. Newlands points out that for the execution of a waterfront exposition far more funds would be available than for any other plan. The Harbor Commission's issue of $9,000,000 of bonds (which is to be submitted for approval at the coming election) is one item. And it may be assumed without unreasonable exaggeration that this plan would secure twice the support of any other plan, especially if we count the substantial improvements that this plan will inspire in the immediate neighborhood. It is quite probable, as Mr. Newlands asserts, that the Southern Pacific would be led to put up a magnificent terminal station opposite the ferry. This, with the other expenditures that would be induced along the west side of East street, would add a very material sum to the aggregate that would go to make up the exposition.

There is no question that, from the standpoint of the results that large expenditure makes possible, this plan is clearly superior, and this if we leave out the millions represented by shipping and craft that will enter quite as essentially into the plan as buildings and improvements.

And it cannot be gainsaid that the ships and shipping will take the place in interest of exhibits that otherwise must be provided at great outlay. In fact, it is hard to think of how much money it would take to substitute for these a feature of equal interest. The opportunity to observe the goings and comings, the takings and bringings, the cranes, hoists, trucks, the bags, boxes, crates, up to the shoutings that make up the daily activities of a great commercial metropolis; the opportunity to view the entire teeming, hurrying, busy, vital, world-moving machinery that grinds out each day its generous quota of economic history, not shown by a mere photograph or model, nor by a moving picture imitation nor even by a high class vaudeville reproduction, but by the fire and melting pot, hammer and tongs reality whose products are actually on their way to the final completed structure that goes to make up your own world and your own most intimate interests in it—this opportunity is not to be compared with what human genius and limited expenditure might be able to substitute, certainly it is not to be compared to the stereotyped, exaggerated, unnatural exhibits typical of expositions.

Permanent Improvement of Waterfront

But the question does not stop there. Whatever we may think or whatever we may do we have the waterfront to consider, and we must consider it whether we like it or not. Like a scar on the face, we cannot hide it if we are to be seen at all. It is the first thing that greets the visitor on his arrival by way of the canal, it is the last to which he bids good-bye on his return overland. Are we willing that those two psychological moments that enter so largely into the estimate of us in the eyes of the world—the first and the last impressions—shall come from the present waterfront?

We who are familiar with the waterfront take it as a matter of course, as we do any other familiar monstrous physical deformity. We have long since ceased to "endure," we have passed through the stage of "pity" and have entered upon complacent, self-satisfied "embrace" with apparently little regret. It would do us good, however, to look again with a new vision and see the picture the waterfront does make to the unfamiliar eye. Ragged, unkempt, dirty, primitive, ephemeral, ugly—something, surely, will have to be done to the front yard.

Contrast this condition with what a waterfront exposition makes possible—an imposing facade of substantial, ornate structures girded with a spacious boulevard arrayed in tropic splendor in the daytime and with a myriad of reflecting lights at night, flanked by parks sloping toward the bay, so as to display grounds and buildings, terraces and waterfalls. Contrast the impression one condition must bring and leave with the impression the other will bring and leave, and you have a suggestion of the opportunity that is hammering away on the sleepy gates of the city.

Exhibiting the Reconstructed City

Now of second importance and interest to the world must stand the reconstructed city. The spectacular achievement of this phoenix of the Golden Gate is the first thing the name "San Francisco" suggests to the world. To fail to give proper prominence to the risen city is to take the world to the back of the grand stand and invite it to peek through a knot hole at the side show.

A waterfront exposition is a down-town exposition. It is through the business thoroughfares that the traffic will be led, it is by the established business houses that the crowds will be cared for. This will not only please our visitors, it will protect them from the irresponsible riff-raff of hangers-on, the parasites and bunco element that commonly infest the out-districts of expositions.

These things, the bay and the new city are the unique, the exclusive attractions that San Francisco can offer. Other things are incidental. Let these be placed at their best, arrayed and embellished and emphasized and no exhibition heretofore undertaken will compare in real magnificence and emphatic universal interest with such an exposition.

More Convenient For Visitors

It is not, however, wholly a question of what he will see that interests the visitor. The question of how he will be taken care of is also of serious interest. Convenience and comfort and reasonable charges enter quite as fully into his enjoyment as the merit of the display. There is, perhaps, hardly a person who has visited the great fairs of the past who does not hold a more vivid recollection of the overtaxed street-cars, the pushing, crowding and stifling of their coming and going, of poor hotel service and high expenses, than of any other feature of the exposition. We can almost entirely avoid this. We can permit our visitors to take away with them only pleasant memories. From the waterfront the entire resources of the bay community are placed at the disposal of our guests. It is impossible to conceive of a more perfect arrangement for handling the crowds comfortably and without friction than this.

No element could lend greater certainty of the financial success of the undertaking than the assurance to the world that the transportation difficulties so common to expositions had been eliminated and that ample accommodations were available to provide the best of service and to keep the cost down to normal.

Permanent Advantage to City

The good that will accrue to the city and the entire bay community from a central, down-town, waterfront exposition whose expenditures and developments are largely permanent are so obvious that attention need hardly be called to them. We have no right to feel that a building that is to be looked at may serve no other purpose and must, therefore, be promptly torn down. Permanent contact with the beautiful is not too exquisite

HONOLULU

And the Volcano

THE TRIP MOST COMPELLING and worth while, excelling all others for grandeur, beauty and pleasure. And this splendid trip can be made in two weeks and a day by sailing on S. S. SIERRA (10,000 tons displacement). The Volcano of Kilauea, the largest in the world, is tremendously active just now, and a few quick dispatch trips have been arranged. Never before has it been possible to make this desirable trip with such speed and comfort, and the price is low, $110, first class, to Honolulu and back, and $41 for side trip from Honolulu to volcano, including rail and auto to Kilauea; hotel at Hilo, also Volcano House. No other trip compares with this. Be sure to visit the islands, and DO IT NOW, while the volcano is active. S. S. SIERRA sails Oct. 22, Nov. 12, Dec. 3. Write or wire.

OCEANIC S. S. CO.

673 Market Street, San Francisco.

John O'Donnell D. E. Alexander

ALEXANDER & O'DONNELL

ATTORNEYS AT LAW

Tels.: Sunset Douglas 1538; Home J 1508
845 Pacific Bldg., Market and Fourth Sts.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD
The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed	$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital	300,000.00
Surplus	400,000.00
Profits	45,000.00

DIRECTORS—James D. Phelan, President; John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt, Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R. D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.

Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy.
Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

Would you like to know more about the work we are doing in the way of preparing for, and placing young men in, good positions in the great busy new San Francisco?

SAN FRANCISCO
BUSINESS COLLEGE
MARKET, POWELL
& EDDY STS. S.F.
WRITE FOR CATALOGUE

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial
(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)
526 CALIFORNIA ST., San Francisco, Cal.

Guaranteed Capital	$1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash	1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds	1,555,093.05
Deposits June 30th, 1910	40,384,727.21
Total Assets	43,108,907.82

Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co's. Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President and Manager, George Tourny; Third Vice-President, J. W. Van Bergen; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, A. H. Muller; Assistant Secretaries, G. J. O. Folte and Wm. D. Newhouse; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, George Tourny, J. W. Van Bergen, Ign. Steinhart, I. N. Walter, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Streets. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Heyer, Manager.

Entrance to the First National Bank

THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK

POST & MONTGOMERY

Checking Accounts Cordially Invited.

CAPITAL	$3,000,000.00
SURPLUS and PROFITS	1,900,000.00

FIRST FEDERAL TRUST COMPANY

POST & MONTGOMERY

CAPITAL	$1,500,000.00
---------------	----------------

3½% per annum on deposits.

ARMOR PLATE SAFE DEPOSIT VAULTS

MR. BREEF looked out of the window beside his desk in Nassau street and stared abstractedly at the towering skyscrapers across that very narrow thoroughfare which runs from City Hall Park to Wall street. It was rare indeed that Mr. Breef allowed himself the luxury of abstraction, he was a very busy man in his humble way, and he felt, with unusual keenness, the prickings of conscience that beset the faithful laborer who wishes to feel worthy of his hire.

And Mr. Breef was a hired man. He was a law clerk for the old and honored firm of Capp, Calf & Coke—the "three C's," they were called in "the street"—and he had been a law clerk or an amanuensis or a messenger for them almost since he could first remember. He had "gone with the firm" as a lad, and he had been loyal to the firm, and the firm had graciously recognized this loyalty as the years rolled by, recognized it by testing it with added and greater responsibilities and by additions, in much smaller ratio and very much more gradually, to his salary.

But of this inequality between the increment of duties and the increment of reward, Mr. Breef had not complained to the firm. In fact, Mr. Breef felt, very acutely and very humbly, his own deficiencies. He had made one memorable failure during his connection with the firm. That failure was on the occasion of his first—and last—appearance in court as the representative of Capp, Calf & Coke. On that occasion he had risen to address the court, had blushed, stammered, feebly mumbled an incoherent speech, and sat down, completely discomfited and the object of the cheerful mirth of the entire room. The attorney for the opposing side, a practical and polished barrister, had made good use of Mr. Breef's discomfiture, had mimicked it to the life in his reply and had added some pertinent and timely satire on the obvious abilities of counsel for the plaintiff. The result was a verdict that lost the case, Capp, Calf & Coke lost a handsome fee and a good client, and Mr. Breef retired again to the welcome obscurity of "inside work," never again to emerge.

And today, when Mr. Breef indulged in his luxury of a few moments of abstraction, he found it not so much of a luxury as a hazy and reminiscent pain. He recalled, with startling clearness and acute discomfort, the details of that memorable courtroom fiasco. He felt, quite properly, the ignominy of it, and, for the thousandth time in his career, felt the justice of the decision of the firm to keep him in a place where he could do no damage and be obscurely useful.

But Mr. Breef really did himself an injustice. He had not that rough and ready egotism that saves its possessor endless pain and innumerable heartaches, that carelessly overlooks its own deficiencies and so leaves itself confident and resilient to face new adventures for new gains. Such a nature, had Mr. Breef possessed it, would have reminded him of his very great services to the firm, of that demurrer, for instance, in the Hay will case, which Capp himself declared had solved a hopeless riddle and had saved the firm's reputation and made the firm a great fee. Such a nature would have reminded him of his record of thirty years in the office, unbroken by a day of absence or by a serious blunder save the unforgettable court episode.

But, as we have said, Mr. Breef did not possess this fortunate nature, and in consequence he looked upon his life, in his moment of abstraction, much as he looked upon the thronging narrow canyon of a street outside, darkened by a heavy shadow nearly all day, lightened by the gleam of the sun only for a brief few minutes in the twenty-four hours, over-towered and made insignificant by the heights that stretched above.

As Mr. Breef ran his hands through his hair, ruminating, he noticed that it was growing thin. He had noticed the same thing in his glass several times of late, but today it touched him with a new and more melancholy sadness. He was growing old. Growing old and with little to look back upon, so he reflected, with the pride of achievement.

The street, too, which he looked out upon, gave him a chill at the heart. Here by this window he had sat for thirty years, and in those years few things had remained as stable

A PERSON OF NO CON- SEQUENCE

BY

E. FRENCH STROTHER

as he. Old faces had gone, new ones had replaced them, and these, in turn, had been replaced by others. The restaurant he had frequented for twenty years, and to which he had become attached, as old bachelors do who have a particular chair at a particular table waited on by a particular waiter—this restaurant was gone these ten years, and new owners, new waiters, new faces were seen in its successor.

The buildings, too, had changed. The old, dingy, four-storied brick affairs, with their creaking staircases, had given way to monstrous towers of steel and stone, stretching toward heaven and shutting heaven's light and air out of the structure in which he sat. The shadows that fell across the narrow alley of a street outside fell also across the spirit of Mr. Breef, as he gazed across Nassau.

Suddenly Mr. Breef pulled himself together and broke his reverie. Tut! tut! Here is work to do, and Breef day-dreaming! It won't do. He turned to the pile of papers before him. But as he turned he felt a sharp pain in his chest, and a dull aching at his temples. Ill? Nonsense. Had not Breef a record of thirty years unbroken by illness? A touch of liver, soon to be forgotten. He attacked the pile of papers in his usual methodical way.

But as the afternoon wore on, the pains increased. They interfered sadly with his work. At three o'clock he left his desk and walked into the room where sat Mr. Capp, the great Capp, senior member of the firm. He steadied himself by holding the top of Mr. Capp's desk as he stood, waiting for the firm to look up. At length Mr. Capp glanced up and spoke:

"Well, Mr. Breef, what is it?"

"I'm sorry, sir," Mr. Breef said, uneasily, "but I am ill. I'm afraid I'm very ill, Mr. Capp. And if you say so, I will go early to-day and see a doctor."

Mr. Capp frowned his most imposing courtroom frown.

"Um-m," he replied. "That's bad, Mr. Breef, very bad. You know we are late on that matter of the Howard estate, and I had hoped, sir, I had hoped—"

"I know," replied Breef, "and I would have had it ready by five. But I really believe, sir—"

What Mr. Breef really believed will never be known. What Mr. Breef did was to crumple into a very undignified heap on the floor beside Mr. Capp's desk, and it was ten minutes later that he returned to his senses sufficiently to recognize where he was, and by that time he had forgotten what he had started to say he believed. And ten minutes later, Mr. Breef was in a cab, which the office boy called, on his way to his lodgings, after receiving a parting blessing from Mr. Capp, who had said: "Get well as soon as you can, Mr. Breef. That Howard matter, you know."

No one had offered to go in the cab to see that he got safely home, excepting the young man who assisted him at his desk, and Mr. Capp had shaken his head and whispered to him:

"I shall need you at once, Mr. Jones. At once."

So Mr. Breef took his first cab ride in years under distressing conditions of mind and of body, and with little to while away the tedium of it. For the way was a long one. It lay far north to Harlem. Oddly enough, no one from Capp, Calf & Coke would have known where to direct the driver had Mr. Breef's senses not come back to him. Nobody in the firm's office had ever visited his lodgings, and Mr. Breef was so regular that they had never occasion even to have a memorandum of his address. So Mr. Breef rode home, jolting and swinging and decidedly dizzy, over a route no one could have followed without searching for records not known in the office of Capp, Calf & Coke.

When Mr. Breef had been duly bundled off Mr. Capp called Mr. Jones in, and after laying out the course of investigation in the matter of Howard, commissioned Mr. Jones to follow it quickly to its conclusion. And Mr. Jones had hesitated as he left Mr. Capp's office and remarked, with some effort:

"I hope Mr. Breef's illness won't be serious. He is such a valuable man, and so loyal."

And Mr. Capp had laid down his pen and laughed shortly and replied:

"Lord, Lord, Mr. Jones, don't worry. Breef will take care of himself. Valuable? Loyal? Certainly. Mr. Jones, else why is he paid? Useful, in his way, is Mr. Breef, certainly. But a person of no consequence. Thirty years, and a law clerk. I hope better of you, Mr. Jones."

And Mr. Jones had gone to his desk with an odd sensation that wasn't exactly like ice to his spine, nor exactly like fire to his brain, but reminded him a little of both. He followed the matter of Howard rapidly to its close, and was complimented by Mr. Capp, and returned to his desk. Here he paused and looked over at Mr. Breef's desk. It lay in unwonted confusion. Without knowing why, Mr. Jones stepped across and proceeded to arrange it in order, stowing the papers into their accustomed neat piles and drawing down the roll top.

As he laid some papers away his eye caught the name of J. Breef, written in script across the bottom of one sheet. After it was an address, a number on 120th street. Unconsciously Mr. Jones caught that number and fixed it in his mind. He never forgot it, as one sometimes does not forget the most trivial of things.

Three days later Mr. Capp called in Mr. Jones.

"Mr. Jones," he began, "I cannot understand Mr. Breef. He has been absent for three days, and has not sent us word. This is very unusual, I may say, reprehensible. We are busy and Mr. Breef is needed here. Kindly make inquiries, and send word that he must return to the office at once, Mr. Jones, at once."

And Mr. Jones, without thinking why, put on his hat and started uptown himself to make his inquiries in person. He soon found the address he had read after Mr. Breef's name, and on the door of the apartment he found Mr. Breef's card. And within the apartment he found Mr. Breef, lying comfortably in bed, with his hands folded primly across his breast and his eyes carefully closed, humbly and unmistakably dead. And beside Mr. Breef's bed he found a poor preacher from a neighboring church, and a shabby little old doctor, and the strangest assortment of other people he had ever seen together. There were several children, and some old men and women a number of degrees more shabby than the little old doctor, and a little yellow cur of a dog that tried weakly to mount the bedside and lick the hands primly folded on Mr. Breef's breast. And in the eyes of all were tears of unmistakably genuine grief, and from more than one throat Mr. Jones heard undoubtedly heartfelt sobs. And from the lips of the preacher and doctor Mr. Jones heard whispered stories of years spent in labors of love, of quiet charity bestowed, of sickness visited, of sorrows shared, by that person of no particular consequence, J. Breef, law clerk.

I am not at liberty to say what Mr. Jones handed the preacher, nor what it was that he said. But I may relate a curious circumstance that followed Mr. Jones's return to the office of Capp, Calf & Coke. After entering the presence of the great Mr. Capp, and explaining briefly that Mr. Breef would not return to the office for the very good reason that Mr. Breef was dead, and after hearing Mr. Capp's murmured, "Dear! dear! Too bad! And we are so busy," Mr. Jones was surprised to hear the great Mr. Capp address him as follows:

"Well, we must do something to bridge the rift. You know, Mr. Jones, we expect a good deal of you, and as a beginning I shall ask you to take Mr. Breef's desk, at Mr. Breef's salary, and master that work. As for the future, we shall see, Mr. Jones, what we shall see."

And Mr. Capp, in turn, was extremely surprised, for Mr. Jones, after looking thoughtfully at the floor for full half a minute, looked at him with an odd, half abashed look on his face, and replied:

"Thank you, Mr. Capp, but I'm afraid I can't do it. I have about decided to make a change. And if it's convenient, I'd like to resign my connection today, because tomorrow I want to attend the funeral of a man I knew, a—a person of no particular consequence."

And Mr. Capp never did imagine why so promising a fellow as Jones should leave the old and honored firm of Capp, Calf & Coke to go with the little firm of Coach & Slow. It never even occurred to him to wonder what funeral Mr. Jones was going to attend, though he did think it odd that Mr. Jones gave that as a reason for leaving the office.

("A Waterfront Exposition"—Continued)

to bear! Nor may we regard it a breach of hospitality to spend money in the entertainment of our guests in such a way that it will serve in the entertainment of future guests and in our own permanent uplift. We are duty bound to make the most of every dollar contributed. The ultimate good of the community is of first and most serious consideration. The point is not merely to get people here, take what they have and hurry them away blindfolded. What we want to do is to interest the world in our resources, we want them to stay here, invest their money here, and help us to develop the untouched, unparalleled resources that lie at our hands, and we must work to that end.

We must look upon this exposition as something more than a fiesta, a side show, an opportunity for the world to spend some of its pleasure seeking cash among us. We must look upon it as a renaissance to a broader and fuller acquittal, during the years to follow, of our obligations. Let us frankly acknowledge our deficiencies. We know our docks are primitive, we know our shipping is badly handled, we know that we are divided and that between us and the achievements that are possible there stand jealousy and disunity and the lack of a clear-cut purpose and persistence and vigor of action. Let us acknowledge these things and get into step. The time is past when sectional jealousies and dog-in-the-manger policies can be permitted to dominate, when half-hearted support, not because we do not profit much but because the other fellow profits more, can be tolerated. The future of the entire community demands that all men, all interests and all sections should enlist their enthusiastic boost to a common enterprise. We are at heart one community, with one ambition and purpose, to give San Francisco bay the heritage that is hers by nature, commercial supremacy of the west. Any activity that will promote this in the main is a contribution to the entire community. The fair offers a chance to get every shoulder to the same side of the wheel for once and there is no location that could inspire a uniform lift with all the enthusiasm of selfish interest so perfectly as the waterfront. Down-town San Francisco, Oakland, Berkeley, Alameda, the Marin county towns, every one must see its best interests served by holding the fair here.

A Beautiful Waterfront

No one can doubt or deny the inspiration and life the holding of the exposition on the waterfront would be to the waterfront itself between now and 1915. The permanent good for warehousing, free-marketing, exposition and other purposes the buildings would serve after the fair is over. That it would lead to early installation of modern methods and economy at the docks is most likely. The permanent development of private holdings along the west side of East street that it would bring about would make this section a worthy entrance way for the great commercial city of the future and be a substantial contribution to the permanent prosperity of the city. To the business section of San Francisco it would mean that the exposition crowds are placed at the very heart of the city. The established restaurant and hotel service gets the custom of the crowds, the legitimate and established business houses secure the trade, and the profits of the trade accrue to the permanent upgrowth of the city instead of being spirited away by nomadic speculators. To the east and north shores it means ready access and the opportunity to reap some of the going benefits of the undertaking, and it may lead to the long cherished shortening of the ferry trip.

As to the future of the esplanade, a permanent waterfront boulevard will be not only a feature of incomparable educational value to the people of the bay community, but it will be a most attractive feature for sight seeking visitors during future years. It will be not only the means to the promotion of local interest and pride in the waterfront but it must constantly lend impetus to new and increasing investment of outside capital. What greater appeal could there be to a man with money to invest than to observe from such a vantage point the substantial and almost unlimited waterfront facilities, the enormous resources of San Francisco as a port and its promise for the future.

No Waste in Temporary Structures

The absurd, the pitiful spectacle of expending millions and millions in money and labor, in art, architecture and genius over a period of years for the sake of the temporary, superficial gratification of an unobserving, diversion-seeking people for a few hours or a few days at most, and then of painfully and with much more labor and genius eliminating every trace of it all, is the most unthinkable thing of modern, hard-headed common sense.

Here, moreover, is a fact that is food for additional consideration. Francis B. Loomis is authority for the statement that an understanding has been reached among foreign nations that they will not exhibit in non-fireproof buildings. This means that wood and staff are no longer available for such structures.

Are we to be guilty of the fanaticism of erecting class "A" buildings where they must be torn down after six months use?

We stand, if not at the turning point in our destiny, at least at the cross roads, and the judgment we display at this time will determine very largely whether we shall go ahead by the long route or by the short one, whether we shall assist or hinder the future we are born to.

The casual observer finds it quite impossible to grasp at first blush any radical breaking away from the accepted plan of things, and it is hardly fair to expect that a large idea, however obviously right and however clearly superior, will be accepted without something of the old dogmatic struggle against swerving the breadth of a hair from the established, conventional, time-honored order.

An Exposition Distinctively San Franciscan

In the eyes of the world, the Panama-Pacific exposition, if held at San Francisco, will stand for one thing: It will be representative of the enterprise, the breadth of vision, and the practical fitness of the western people to live up to the duties and responsibilities that rest upon them. A midway plaisance, a mystic maze, temporary architecture, landscape gardening with a fence around it, stereotyped exhibits and an hour a-hang of a strap—these things are characterless, they can be produced anywhere.

It is San Francisco the rebuilt city, the commercial metropolis, that the world will come to see, and San Francisco's waterfront, this more than all her other possessions must be the inspiration of her visitors. If she allows this to remain primitive, antiquated, unappreciated and undeveloped, she cannot hope that the world will take away a feeling of her fitness in her stewardship.

A waterfront exposition is feasible architecturally and structurally. The best architects and engineers of San Francisco have so declared it. Sufficient space is available for it, as much floor space as was used for Chicago's mammoth fair. The time is ample for its accomplishment—indeed, we who have seen a whole city rise out of its ashes in less time than there is for this, should not be dismayed at this undertaking.

If we do this thing we will set a new ideal, we will fix a new mark in exposition making. We will put the expositions of the future out of the realm of spendthrift speculation and give to them a broader, higher, worthier meaning.

Are we big enough to do it?

PERSONALIA

Miss Italia Garibaldi, granddaughter of Gen. Garibaldi, the famous Italian liberator, and principal of the home school of the woman's foreign missionary society in Rome, is in this country. She came over on a steamship of the Italian navigation company, the same company that gave the use of two ships to her grandfather when he sailed in 1860 from Genoa to Marsala, Sicily, with the famous "thousand volunteers." In her school are about 70 girls. Many are being trained as nurses. Miss Garibaldi, who herself is a graduate nurse, says of her pupils: "Our girls did some fine work at the time of the Messina earthquake."

Miss Rose Moriarity of Elyria, O., is, at 26, deputy city auditor, deputy city treasurer, deputy clerk of the council, clerk of the board of control, clerk to the director of public safety, and clerk to the director of public service. During the seven years she has been connected with the government of this city of 18,000 it has spent approximately $4,000,000 for pavements, bridges, sewer and water systems. Every bit of legislation authorizing these improvements has been drawn by Miss Moriarity, and all of the money from bond issues has passed through her hands.

Mrs. Mary Powell, 70, of Philadelphia, walked recently from Manitou to the top of Pike's peak and back. She made a leisurely trip to the summit before dark and returned by moonlight.

Miss Annie Murphy has been made a ward superintendent in Chicago. She has been detailed by Mr. Cochrane, superintendent of streets, to lead the department's baby-saving crusade. An extremely practical set of rules which she has formulated is to be printed in Polish, Lithuanian and English, and displayed in conspicuous places throughout the "back of the yards district." It is believed the application of these rules will go far toward decreasing infant mortality in the section under Miss Murphy's charge.

Miss Ina Shepard is secretary of the clearing-house association in Birmingham, Ala. She handles the clearings of eight banks, amounting to between $12,000,000 and $15,000,000 a month. She has held the position five years. Besides, she is a good horsewoman and sings in church choirs and concerts.

Mrs. Williamina Fleming of the observatory staff of Harvard university has just discovered a new star in the constellation of Sagittarius.

Queen Victoria of Spain has just had bestowed on her the honor of the Cross of Public Benevolence by a unanimous vote of the Spanish Council of Ministers because of the relief she gave to the soldiers wounded at Melilla and also to the widows and orphans of soldiers.

("Political Table Talk"—Concluded)

public control, from which it never should have been separated. It is not a scheme to "sell something to the state." On the contrary, the people who are fighting the measures are the very ones who own the property and do not wish to sell it. They know that it is infinitely more valuable to keep. There should be no such thing as private harbors in competition with public harbors. Within the sea wall, and this basin is all behind the sea wall, from five to seven miles of wharfage could be created over which the state would have no jurisdiction and the commerce of which would make no contribution to the general harbor purposes of San Francisco. This would cause the state to lose in harbor tolls many times the cost of the land. All the bonds run for seventy-four years and the creation of a sinking fund does not begin for sixteen years. The revenues of the harbor will take care of these expenditures without calling upon the state treasury for anything. A part of these lands will be filled in and used for warehouses. If the state owns them the state will control access to the docks. If private corporations fill in and own these lands there will be no public regulation of warehouse charges. Docks are and should be under public control and likewise the warehouses that make the docks useful. Vote "yes" on this amendment.

A former New York newsboy made a success as a tenor singer at the Alhambra theatre in the program of the National Sunday League concert. The singer, B. Nevada Landino, sang the tenor aria from "Rigoletto" with delicacy and operatic feeling.

Miss Ellen Terry arrived in New York on October 26. In this, her ninth tour of this country since 1883, when she came for the first time with Sir Henry Irving, she will give a series of Shakespearean entertainments, or acted discourses. The titles and the scope of these discourses as now planned are as follows: "The Heroines of Shakespeare—Triumphant," "The Heroines of Shakespeare—Pathetic," "The Letters of Shakespeare" and "The Children of Shakespeare." Her addresses will be accompanied by illustrative acting, and she will wear Elizabethan costume.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Department No. 4.

Action No. 22818.

FLORENCE E. BEMIS, a widow, formerly
FLORENCE E. DORSEY,

Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof,

Defendants.

H. L. BREED, Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Florence E. Bemis, a widow, formerly Florence E. Dorsey, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point in the Northerly line of Carl Street distant thereon One Hundred and Fifty (150) feet Easterly from the point formed by the intersection of the Easterly line of Stanyan Street with the Northerly line of Carl Street; running thence Easterly along the said line of Carl Street Fifty (50) feet; thence at a right angle Northerly One Hundred and Thirty-seven (137) feet Six (6) inches; thence at a right angle westerly Fifty (50) feet; thence at a right angle Southerly One Hundred and Thirty-seven (137) feet Six (6) inches to the Northerly line of Carl Street and the point of beginning.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that her title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be met in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 30th day of August, A. D. 1910.

(SEAL) H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By J. J. McDONALD, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM.

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 2nd day of September, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

NAMES.	ADDRESSES.
City and County of San Francisco,	San Francisco,
a municipal corporation.	California.
H. L. BREED, Attorney for plaintiff,	1102 Broadway,
Oakland, Cal.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Department No. 1.

Action No. 22819.

KATIE B. CHILDS, a femme sole,

Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof,

Defendants.

H. L. BREED, Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Katie B. Childs, a femme sole, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at the corner formed by the intersection of the Northerly line of Twenty-sixth Avenue with the Northerly line of J Street, running thence Northerly along the said line of Twenty-sixth Avenue Seventy-five (75) feet; thence at right angles Northerly One Hundred (100) feet; thence at right angles

Southeasterly Seventy-five (75) feet to J Street, and thence Southwesterly along the Northwesterly line of J Street One Hundred (100) feet to the point of commencement.

Said lot or parcel of land being known and designated as Lot Number Sixteen (16) in Block Number 485 upon a certain map entitled "Plan of the Property of the Bay View Homestead Association," surveyed August 1871, Wm. P. Humphreys, City and County Surveyor, which map was filed in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, on the 19th day of June, 1872, in Map Book C.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that her title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be met in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 30th day of August, A. D. 1910.

(SEAL) H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By J. J. McDONALD, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM.

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 2nd day of September, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

NAMES.	ADDRESSES.
City and County of San Francisco,	San Francisco,
a municipal corporation.	California.
H. L. BREED, Attorney for plaintiff,	204 Oakland
Bank of Savings Building, Oakland, Cal.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Department No. 8.

Action No. 22696

E. J. MONTGOMERY and
MARGARET F. MONTGOMERY, his wife,

Plaintiffs,

vs.

ALL PERSONS claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described or any part thereof,

Defendants.

LEO C. TUCK,

Attorney for Plaintiffs.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of E. J. Montgomery and Margaret F. Montgomery, his wife, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above-entitled court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Beginning at a point on the northerly line of Broadway distant thereon seventy (70) feet westerly from the corner formed by the intersection of the northerly line of Broadway with the westerly line of Hyde Street, and running thence westerly along said line of Broadway twenty-two (22) feet; thence at a right angle northerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet, six (6) inches; thence at a right angle easterly twenty-two (22) feet, and thence at a right angle southerly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet, six (6) inches to the point of beginning.

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That their title to said real property, and to every part thereof, be established and quieted and that all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said real property and in and to every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description, be ascertained and determined by the judgment in this action and that it be adjudged and decreed that the plaintiffs are the owners in common in fee simple of the said real property, and of every part thereof, and that each of the plaintiffs is owner in fee simple absolute of an undivided one-half of the said real property, and of every part thereof, subject to no conditions, liens, encumbrances or claims of any kind, character, or description, and for such other relief as the Court may deem meet in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and seal of said Court, this 19th day of August, A. D. 1910.

(Seal) H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By J. J. McDONALD, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM.

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 26th day of August, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

NAMES.	ADDRESSES.
The City and County of San Francisco,	San Francisco,
a municipal corporation.	California.
LEO C. TUCK, Attorney for Plaintiffs,	Balboa Building, San Francisco.

8-26-10t

NOTICE OF STOCKHOLDERS' MEETING

Notice is hereby given that in pursuance of a resolution and order of the Board of Directors of the Buclimo Mining Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, unanimously adopted at the regular monthly meeting of said board, duly held on the thirtieth day of August, 1910, at the office of said corporation in San Francisco in said State, a meeting of the stockholders of said corporation is hereby called for, and will be held at the office of said corporation at Room 941 Monadnock Building, No. 681 Market St., San Francisco, California (said place of meeting being at the principal place of business of said corporation and at the building and place where the Board of Directors usually meet), on TUESDAY, THE TWENTY-NINTH DAY OF NOVEMBER, 1910, AT 8 O'CLOCK P. M. on said day, for the purpose of considering and acting upon the proposition to increase the capital stock of said corporation from One Hundred Thousand (100,000) Dollars, divided into One Hundred Thousand (100,000) shares of the par value of One Dollar each, to Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) Dollars divided into Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) shares of the par value of One Dollar each. The amount to which it is proposed to increase the capital stock of said corporation is Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) Dollars.

By order of the Board of Directors.

Dated September 1, 1910.

THOMAS E. HAVEN,
Secretary Buclimo Mining Company.
9-23-10t

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Department No. 4.

Action No. 22744.

JOHN CHARLSON,

Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof,

Defendants.

A. M. DE VALL, Attorney for Plaintiff.

667-9 Mills Building, Tel. Douglas 5990.
THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of John Charlson, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Chapultepec Street (now Winfield Avenue), distant thereon seventy-five (75) feet southerly from the southerly line of Esmeralda Street; thence running southerly along said easterly line of Chapultepec Street (now Winfield Avenue) twenty-five (25) feet; thence at a right angle easterly seventy (70) feet; thence at a right angle northerly twenty-five (25) feet; and thence at a right angle westerly seventy (70) feet to the point of beginning.

Being lot No. 393 of Gift Map No. 3, as per map on file and of record in the office of the Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be met in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 24th day of August, A. D. 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By J. J. McDONALD, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM.

The first publication of this Summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 9th day of September, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

NAMES.	ADDRESSES.
G. S. Crim.	2360 Howard Street,
	San Francisco, Cal.

9-9-10t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of ELIZABETH CHASE PHILLIPS, deceased.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned executors of the last will and testament of Elizabeth Chase Phillips, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within four months after the first publication of this notice to the said executors at the office of J. S. Hutchinson, Rooms 710-714 Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, California, which said office the undersigned select as their place of business in all matters connected with said estate of said Elizabeth Chase Phillips, deceased.

WALTER V. KELLOGG,

GEORGE KNOX,

Executors of the last will and testament of Elizabeth Chase Phillips, deceased.

Dated, San Francisco, September 21, 1910.
J. S. HUTCHINSON, Attorney for Executors, 710-714 Claus Spreckels Building, San Francisco, Cal.

TITLES RESTORED

TITLES RESTORED UNDER McENERNEY ACT, complete for $35.00. Burnt Records Title Co., 951-953 Monadnock Building, ninth floor Market street, near Third.

JULIUS CALMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office,	Residence,
30 Montgomery St.	1297 McAllister St.
Phone Kearny 4491	Phone Park 4890

SAN FRANCISCO

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The State Board of Health

Under a strictly let-alone policy of government there would hardly be a department of public health. Each person would be suffered to look after his own health and that of his own family or take the consequences. But, unhappily, one cannot preserve his own health or that of his family if his shiftless neighbor makes his home a breeding ground for pestilence. Therefore co-operative effort for the preservation of the public health becomes compulsory, and nation, states and cities, towns and counties, all have agencies, more or less efficient, for preserving the public health.

The state board of health in California consists of seven physicians of repute, or political influence as the case may be, serving without other compensation than their legitimate expenses when engaged in the performance of their official duties, a secretary of the state board, who is also a member of said board and who, unlike his associates, gives all his time to his office and receives a salary of $3,600 per year therefor; an attorney, a clerk, a statistician and a deputy statistician, director of the state hygienic laboratory, at Berkeley, and an assistant; a director of the state pure food and drug laboratory, also at Berkeley, and an assistant. Added to these all the city, town and county health officers of the state are, by law, constituted agents of the state board of health and required both to supply information to it and execute regulations issuing from it relating to the health of their respective communities, at least so far as contagious and infectious diseases are concerned.

Still, the work of the state board of health, especially on the health side of it, is more co-operative than compulsory, persuasive than mandatory, and it regards its educational work as more important than its executive. The executive officer is the secretary and upon his character and efficiency, more than all else, depends the value of the state board of health to the state. The secretary owes his office to the election of the state board, of which he is a member, but inasmuch as the governor appoints all the members of the board, with the approval of the senate, he generally contrives to determine who the secretary shall be, as well as to direct the bestowal of the rest of the political patronage of the department, which is considerable. The attorney is appointed directly by the governor. The regular salary list of the department of public health totals $17,900 a year.

So far as the direct preservation of the public health is concerned the state board of health does what it can to encourage and assist local boards to do their duty, taking their places if they prove incompetent in times of great need; imposing quarantine regulations when epidemics break out, conducting examinations into the sources of mortality and publishing such information as may teach the general public how to keep well and how to prevent the spread of maladies.

Then, too, it has in its hands the enforcement of the pure food and pure drug act and maintains a hygienic laboratory at Berkeley for discovering the nature of certain diseases, making examinations of blood, sputum, etc., aiding the medical profession in all the useful ways it can. Its reports and bulletins are widely circulated and generally commented on or quoted from by the press of the state.

Then there is the department of vital statistics, a most useful arm of the service. It is important to the commonwealth to have records made and preserved of all births, marriages and deaths that take place in the state, when people die and what they die of. To this end the law requires, under considerable penalties, all births, marriages and deaths to be reported to the county recorders and by the county recorders (or health officers in some instances) to the State Board of Health. Just how promptly and adequately these reports are made the writer of this does not know, but, anyway, the state is no longer sailing in the dark as to the vital truths of its life and health as it did in former years.

But in this department of public service, as in practically all others, there is a loss of efficiency as a result of a too great diffusion of responsibility. The "board" idea permeates it all, instead of the single executive officer at the head of his department, responsible to the people through the governor and responsible for his subordinates.

Then, too, local boards of health are inefficient because they have to deal with the delinquencies and carelessness of their neighbors, often with those of their own clients and patrons. It is seldom that they can be induced to exert authority even when there is great need for it. Again, one community kills rats to the end that the plague may be eradicated and the next community refuses to be concerned for the public health and permits rats to thrive. As one family may jeopardize the health of another, so one community may endanger the health of the whole commonwealth. The need would, therefore, seem to require a state department of health, instead of a state board, with a responsible executive at its head and, under him, agents and officers acting with plenary authority to compel the enforcement of sanitary measures where the public good requires them. It was by such methods, and not by common consent, that the cholera was driven from Manila and the yellow fever from Havana. There are times when communities, as well as individuals, need to be brought up with a short turn and when the public health is endangered is just such a time.

After the lecture is over,

And all of the speeches are speechied;

After the voters are sober,

And the end of the trouble is reached,

We'll all get a rest from orations

By candidates far better dumb,

From bonfires and bands and ovations,

And, faith! it will be Kingdom Come.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE

A full line of Theosophical Literature from Point Loma, California, the headquarters of the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society, under the leadership of Katherine Tingley, is now on sale at A. M. Robertson's, 222 Stockton St., S. F., and at Smith Bros., 462 13th St., Oakland, California.

FOR RENT—Ten-roomed house on Kingston avenue, Piedmont (rear Linda); rent forty dollars per month. Real Estate Co., 4054 Piedmont avenue, rear Key Route Depot. 10-28-2t

Day School---Night School

Electrical, Mining, Civil

AND

Automobile Engineering

Architectural Drawing

Wireless and Morse Telegraphy

BOOKKEEPING : SHORTHAND

Our Graduates in Every Department Secure Good Positions

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO

16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved

KRYPTOK

Invisible Bifocal Lenses

181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tels: Oakland 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY: NOVEMBER 4: '10 FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH-GOOD COURAGE-GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six
Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, In Advance. No. 50.

Our Last Say

ANOTHER WEEK and there will be surcease from politics, except to sum up the results of the carnage. God bless our native land! We can fight to a finish, shake hands and be friends. If we could not free government would be impossible and the fight in America would be as in Russia, between autocracy and terrorism, and would endure forever. If much of The California Weekly be devoted to politics this week it is because it is our last say before the voting. We think that very much depends upon the result, no less in truth than the freedom of California from corporation domination.

The Case of Bell

CALIFORNIA IS A REPUBLICAN STATE. If Theodore Bell be elected governor it must be by tens of thousands of Republican votes. What manner of Republicans are they who will vote for Bell? Manifestly, those who hate Johnson. Why do any Republicans hate Johnson? Those only hate Johnson who love Ruef and Calhoun and owe allegiance to William F. Herrin. If that ilk throw the election to Bell will they have any political claim upon Bell after election? They will. It cannot be otherwise. It is not in human nature to be. Therefore we must look to Johnson and not to Bell to make California free.

The Case of Johnson

IF HIRAM W. JOHNSON IS ELECTED governor of California next Tuesday it will be by the votes of all Republicans who stand for Roosevelt and his policies, and of all Democrats who stand for the same things in their party, Democrats who would help to make California free. If elected will those who give Johnson their suffrages have a claim upon him to fulfil his pledges and strive in all ways to redeem his native state? Sure! Nothing could be more certain. It is not in human nature to be otherwise. Again, therefore, we must look to Johnson and not to Bell to make California a free and independent state, no longer a political dependency of the Southern Pacific Company. Bell could not do this if he would, for he is neither big enough nor strong enough. Hiram W. Johnson is, can and will.

An Upright Judge

CALIFORNIA should congratulate itself upon the fact that it will have the opportunity to vote for William P. Lawlor for justice of its Supreme Court. Lawlor was the judge before whom Abe Ruef was being tried when Francis J. Heney was shot down. He has been the target for the bitterest hatred on the part of criminal and powerful interests. He has emerged from it all with unimpaired judicial vision, serene and unperturbed.—Collier's Weekly.

William Kent

IF ALL RICH MEN STOOD shoulder to shoulder for the financial aggrandizement of their class they could beggar the world. In our age they are the power-holding class. The only hope for the rest of us is to divide that power-holding class and, thus re-enforced, wage war for equal rights for all. William Kent, by virtue of his wealth, belongs to the power-holding class. On the issue of human rights he has espoused the cause of the common man. With much persuading he consented to go to congress to there fight for those rights. Is he going? That depends on the voters of the second congressional district. He deserves to receive every vote in that district. He is honest, able and clean, and he is on our side, the side of the square deal for the common man.

William P. Lawlor

THIS IS THE WILLIAM P. LAWLOR who, as judge of the superior court in San Francisco, sat at the trials of nearly all of the grafters, especially in the case of The People against Patrick Calhoun. Because he would not, in hearing those cases, deviate one hair's breadth from the right judicial line, and would not dismiss the cases when the grafters had fixed things to their liking with that purpose in view, the powers of darkness are trying to defeat Judge Lawlor for the supreme bench. If The People of California, without regard to party, are not dead to gratitude they will manifest that gratitude by making his election sure. He is as fit as deserving. There are two justices to be voted for. Make sure that Judge Lawlor gets one of your votes.

The Iago of the Campaign

THE IAGO OF THE CAMPAIGN, the man who by innuendo and artfully contrived suspicion would create distrust of Hiram Johnson, had to be imported from Indiana. No resident of California would pursue the tactics he has pursued and hope to live the deep damnation down. It may be doubted if Hoopole Township, Posey county, ever produced a more artful "Hoosier" than Frank E. Hering. He makes no charges that would make him actionable for libel or slander, but contents himself with asking damaging questions, the mere asking of which tends to create suspicion in the public mind. These questions have the intent, purpose and effect of uttering downright, damaging falsehoods. Not a thing suggested has a color of verity. Lies all of them although under a cloak of questionings. They have their origin with the Father of Lies who, at the eleventh hour, has come to the rescue of Bell's campaign.

Welcome Heney

HAVING RESTED from his three years of unrequited service in the cause of justice in this city, Francis J. Heney threw himself into the fight for free government in Minnesota and Wisconsin, came back to California to lend his voice in aid of William Kent, then went south and upheld the cause of a progressive Republicanism throughout the interior of California, doing splendid service for Right Things wherever he went. When he returns to his San Francisco home, the true Men of San Francisco should tender him such a reception as will testify to the state some measure of that love, that esteem, that appreciation of his unselfish services which all his right-minded fellow citizens cherish for him. He is with us once again.

The Defeat of Roosevelt

WALL STREET AND THE POWERS of political darkness in the empire state, placing their faith in the irresistible power of Tammany Hall, re-enforced by unlimited expenditure, have joined in celebrating the "crushing defeat of Roosevelt" in advance of the occasion. Their purpose is to do what the lions of Africa left undone, after which, high jinks. Without money, without political patronage, with the President a mere interested spectator, this our David is making the fight of his life against the "Morganheims" interests, and here is hoping that he may win, but whether he wins or not he cannot be crushed. No man with the American people behind him can be, and this backing he has to call on when he needs it.

The San Mateo Graft Case

The exact facts in the San Mateo county graft cases are not before the public in definite, absolute form, but lest the public mind be clouded by hearing more of the hold-up idea than of the grafting a few fundamental truths should be accepted as axiomatic, by which to test the facts as they come out.

A selling firm or corporation that allows supervisors a personal commission, or rake-off, on anything sold to a county is grafting, and merits the destruction of its business through having earned the contempt of all mankind. Such a firm has forfeited the right to public patronage and should perish of universal boycott.

Being held up does not consist in the mere necessity of allowing a rake-off as a condition precedent to selling a bill of goods. It is not indispensable that such goods be sold. The cry of "held up," to cover the iniquity of such a transaction is doing the baby act to avoid well merited punishment. Let no one be deceived by that cry.

The grafting supervisors deserve state prison and the grafting firm that was a party, if the facts show that there has been such graft, deserves to keep the supervisors company in prison.

Finally, if it be true, as the superior judge of San Mateo county is reported to have declared it to be, that no jury in that county will convict grafters of grafting, no matter what the evidence, then is that county become inherently rotten, prepared for the devil and his angels.

Let everybody watch the progress of these suits in San Mateo county. If we are rotten to the core let us know it. If our civilization is a hollow mockery let us know that. If we cannot muster the courage to be decent, and to punish indecency, let us at least be brave enough to face our condition unwhimperingly. Whatever we do let us not add to our dishonesty the cowardliness of the sneak.

The term "we" is used advisedly, for, save and except that the government of San Mateo county has for years been under the patronage of a coterie of San Francisco higher-ups, there is no reason to suppose that the people of San Mateo county are either better or worse than the people of Alameda or Santa Clara counties, Fresno or Yuba. We are all members one of another in this California of ours and the miserable moral standard which the graft trials in San Francisco disclosed blights the commonwealth from Shasta to San Diego. When we come to see ourselves as we are we shall begin to make ourselves as we ought to be, and not before.

But this paper is not ready to concede that a jury cannot be found in San Mateo county that will find those guilty of graft who are guilty of graft if the rules of the legal game will permit them to find verdicts in accordance with the facts. The trouble has been with the rules of the legal game rather than with the people, although there is fault enough, God Almighty knows, with our Californian standards of right and wrong. They are damnably inadequate to our civic salvation.

Rise of the House of Morgan

John Moody, George Kibbe Turner and McClure's Magazine have rendered the American public a distinct service in preparing and publishing a straightforward, unadorned history of the rise of the House of Morgan. This history should be read by every thoughtful citizen of the United States. There is no muck-raking in it.

In brief, George Peabody, a merchant, early in the last century established in London an agency for purchasing British goods to be imported into the United States and, as an incident thereto, developed a banking business, and this banking business developed into a

THE STAFF
A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage.

Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application.

Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Moir, 330 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

store for the sale to European investors of American securities. Justin Morgan succeeded Peabody and J. Pierpont Morgan succeeded his father, Justin.

In the course of his business activities, Pierpont Morgan sold many millions of dollars' worth of American railroad and other industrial securities to European investors. American railroad and industrial promoters were essentially robbers and would as soon swindle the European investor as the American patron. In defense of his European and other investing clients Pierpont Morgan was forced into the fight for control of American corporations, first, to prevent them from swindling his clients and, second, to prevent their ruining each other with cutthroat competition and the needless duplication of existing plants. The promoters were headed toward universal bankruptcy, and J. Pierpont Morgan, more than anyone else, but with the co-operation of the Rothschild and other Jewish interests, headed them off and brought order out of chaos. So far the course of the House of Morgan was entirely honorable, eminently sound and the services rendered were not only nationally, but internationally, important.

But the House of Morgan works wholly in the interests of the investor. It is the business of the consumer and the producer to look to their own interests. The House of Morgan will not look to their interests for them. What was undertaken for protection has been prosecuted for aggrandizement. The House of Morgan and its affiliations now constitute the most stupendous aggregation of active capital the world has ever known.

There is a point in every industry that will yield the investor the largest possible returns. That point is the full value of the service or what the traffic will bear. To go beyond that point is to induce diminishing returns, to discourage enterprise, impoverish the purchasing power of the people, to starve if not to kill the goose that lays golden eggs. As attorney and general manager for the investors of Europe and America the purpose of the House of Morgan is to put the financial and transportation industry of this continent where the investor will be yielded the largest possible returns for the use of his money.

Is this right, is it just, is it for the highest interests of the nation? Is the investor the only party in this industrial republic whose interests we are bound by our laws, our courts and our public sentiment to respect? That is what The Interests are striving for, and the meaning of the strife is that if those interests are successful—even wisely, prudently, self-restrainedly, and not rapaciously, successful, the net results of all the toiling and moiling of the American people will go to the investing class. All the rest of us will strive for our board and clothes and such a standard of living as we will refuse to go without without upsetting everything by precipitating universal anarchy.

The only defense against domination by a financial oligarchy of Morgans, Rothschilds and their associates lies in developing an industrial democracy. In short, it is the centuries-old fight of the common man against the uncommon man, the mass struggling against the powerful few who strive to hold them down. The investor must have his share, but his share is not what the traffic will bear. It is what is necessary to keep the wheels of industry turning, together with that increment which will provide for increase of population and a steady elevation of the standard of living. The non-investor must have such a "saving wage" or salary as shall finally make the worker also the investor.

The Crippen Trial

Elsewhere in this paper will be found an account, taken from the New York Sun's correspondence from London, of the trial of Dr. Crippen in England. That account has created no little interest in the East and should be especially interesting in California where the failure of our existing system of establishing justice, especially where wealth and influence resist conviction, is notorious.

The jury was selected in eight minutes, only three of the panel were challenged, and they because of their looks, which were not prepossessing. The lord chief justice of England presided, as if the chief justice of the supreme court of the United States, or Chief Justice Beatty of the supreme court of California, should step down from the upper bench to try the Thompson case here in San Francisco.

The insignia of the office and of the court was most impressive. It was august. The robes, the regalia, savored of the pomp and splendor of royalty. Justice in England is, in its origin, not the justice of the People of England, but the justice of the King of England, divinely commissioned to dispense justice. Within plain sight of the culprit and the jury, the witnesses and the spectators, rested the black cap which the lord chief justice, vicegerent of the king, was to put on if called upon to pronounce the death penalty. Instead of being umpire of a sparring match, as our American judges are, the judge tried the Crippen case with the assistance of counsel. The responsibility to God and king was his, not that of jury or counsel, prosecution or defense.

So far as efficiency and expedition was concerned nothing in the Crippen case was left to be desired. It was all over but the hanging in four and a half days and the hanging was expedited a week to suit the convenience of the sheriff.

But is the English system as certain to do justice as it is to dispatch business? Doubtless Crippen is guilty. Doubtless most persons charged with crime are guilty, but doubtless there are some who are charged with crime who are not guilty of its commission. Does the English system protect the innocent with the same certainty that it convicts the guilty?

It would seem that, somewhere between our absurd system of trying every juror as a preliminary step to trying a criminal, and the English system of shaking out a jury much as one might shake dice out of a box there ought to be some rational method of selecting a jury that would eliminate the blockheads and leave only men of sound judgment on the panel.

And it would seem that, somewhere betwixt our system of reducing the judge to a mere umpire of a forensic scrapping match and the English system of reducing counsel to something little better than serving men, while exalting the judge to the position of vicar of Almighty God, there should be a rational relationship between bench and bar that would make the administration of justice less of a farce than with us and less of a relic of a by-gone, kingly prerogative than it is in England.

The purpose of a judicial system is to establish justice. By no other test can any system be judged. While we must confess our American system a farce and a failure, whenever the accused has money and influence to employ in his defense, and consequently a disgrace to our civilization, it does not follow that the English system may not be open to the charge of being more expeditious than just, more merciless than concerned that only the guilty shall suffer.

The State Library

Our "backbone" article for the week, on the California State Library, is neither sensational nor dramatic. Those who read that they may be amused or thrilled will find it devoid of interest, but those who wish to know of one of the great and growing institutions of the state will find this article a mine of information. The state library is an institution in which this state has reason to take pride. The weight of the influence upon the lives of the people of California of their state library may become incalculable. Why? Because the management got into the hands of a man who rose to the requirements of his position although, in doing so, he rose above the level of his own life, above the standards of those who got him his job. Having climbed up by as raw political methods as were ever employed in getting office, being Southern Pacific political manager for Sacramento, he pulled the ladder up after him and took the whole library, trustees and all, out of politics and has since kept the institution free of patronage and partisanship. While he lives and pursues his present library policy State Librarian Gillis should upon no account be disturbed. In the light of the political and executive regeneration of this important state institution our leading article for the week should be thoughtfully read, and it should be carefully preserved for the added reason that the library can be made useful to the reader when he knows how to use it. This paper is thankful for the able article.

Free Street or Free Speech

Fresno has been enjoying no end of trouble with the Weary Willies of the I. W. W., who have been suffering all things in defense of the right of freedom of speech while the city of Fresno has suffered equally for the right of free streets. The right to freedom of speech does not carry with it the right to speak anywhere and at any time. Streets are for traffic, for the coming and going of people, not for assemblage; but every city should have a place for free assemblage, if not indoors then out, where men with ideas in their heads may go to be heard and others may go to hear. Whatever city has not provided such a place should be indulgent of the use of certain by-streets for purposes of assemblage until proper provision shall have been made. The I. W. W. have a right to be heard and the more freely they are heard the fewer will there be of them and the less dangerous will they become. The spirit that animates that order appears to be dangerous, but much less dangerous unconfined than coked up. A free forum for all sorts and conditions of agitators is as good a safety valve to insure against explosion as any community may devise.

In Sober Truth

The direct primary law, as it is, is inadequate to insure the nomination of best men to be party candidates for office. The worse element in our political life, by banding together and holding together, although a minority of not to exceed thirty per cent of the whole, can, where the better element is divided, procure nominations for unfit men. The better element may, through adverse experience, learn better than to face the worse in a divided condition, and so work a remedy through public sentiment but, if experience does not teach that lesson, then California must follow the example of Wisconsin and require a majority to nominate and the holding of a second contest between the two highest candidates in order that a majority may rule. Else the system of preferential voting must be made a part of the direct primary law. The Republicans, through this course, made some nominations not fit to be made. The Democrats, eschewing the primary system, and fixing up a ticket in the Argonaut Hotel by private dicker, in some instances, did the better.

The ticket that the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League submitted to party voters, largely by the same methods as those employed by the Democrats, was beyond criticism. The league candidates that went down to defeat at the primary election, through a division of the more decent element in the party, were far and away better men than those who triumphed over them. Nomination by a minority is not good. A remedy for it must be found. It will add to the cost of holding elections, but nothing else is so costly as unfit men in office.

The Narrow Horizon

It required a century for this nation to outgrow its precinct patriotism, and the most serious danger that still confronts it is that of the narrow horizon, especially of the business men of the nation. The House of Morgan, as explained elsewhere, views all national problems from the standpoint of the investor, as though he were the only party in interest, but that house is not alone in that view. Others are similarly sinning against commonwealth and nation.

This is especially true with regard to the adoption of amendment number one. The bankers say of it: "Why, this will make us pay more taxes than we have been paying. Therefore it is clearly impossible. Those who favor the adoption of that amendment are not our friends."

A Southern California newspaper figures out, mistakenly as we believe, that the city in question would lose something more than it would gain by the amendment. Therefore everyone is advised to vote it down.

This is bourbonism come to life at an inopportune time. The true issue is: What is best for California? What is most just for all its people and all its interests? Any mind that cannot rise to that height to view the issue is fitter for the seventeenth century than for the twentieth.

That principle of action applied to government resolves government into a system wherein might is made right, not right made mighty for the well-being of men. It makes congress and legislatures arenas wherein all interests enter into conflicts, not of ideas, but of strength; not of forces making for justice, but of powers contending for the mastery.

Amendment number one will work some injustice and some hardship, at least temporarily, but it will begin to right a wrong of centuries, a wrong that has heaped upon the homeowner a burden of government that should have been widely and justly distributed. In the light of experience changes will, without doubt, have to be made in the schedule, but under the amendment as it stands such changes can be made without difficulty. If experience proves, what it is not likely to, that the banks are wronged their wrong will be righted, but for the banks to oppose the whole scheme because they, for the first time, feel a pinch of taxation that home-owners feel all the time, is narrow, ungenerous and thoroughly bourbonistic.

The voters who allow the banks to influence them against that widely beneficent measure are not wise. They suffer themselves to be led by men of narrow vision.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

A salutation of the ancient Hebrews was, "Peace be with you," or "Peace be unto this house," and when The Christ informed his disciples of his going away, and he wished to leave them his choicest gift he said, "My peace I give unto you." When Paul wished to send his most tender greetings to the Philippians he began it with, "Grace to you and peace from God our Father." God's choicest blessing to the world is peace.

We may not have peace for the world, at least not yet. The mind can scarcely conceive of what the world would have been like all through its history if that history had been devoid of Knight-errantry, of the glory won by men-at-arms, if there had been no literature of prowess and valor, of endurance and steadfastness in the prosecuting and defending of sieges, if the songs of Homer had been of peace and not of war. The literature of Bacchus could better have been left out, and yet one can hardly conceive what the world's literature would have been like if poets had not sung of the vintage.

Men, great, thoughtful men, have dared to say that if war had been left out of the world's scheme of things there would have been little left to teach mankind the splendid virtues of fortitude and resignation, of fidelity to duty to the expenditure of the last drop of blood from the flowing veins and spurting arteries, that but for war the world would become "bemired in materialism," as it well-nigh has become now, but how deeper in the mire of materialism could any civilization go than that of England and Germany has gone when, through fear that piping times of peace may depress their industries, great corporations engaged in constructing battleships, ordnance and other appliances or munitions of war, deliberately employ the services of a prostituted press to revive the fear of wars between these two peoples and so encourage them to load themselves more heavily with debt that more of their treasure may be thrown into the activities of preparation for a war that nobody, except those who make war their trade, and who do not themselves go to war, would look upon as anything except the most intolerable calamity? Diabolism has nothing more horrible to do than this.

But the purpose of this lesson was not so much to speak of the peace of the world, which is a large subject, a much larger subject it is to be feared than the thirty-eight members of the American Peace Society resident in the whole bay district of California will be able to deal with adequately, as to speak of that peace of mind which many a perturbed spirit may conquer for himself if he go about it in the right way. It is worth fighting for, peace is, the more especially as the fighting has mainly to be done with one's own self.

There are those who seek peace by withdrawing from the world of hustle and bustle, of contention and turmoil, washing their hands of it altogether. It is not to be had that way. A peace so obtained is like enough to be destroyed by self accusation for having shirked a man's part in a man's fight.

The peace which the individual may conquer and keep comes of having fought the good fight for it, having fought as hard as ever he could, leaving no stone unturned and no thing undone that he can do. Having done all this the rest may be peacefully left to those overruling powers that transcend our uttermost. Having done one's best, one may see towers tumble and battlements fall about him, may see order resolve itself into chaos and civilization go headlong toward barbarism almost without a qualm. The kismet of the Moham medan and the "Thy will be done" of the Christian have scarcely more of contentment in them than the "I did my damndest," of our modern American pagan when, doing "his damndest," meant that he had done his best. That way lies peace, the hope of the ages, which it may require other ages to bring to the world, but which each person may gain for himself when he will.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Earth's Terrae Incognitae

A few weeks ago, in this department, an announcement was made that the interior of Newfoundland was about to be explored for the first time. It seemed almost impossible that right here at our doors, as it were, is such a piece of terra incognita, yet thus stands the fact. More than that, impossible as it may seem to us, who dwell on densely populated portions of our world's surface, much of this earth still is absolutely unknown to civilized men. For example, in Alaska are unexplored, unmapped and unknown lands equal to fully six times the area of New York state. Again, three New Englands might be set down in completely untracked portions of the valley of the Amazon, and other parts of South America are equally unknown. Much of Africa barely is becoming known to other than savage mankind, and considerable parts of it yet "sit in darkness." In a lesser degree the same remarks apply to Asia. Coming nearer home—clear home, in fact—there are rivers in New Mexico and Texas whose sources are absolutely unknown. Much of northern Australia still is uncharted, as is a large part of New Guinea. In brief, there is but one large division of the earth's surface which is entirely explored, and that is Europe. Man has settled the earth in spots, and a considerable portion of it still is awaiting his coming.

The Father of the Automobile

In the city of Cannstatt, Germany, is a monument to Gottlieb Daimler, who justly may be considered, although the world generally is not aware of the fact, the father of the motorcycle and the automobile, and, indeed, of the motor-boat as well. It was in making a miniature motor for a child's toy that Daimler first conceived the idea of finding a means for igniting the charge in the cylinder without introducing a flame into the combustion chamber. The idea having been conceived, Daimler and a fellow workman named Maybach by many experiments at last brought it to such perfection that at last they succeeded in devising a motor capable of impelling a small vehicle, such as a bicycle. Lacking confidence in two wheels, however, they placed it on four, and thus it was run with some success. This was in 1885. Later Daimler applied his motor to small boats, and again with considerable success. From such a start the idea of the automobile naturally and inevitably grew, and to it Daimler devoted his time and attention, at length constructing an automobile which was much like the modern vehicle. Removing to Paris, he sold his rights to a French firm which still is engaged in the manufacture of automobiles. More than any other one man by far, the automobile is his invention, and he is entitled to much more credit than the world yet has given to him.

The Growth of the Cities

Census reports now have been published giving the population of all cities in the United States containing 100,000 or more inhabitants except San Francisco, Los Angeles, Minneapolis and Memphis. The reports also give the population of about 150 cities of from 25,000 to 100,000 inhabitants apiece. Concerning the figures thus given a census bulletin has the following to say: "With the data for both groups of cities approaching completeness, it is noticeable that the smaller cities, as a group, seem to have maintained during the decade 1900 to 1910 a rate of growth considerably above that maintained by the larger cities, the rate for the aggregate population of the smaller cities being 39.3 per cent and that for the larger 30.1. There was no such contrast in the decade 1890 to 1900, during which the increase of the smaller cities in the aggregate was 33.2 per cent and the larger 32.1 per cent."

What Sports Cost Great Britain

After announcing that its figures do not include those pertaining to "theaters, music halls, holidays and alcohol," the Glasgow Evening News carefully estimates the cost of sports annually to the people of Great Britain at $225,000,000. The sum includes the cost of racing, hunting, fishing, yachting, and a considerable list of similar recreations. In a sense, too, this is money well expended, for something other than work is required if Jack is to be something other than a dull boy. Yet when one remembers that Britain's pauper list constantly grows, and, particularly, that it has grown with extreme rapidity in recent years, it may not be amiss to consider what this sum would do for those who hobnob with hunger. To state it briefly, it would much more than annihilate Britain's pauper problem. It would give $400 apiece annually—which doubtless would be more than a majority of the paupers ever knew—to 562,500 poor people. This number tremendously exceeds the entire crop of poverty-stricken ones over there. This fact is mentioned merely to show what men might do if they felt like doing it; but of course we need, must and will have our sports, and if men, women and children go hungry—well, it is unfortunate, but it is so extremely difficult to do anything about it.

Oliver Lodge Holds Death Not Final

Perhaps Sir Oliver Lodge's opinion in such a matter is no better than that of John Doe; perhaps he can shoot no straighter to the mark in the darkness than can the veriest clodhopper who stands amidst the mists and makes his forlorn guess at the answer to the eternal riddle; yet, coming close on the heels of Thomas A. Edison's expressed belief that "death ends all," it is somewhat consolatory to learn that Sir Oliver does not agree with him. Distinctly, he does not thus agree. In a recent address he used the following language: "The death of the body does not convey any assurance of the soul's death. Every physical analogy is against such a superficial notion in nature. We never see things beginning or coming to an end. Change is what we see, not origin or termination. Death is a change indeed—a sort of emigration, a wrenching away of the old familiar scenes, a solemn, portentous fact. But it is not annihilation. No thoughtful person can believe that he is destined to drop head foremost into vacant nothing and cease to be." With Sir Oliver let us take our stand. If life is not the tragedy of farces and the farce of tragedies, death does not end all.

The Prevalence of the Automobile

The registrar of automobiles of the state of Ohio recently reported the number of automobiles owned in eight states of the union. Here are the figures he gives: Ohio, 31,051; Pennsylvania, 30,506; Massachusetts, 28,272; New York, 60,000; New Jersey, 25,520; Illinois, 21,081; Michigan, 16,812, and Indiana, 10,110. This is a total of 223,352 of these machines owned and licensed in these eight states, and, remembering that the automobile had not arrived twenty years ago, the number seems remarkably large. Still, considered from another point of view, it is evident that several of us are not riding in automobiles as yet. In the eight states enumerated above about 31,000,000 people dwell. There is, then, one automobile (frequently representing a mortgage) to every 139 inhabitants. Perhaps the average automobile may carry three passengers. It appears, consequently, that 45 people walk (unless some automobiling friend is kind to them, which is rarely the case) for every one that rides and honks. Such figures come almost as a surprise. Judging by the number of times most of us have felt that we barely escaped being run over, we had formed an impression that a majority of mankind had taken to automobiling and suffered in some degree from insanity in doing so. The impression is erroneous; a majority of us still are walking, and can vote the chauffeurs into regarding our lives whenever we choose to.

Dance to Cure Feeble-Mindedness

If the reader chances to be feeble-minded—which undoubtedly is an impossible presumption; else why should he be reading this?—but if he does chance to be feeble-minded, it should be a great relief to him to learn that dancing is what he needs to better his condition. First let him dance, and then watch his intellect brighten. It is one Dr. Farries, the superintendent of an English asylum for the weak of mind, who has made and announces this discovery. Although cricket and football have proved complete failures in dealing with the mentally incompetent, he says that "dancing awakens slumbering intelligence and brings intellectual life and proper understanding to minds previously vicious or merely vacant." He also added that "nothing gives them manly thoughts more quickly." The suggestion is good, probably indicating, as it does, why so many people are devoted to dancing: Doubtless they recognize their own lack, and desire to improve their intellects, a desire to be encouraged. Let it be understood that if a tone of levity pervades this paragraph, it is not very justifiable. Quite probably Dr. Farries' suggestion is based upon wise observation of helpful fact.

Portugal, the Land of Cheapness

Portugal, the latest republic, perhaps gives its citizens as cheap living as any civilized—or should we say semi-civilized?—country in the world. In Lisbon, for example, one may purchase a good meal, neatly served and including wine, for six cents. There, too, is about the best and cheapest fish market in the world, and the prices of fruits and grains are almost proportionately low. In fact, nearly everything is sold at prices at which we of America might marvel. Of course, however, there is a fly in the ointment, and it consists in the fact that the price of labor is as low as those of most other things. To illustrate, factory girls there are paid twelve cents a day, seventy-two cents a week. Such a wage carries a starvation sound on this side of the big water, but it is said that the girls live very comfortably on it over there. And as the size of a wage is measured not so much by the number of its units as by what it will buy, perhaps these new-born Portuguese republicans are not so desperately poor after all.

George Moore has just completed a dramatization of "Esther Waters," his most popular novel, in three acts, in collaboration with S. L. Robinson, a young Irish playwright. A leading German actress of the Berlin theatres, whose name Mr. Moore will not reveal at present, has long wanted to play the character of Esther Waters. The piece will be offered to a London manager very soon.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Luxor Oil Company, a corporation. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Southwest 1/4 of Section 22, Township 32, Range 24, County of Kern, California.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 4th day of October, A. D. 1910, an assessment (No. 1) of two cents ($.02) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the above named corporation, payable in U. S. gold coin on Monday, the 10th day of October, A. D. 1910, at the hour of 10 o'clock A. M. of the said day, to H. F. Gordon, the Secretary of the said corporation, at the office of the said corporation on the ground floor or first floor of the building known and designated as No. 219, Sansome Street, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Monday, the 14th day of November, A. D. 1910, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on Wednesday, the 7th day of December, A. D. 1910, at 10 o'clock A. M. of the said day, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

H. F. GORDON,
Secretary of Luxor Oil Company,
a corporation.

Location of office: 219 Sansome Street, San Francisco, California.

The California Weekly
IS PRINTED BY
Donaldson & Moir
PRINTERS
330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

OF THE LITERAL MIND

A precise scholar once proposed to amend the Duke's speech in "As You Like It," where he declares that

"This our life, exempt from public haunt,
Finds tongues in trees, books in the running brook,

Sermons in stones and good in everything."
to make it read:

"Finds tongues in trees, stones in the running brook, Sermons in books, and good in everything."

This precise scholar must assuredly be a contemporary of William Dean Howells and Henry James. Perhaps he is still alive, in spite of the heinous sin we have quoted above. His spirit, at least, is very much abroad in the land of imaginative writing. No longer is "the play the thing." The thing is the historical accuracy of the hose worn by the heroine, the literal accuracy of the Elizabethan speech as delivered by the hero, the correctness of the cut of the leading juvenile's trousers or the "verisimilitude" of the soubrette's attitudes to the attitudes of young ladies of the particular "period" in question. What the writer of today needs is not the imaginative mind but the photographic mind. We have no use for mere fancy in literature, we want facts. No more are we content to gaze at Shakespeare hurtling through a chaos of ideas, emotions and words to write upon the splendid skies an immortal constellation of imagery. We must have little men who climb little stairs, whom we can see mount step by step, placing a flickering candle light upon the table in the upstairs hall. For shame, Shakespeare, that you wrote

"See how the heavens are all inlaid with patines of bright gold."

Behold how you have erred. In the first place, do you not know, venerable and discredited bombastes, that it is a physical impossibility to "inlay" the heaven with anything? Furthermore, do you not know that there is not gold enough in all the world to inlay "all" the heavens? Still further, know you not that "patines" is an obsolete word, not understood by the gallery gods, and hence taboo? And, lastly, do you not know that "bright" gold is out of style and only "dull" or "Pompeian" gold is recherche?

Tut, tut! See how much better Howells could do this thing. Something like this, we may surmise:

"If you will lean back upon this bank—which I observe is at just the right angle to make an agreeable rest for the purpose—and adjust your dark—may I say black—lynx fur-piece from the Hudson bay region a little closer to your neck, and then if you will look upward at the sky—or whatever we should call that vast, unknown space of ether overhead (I say "ether," but of course we do not know what it really is)—you will see a number of bright points of light, called stars, which gleam or glitter in a pleasant fashion—" and so on.

True, true, dear Howells, quite correct. And we wish we had stayed in the house and had not this crick in our necks. Frankly, dear Howells, you bore us to death. Shakespeare was not exact, but he had a wondrous winning way with him. Perhaps, perhaps—treason, we know, but we will take a chance—perhaps Shakespeare was right. Maybe, after all, it is more Artful to say things the way they ought to be, whether they really are that way, than to say them the way they really are, literally are. And another "perhaps." Perhaps the way things look to us in quite cold blood is not the way they really are. Perhaps the way things looked to the eye of Shakespeare, in fine frenzy rolling, is, after all, more truthfully their likeness. Else were it strange that Shakespeare's plays, for all their inaccuracy and violent daring of phrase, yet leave a sense of marvelous verisimilitude to life. We leave them and find the world not strange, but more familiar. We leave them and find men not more inexplicable but more explicable. How comes this if he be the false and wandering star?

Perhaps, perhaps—we will not say it.

John Stevenson, the author of the recently published book, "The Hermit of Capri," who is in real life Judge Tarkington, father of Booth Tarkington, was married last month to Miss Linda H. Schultz, a director in the public schools of Indianapolis, his home city. The author and jurist is in his seventy-ninth year. An extended honeymoon trip took the couple as far as Maine and New York.

Californian Poets' Corner

THE YEARS

By F. M. Shearer

There is no more pitiful story in the literary history of California than that of the life and tragedy of Flora Macdonald Shearer, the young Scotch woman, talented and unfortunate, who was known for several years as a teacher in the San Francisco schools, but who became mentally deranged and died in one of the State hospitals. Her poems have been collected in a volume which contains verses of real merit.

The fleeting years, the flying years,

How much they take away!—

Life's early joys, its smiles and tears,

Youth's beautiful, brief day.

The bitter years, the barren years,

A dolorous array;

Hope, like a dim mirage, appears

Upon their desert gray.

The fatal years, the final years,

Remorseless, they sweep on;

We hail Death's shadow as it nears,

Impatient to be gone.

MENDOCINO

By L. H. Shuey

Of all the writers of California none displays a greater love for the mountains and the forests which are the glory of the state than Mrs. Lillian H. Shuey, the author of this poem.

A vast cathedral by the western sea,

Whose spires God set in majesty on high.

Peak after peak of forests to the sky,

Blended in one vast roof of greenery,

The nave, a river broadening to the sea;

The aisles, deep canyons of eternal build;

The transepts, valleys with God's splendor filled;

The shrines, white waterfalls in leaf-laced drapery.

The choir stands westward by the sounding shore;

The cliffs like beetling pipes set high in air,

Roll from the beach the thunders crashing there;

The high wind voices chord the breakers' roar;

And wondrous harmonies of praise and prayer

Swell to the forest altars evermore

THE SUMMER OF THE GODS

By George Sterling

Methought in dream I saw Ulysses bold—

Lured by strange music to the hidden West—

Pass onward on that memorable quest

Of islands where the demigods of old

Beyond the portals of Elysium hold

The twilight and the threnodies of rest.

Great gleamed the sunset upon ocean's breast

And all those urgent oars cast up its gold.

Hushed are the voices of the mystic dales

And lost the days whose dawn and eve of yore

Held yet a mystery whose kindly veils

Fell as a radiance on sea and shore,

Whose eastward moons and suns departing bore

A glory unto far, intrepid sails.

OF THE IMAGINATIVE MIND

In opposition to the gentle satire of the first column of this page it is fair to put down the record of some hopeful signs in the recent development of our public taste, or rather in recent discoveries made in catering to the public taste. It is well to note, right here, the helpless condition of the public in matters of books and plays. A great figure in letters, like William Dean Howells, makes a reputation within the craft of writers as the embodiment of success achieved through following a certain theory of writing. He becomes a leader, writers heed his advice and follow his dictum of taste. The public gets what is written. It does not write, it has to read what writers write and publishers publish, if it would read current literature at all. In passing, we may say that this is a great stimulant to the publication of the old loved classics.

With dramatic literature the case is much the same. Authors and managers have a trusting faith in "what the public wants." A farce is a success, and for a couple of years farces only are written and produced. A comic opera is a success, and the stage is deluged with dreary imitations.

For a long time now the literalists, or "realists" as they call themselves, have dominated American literature. But we see a ray of hope. The New Theatre, New York, opened its season a couple of weeks ago with Maurice Maeterlinck's "Bluebird." Now this is a play that would have been called, a few years ago, by the derisive epithets of "highbrow" or "mystical." The story is purely imaginary, the characters are fantastic or impossible, the scene is Noman's land, the action is subordinated to the idea, the idea is presented largely by symbolism, there is even the crowning heresy of poetry in the play. But, wonder of wonders, the critic of a sophisticated New York newspaper, in his review of the first-night performance, declares that the sophisticated New York first-night audience "had no difficulty in following the symbolism of the piece," and actually seemed to enjoy the performance!

Here is hope indeed. Only we would have stressed the statement rather differently. We would have taken for granted, what is the truth, that people are not different in New York from people in Elizabethan London, that people of course can follow symbolism (aren't they cradled on fairy tales?), that people enjoy good poetry, and then we would have emphasized the revolutionary fact that at the culmination of the literal-minded cult's hold upon writers a man should have ventured to write fantasy, and at this day of literal-minded managers such a play could have got itself produced.

We trust the Bluebird has broken the way for more freedom in play-writing. What this age hungers for is a return to the imagination, for freedom from the shackles of Meredith, Ibsen, Howells, James, and for the birth of a literature in the spirit, at least, of Shakespeare, however hopeless we may be of matching his quality.

The literal-minded will, too, have performed a useful service that will abide after their books are ashes. The romanticism of "The Hunchback" and "Virginus" was an offense to gods and men. It outraged every sense of verity and of taste. It was not merely that such characters and such events never were on land or sea; it was that anybody of taste would pray fervently that they might never be. Shakespeare's romanticism, at its boldest and most improbable, was at least alluring, violated no canons of god taste. If literal-mindedness does no more than bring literature, not down to common earth, but in harmony with earthly aspirations for the semblance of the truth, it will have served us well. Alone and of itself, it is abhorrent. It leads us to despair. But as a corrective of false views of life, as a guide to vaulting Pegasus, it may do good.

MAN, THE UNREASONING ANIMAL

By E. FRENCH STROTHER

Is man a reasoning animal? Assuredly not. The notion that he is is one of the most ancient and ineradicable of all fallacies. Let us admit that some men have been reasoning animals, a very few men, but that man as a race is a reasoning animal—absurd!

This fallacy is intimately bound up these days with another, equally nonsensical. This modern and tributary fallacy—or, rather, corollary fallacy—is the silly belief that this is the most strenuous age in all the world's history. We gravely assert, and sincerely believe, that we are the most hurried and the hardest worked of the generations of men. We habitually speak of the "high tension" at which we labor; we quote with much gusto and thoughtless concurrence the phrase, "the strenuous life;" we speak of our "ninety-to-the-minute gait."

And the very next minute we disprove what we have just said. Being in a hurry to go a mile, we board a street car, and in absolute comfort and without any effort, traverse that mile in five minutes. Think of our forefathers, in like predicament. They would have run that mile, made it in fifteen minutes, would have been out of breath and sore for a week. Look all about you, and see what a rocking chair world of ease we live in. Look at the farmer riding his plow. Look at the merchant adding his figures with a machine. Look at the elevator displacing stairs, look at the telegraph displacing the courier, look at the telephone displacing the messenger boy. All about us is dispatch without loss of energy, labor completed without effort. Fie on our illusions: life is a snap.

Understand me, I speak by comparison with the past. I realize that the will is softened by inglorious ease. I know that in my depleted condition of will force it requires as much effort for me to rise at seven as it did for my grandfather to rise at four. The ratio of courage to achievement is an immutable quantity, and will be the same when mere thought can move the world as it was when the whole body sweat to capture a breakfast.

But now enters the element that affects our proposition about man as a reasoning animal. The thing the modern man has which man never had before is time. Modern life has so multiplied the individual power of production that the necessities of life—food, clothing, shelter—are turned out with vastly less labor per individual than ever before in the history of the race. The result has been that a relatively small proportion of mankind can now produce and distribute the necessities of the race. That leaves a large percentage of mankind to pursue other ends. In other words, the world has store against the future, and man has time, now and then, to pause and think. This has never been true of the race before.

And time—leisure—is the indispensable of reason. In primeval days man had no time to reason. He hearse a rustle in the grass behind him, his nerves shot to his brain the one word, "death!" and he leaped and ran. Experience, you say, taught him that, and experience, if you please, is a crude sort of reason. Yes, but very crude. The sort of reason that drives man, to escape one error, into something else, anything else, certainly something new and unknown—that is, into another error. To lead from error to error, that is all experience does, except man have reason to guide him.

I have just said that man never before had had time to reason. That is true as I meant it—that is, of man as a race, as a whole. The few apparent exceptions merely prove the rule. I heard you murmur, "But the Greeks," when I said it. True, the Greeks. And who, pray, were the Greeks? Fifteen thousand aristocrats who had solved the problem of obtaining leisure. They solved it by successful coercion of a hundred thousand slaves, who sweat and felt, but never reasoned, under the fifteen thousand aristocrats, all that the fifteen thousand might have time—leisure—to use reason. A brief interval of reason by a fragment of the human race, quickly ended.

And yet look at the glory of that little group, that little era. See what man can do when he has time to reason together. See how a blinding, dazzling light still glows from Athens, dust these 2,000 years. These silk-skinned athletes, resting in the shade, granted a little respite from the world of toil, evolved the age of reason, gave birth to the mathematics, to logic, to the drama, to sculpture, to painting, to architecture, to philosophy. Upon the fruit of that brief period, when a pitiful fraction of the race really had time to reason, feeds today all modern science, all modern art, all modern philosophy. We cannot think without paying tribute to Athens; we cannot build without studying her buildings; we cannot read without watching the radiance of her light. Aristotle made Bacon possible, and Bacon made all modern science possible. Every skyscraper that we build, every engine we contrive, goes back and bows to Euclid.

So the Greeks only prove the rule. They had the time, but they were not mankind, they were a fragment set up on a false base of economic and political foundation. They had to go. And with them went back into the dark night of ignorance and mere sensation the whole human race.

A while ago I heard you add, "And the Renaissance." True again. As if by spontaneous generation the womb of the race was filled and suddenly gave birth to the splendid galaxy that adorned the world. But whom, pray, do you mean when you say the Renaissance? Petrarch, Leonardo, Michael Angelo, Raphael, Titian, Shakespeare, Bacon—men of letters, men of art, students of philosophy. The answer is merely that once again man had an age of leisure, time to reason. The church had developed a leisure class, its monks, who had time to copy old manuscripts and retain knowledge. A few Italian merchant princes became political princes and developed a taste for adornment. They had the money and with it bought leisure for genius. That genius was touched and stimulated by a revival of learning in the other leisure class—the monks—and went back at once to the source of the monks' learning, the Greeks, and learned how to reason.

In England, in an age of unexampled national prosperity, and under the leisure-purveying patronage of the crown, Shakespeare and Bacon caught belated echoes of the Renaissance and brought reason to its highest modern flower.

But in Italy the source of leisure was, again, on a false economic and political base, and gave way. When the patron princes fell, leisure for even genius vanished, and darkness fell again upon mankind.

But in the world men, using the light of reason left behind, fought for sound political foundations and a reasoned economic base. Nations grew from petty states, life became valuable instead of cheap, commerce was made secure. Then the nineteenth century took hold of science. The heritage of Greece and Italy and Bacon fell to Darwin, to Huxley, to Pasteur, to Helmholtz, to all the great names of fifty years ago and less. Industry profited by science. Manufacture became easy, distribution easy. Democracy took hold of nations and raised the level of man, of men in the mass. Today we can spare millions of men from the business of getting the world's meals to the business of thinking the world's thoughts. We have used these spare millions mainly to think thoughts that will make easier the task of the getting of the other millions' meals. But at least, man now has time to think, to reason, to pause before he acts, to do things upon reasonable bases instead of upon the impulses of the moment and under the instant stress of self-preservation. An age of leisure has dawned, an age of reason.

And so is it nonsense to talk of our stren-nous age and of our hurried gait. We are taking things easier than ever was dreamed possible. And so is it nonsense to talk of man being a reasoning animal. Man has only just begun to be a reasoning animal, the vista of opportunity for him to reason has just opened, we begin to see that the day is coming when man—not a few men—will have time to be a reasoning animal.

How many reasonable animals do you know? How many of the acts of your life are based on reason rather than emotion or sensation or tradition or habit or accident? Mighty few. How many farmers till their fields the way father did, and how many go to the Berkeley experiment station to find out the way their grandsons will? How many housekeepers cook the sort of biscuits mother used to bake, and how many go to a scientific teacher and learn why mother raised a family of dyspeptics? How many people carry a potato in their hip pockets to ward off rheumatism when the doctor around the corner knows that rheumatism is a germ disease that has no more relation to Ireland's staple food than it has to the San Francisco fire? How many people play the races and the slot machine when the next door high school teacher of mathematics knows perfectly well that it is just as impossible to make a fortune out of those devices as it is to lift yourself over the fence by your own boot straps? How many merchants and manufacturers try to charge all the traffic will bear and pay their help less than a living wage, when any student of economics can tell them that they are burning the candle at both ends and are going to get their hands burnt, if not here then in the hereafter?

If man is a reasoning animal, why does Rockefeller have half a billion dollars while half a million people in New York city hang forever on the hunger line? If this age of reason is in full glow instead of just beginning to dawn on the horizon, why are there five hundred Christian creeds and about the same number of simon-pure Christians in the world? If reason sits by every hearthstone, why is justice hard to find?

If reason is in use by everyone, it follows that truth has been found. If truth has been found, why is there revolution in Portugal, why does a king sit on a tottering throne in Spain, why does a Czar tremble in his palace and a peasant in his hut, why does a United States divide into two political camps and fight a quadrennial battle for the possession of power?

Reason! Reason, indeed! We are still in the swaddling band of new-born hope of being some day reasonable. We have moiled and sweat through the ages to keep the wolf from the door, we have stolen a day a week to shout our disputatious creeds for the salvation of our souls, we have dodged and run and fought to keep our spirits from a violent severance from our bodies, but we have, as mankind, never had time to reason. Emotion has been our guide—fear. Fear of death, fear of the devil, fear of God, fear of one another, fear of our shadows. O. Henry touched a universal chord the other day when, dying, he said to the physician, "Turn up the lights, I'm afraid to go home in the dark." The race has only just stopped running away from things, and has not yet wholly got its breath. And, remember, the words were, "Come, let us reason together," not, "Let us reason as we run."

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

Ma's Hobble Skirt

When ma firs' got her hobble skirt
An' wore it home for us to see,
"What is this thing in which you're girt?"
My Uncle Henry says, says he,
An' pa he heaved a hefty sigh,
For 'twas a shock, I guess, to pa,
But wors' of all was baby's cry—
You see, he didn't know his ma.

Then me an' Tommy we both laffed
Till ma says, "Tie your mouths in crape!"
But pa says, "Helen, are you daft?"
Where did you git that turnip shape?"
We had more fun 'an I can tell,
Except that 'twas a blow for pa,
But baby looked an' give a yell—
You see, he didn't know his ma.

Then ma she says, "Hush, darlin', hush!"
It is your ma, my own'ty own!"
But pa he says, "Oh, worl' of mush!"
Is this here sprung from seed I've sown?"
Then me an' Tommy snickered 'gain,
An' Uncle Henry says, "Har-ha!"
But baby yelled to show his pain—
You see, he didn't know his ma.

My Uncle Henry says he thinks
That we'll be broken in at last;
He says pa's taperin' off on drinks,
Which shows that he's recoverin' fast;
An' Sister Susie says, "I guess
I want one like—" "No more!" says pa;
But baby's cryin' less an' less—
You see, he's gittin' used to ma.

Luella's Party

Luella gave a party the other day. Luella is my daughter, and those who were present ranged from eleven to sixteen years in age. Also, I was present, like a lobster in a school of minnows. The children played and disported themselves, and I tried to play and disport myself, but I must have presented somewhat of the appearance of an elephant dancing a minuet. They shrieked and laughed, and I tried to shriek and laugh with them, but I couldn't see much that seemed to me to warrant shrieks and laughter, and I fear that my bass mingled with their merry childish treble much like a few notes from the Miserere in a song of praise.

My crotchety masculine friend and my gray-haired feminine friend, what is it that has come over us in the last thirty, forty or fifty years, that we have lost the soul of laughter out of our lives? Why is it that little things amuse us no more? How is it that our little ones find food for merriment in the very places where we sigh? Wherefore are they glad for that in which we find no gladness? "Of such is the Kingdom"; is it, then, because in the creeping years that have gone we have wandered away from the Kingdom?

Answer these questions as you will, my sedate friend; and, after you have answered them, what would you give to go back over the rearward track which you have traversed, and can traverse no more, to the time when little things brought gladness unto you, and laughter was the native music of your soul? Ah, you need not tell me what you would give, though it be the best that life now lends you, for I, too, have traversed the track and too largely have forgotten to laugh at the little things, and I know.

Ah, we are world-worn and pessimistic old growlers. Let's go back and again learn how to laugh, with equal abandon in any case, at much or little or nothing. What do you say? Shall it be so?

The Queer Political Game

Tabbs—There's one queer thing about the political game of running for office.

Nubbs—What's that?

"It's the only game of which I know in which a man would feel justified in drawing to his hand if he held nothing better than nine spot high without a pair."

The Opinions of Rufus

I've 'most concluded I won't judge a man by what he did till I find out 'bout how sorry he is fer it.

On the great Judgment Day I reckon the best some of us can do will be to stand up an' say we're ready to take what's comin' to us.

Josh Bings says he wouldn't be so pessimistic 'bout men if he hadn't noticed women so much.

Faith may make you hull, but sometimes a doctor's medicine is middlin' useful in keepin' you so.

Es 'tween marryin' a angel or a mere woman, Ezry, I b'lieve I'd take my chances on marryin' the woman. She'd be less likely, I reckon, to find out 'bout you.

They's some women that I don't know a single thing 'gainst—'cept the men they married, o' course.

Laff, an' the world laffs with you—that is, unless the part of the world that's present happens to be English.

If folks had to have reel thoughts 'fore they could talk this would be a middlin' mum world.

Sometimes seems 'to me that if my neighbor could regerate my morals an' I could regerate his our show fer heaven would be a good deal better'n it is.

Josh Bings says when he sees a pretty woman dressed all in white it allers makes him feel repentant that he's a sinner.

Eli Pennick brought up his boys never to tell a lie. An' then he let 'em go a-fishin'!

Poor old Ab Sutton become a leadin' citizen last week. His uncle left him nigh a million dollars.

Stayin' with a thing is what wins. A dew-drop's es pretty es a diamond, but it don't fetch es much in the market 'cause it don't last es long.

He Reports No More

He was a very new and very ardent young reporter who had been reared among good influences and expected to make a Great Editor some day, so when he went to the city editor his face was beaming with happy anticipation.

"If we handle it carefully," he said, "I believe that I have got a scoop on all the other papers," for already he had heard that a scoop was the summum bonum of a reporter's existence.

"So?" said the city editor, for he was case-hardened, and had learned not to expect too much of young reporters.

"You bet I have!"

"Startling murder in your neighborhood?" the city editor inquired, with mild interest.

"No, but—"

"Elopement in high society, with special thrills in it?"

"No, nothing like that, but—"

"Woman traded her good name for a place in a chauffeur's automobile?"

"No, it's nothing of that sort, but—"

"Well, what is it then?"

"Why, the secretary of our Y. M. C. A., who is a friend of mine, has received word that the international body is going to offer prizes in an oratorical contest to be world-wide and to attract—"

"Nothing doing," the city editor interrupted him. "This paper isn't any Pink Pills for Pale People. What we want is news. When you get an interesting murder that the people enjoy reading about come in again. Until then you may consider yourself fired."

So another Great Editor was nipped in the bud.

She Wept Bequets

A Southern girl fond of bouquets

Said, "Alas! for the blossom dequets."

When they asked why she cried

She only replied,

In Southern vernacular, "Quets."

A Fable for Right Now

For a long time the mighty S. P. fish had swam about in the Public Pond and had waxed fat on any and all smaller fish that chanced to appeal to their appetite.

And it came to pass that in a certain season there was an epidemic of New Nationalism, which was due to an Insurgent Wave, which latter was due to the fact that the smaller fish objected to being swallowed, and when the mighty S. P. fish looked about them for something to eat, lo, there were naught to be found save Johnson fish and Bell fish.

Thereupon did the mighty S. P. fish call a secret convention, and the Herrin fish, which was made its chairman, addressed the convention as follows:

"Behold," he said, "we are up against it, and nothing is left unto us except to make a choice. It is true," he added, "that we held the Bell fish distasteful four years ago, and it cannot be doubted that it does not pleasantly appeal to our palates. But look at the Johnson fish!" he added, with a superb burst of oratory. "Its spines of protest against our tyranny and its fins of faith in the self-redeeming power of the people are so large that we cannot possibly get them down our gullets. Under the circumstances, it is evident that this is a case of take the Bell fish, distasteful though it may be, or go hungry. Need I say more?"

The Herrin fish did not need to say more, for immediately a motion was made, seconded and carried that they live on the Bell fish, and also that an effort be made to cast the Johnson fish out of the Public Pond.

Moral (as the Herrin fish suggested): Better a fish that is distasteful than one that absolutely cannot be swallowed.

* * *

He Knew It All Except—

He could name all the flowers in Latin so long That I haven't the space to name one in this song;

He knew how the great constellations were placed,

And the stars in their courses he easily traced;

The rocks told a tale which to him was revealed,

And naught scientific from him was concealed;

He'd describe how the atoms and molecules clash—

But he wasn't worth a whoop in the scrabble for cash.

With doctors profound he would hem and would haw,

And he had a firm grasp on the Ultimate Law;

The High Criticism he hoisted some higher,

And he handled sans gloves theological fire;

All marvels and wonders he certainly knew,

For he even could tell what our Teddy would do;

He could follow man's course to its ultimate ash—

But he wasn't worth a whoop in the scrabble for cash.

He died and was buried, at public expense,

And the crowd at his funeral wasn't immense;

And the thing that I've wondered runs something like this:

Is he counted as wise in the Country of Bliss?

Does he all the wonders eternal explain

To angels who feel their own learning is vain?

What matter? What matter? Here's comfort to spare.

No scrabble for shekels will trouble him there.

* * *

A Wise Man's Precaution

"Hold on, old man!"

"Can't. I'm in a hurry."

"What's the rush?"

"Got to go to my lawyer's to have my will prepared."

"That will hold over till tomorrow."

"No, it won't. I'm going to take a joy ride this evening."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Think of the Strain of It The public needs to be a bit charitable toward its leading candidates of whatever political party. The strain they are under is extreme and if they now and again lose their tempers, or return answers not calculated to turn away wrath think of what you, gentle reader, even if you tried ever so hard to be gentle, what you would do if you had been on the rack for weeks and months, if your nerves had been strung to concert pitch and never let down. Our political campaigns in a great state like California, make tremendous demands upon the nerves and vitalities of men.

With Theodore Bell the strain, great as it has been, has been comparatively light. The Democratic party ticket was mainly nominated at the Argonaut Hotel in San Francisco. The Bell end of it was ratified at a selected convention at Los Angeles. No Democrat had to make a primary fight for nomination. The Bell program was well greased and swallowed whole.

Not so in the case of Hiram Johnson. He made, at the primary election, the most stupendous personal campaign ever made in any state, merely as a preliminary to the campaign just closing. For five straight months he did nothing else than to take his message to the people of California. With a fortnight or so of rest he had to up and at 'em again, fighting, not alone his opponent, no mean adversary by any means, but the kennel of Hades itself, the higher-ups and the lower-downs, day after day and night after night, facing all kinds of people, facing down all kinds of calumnies, trying to look pleasant when he is fighting mad through and through—well, if the reader (who probably cannot pursue the elusive collar button to its lair without using strong language) will put himself in Johnson's place when he hears of Johnson having lost his temper, he will be able to make allowances. The wonder is that the man is alive if he were not a wonder he would not be.

A Suggestion Of the Whine The canvass of Bell and Spellacy has, under the pressure of the contest and the strain, developed into a semi-whining plea for votes because they are orphans and won't have any place to go if they do not go to Sacramento. Bell tells of the hard trials he had coming up from poverty, and of the sacrifices he has made in the interests of his ambition to lead a public life. Spellacy frankly begs the people to give Theodore and himself a chance, "please good people take pity on us and let us in," is the substance if not the exact text of his refrain. The lack of dignity and grit is as significant in their case as the lack of tenderness and tact is in the case of Johnson, and it is forty times more inglorious. Bell is a good fellow. Spellacy is a good fellow. They are neither of them oak-hearted nor second growth hickory. They are soft woods and, however good their intentions, will not be able to withstand the strain of political and financial pressure while in office, if they succeed in getting into office. That is why the interests are on their side. The interests know of what kind of timber they are made.

Square-Jawed Hiram Johnson Death and destruction to that stick of timber, human or unhuman, that is all right up to the point when the supreme test of efficiency comes to be applied to it and then breaks down under the strain and leaves you all of a heap. The well-meaning weak man is such a stick of timber.

But if the voter will take a good look at the Johnson jaw as it thrusts out at him from button or billboard, or from wherever else the Johnson visage is portrayed, he is a poor judge of character if he does not know that the owner of the Johnson jaw is no weakling. He may be a little hard to manage. He may be a bit self-willed and headstrong. Nettle, he may turn upon one and half eat 'em alive, but he will stay put. What he says he will do if he lives. The spirit of old Andrew Jackson is in him. And with all proper respect for the mild-mannered Theodore Bell, and for the pussy-footed Tim Spellacy, Hiram W. Johnson, as governor, will do more for California than a regiment of such men. He is the Man of the Hour.

Alleged Agreement To Bolt the Ticket In order to win the "organization" Republican voters to his standard, Theodore Bell has declared that certain Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican leaders stated to him that, in the event of the nomination of any Republican except Johnson, they would support Bell if nominated, in proof of which what certain members of the Good Government organization of Los Angeles had said is introduced in evidence.

If such assurances were given Bell they were given and received in confidence and his violation of that confidence is such a breach of faith as proclaims him a moral weakling.

But the Good Government organization of Los Angeles was and is not at all the same thing as the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League of California, although many members of the league were also members of the Good Government organization, which also contained Democrats, as well as Republicans of "organization" affiliations, men who were for good government first and party afterward.

That is the stand of E. T. Earl, of the Los Angeles Express, and of E. A. Dickson, his political employe and associate. Likely enough these gentlemen are convictable of placing good government above party and of trying to get the Democrats to put up a clean ticket so that clean men would have a chance to vote for clean men if the Republicans should, unhappily, nominate unclean men for office. Men have been guilty of worse offenses than that and have nevertheless found peace for their souls.

Finally, it was a matter that nobody needed to tell anybody, for everybody of sense knew without being told, that, in the event of the triumph of Herrinism in the Republican primary, tens of thousands of free Republicans would have cast their votes for Bell. Nothing could have prevented it except the manifestation, on the part of Bell himself, of that susceptibility to the lure of office which has so militated against him in this campaign.

This admission will not drive Republicans from Johnson. It may drive away a few Herrinites, but all Republicans, leal and true Republicans, whether "organization" or Lincoln-Roosevelt, rejoice in the fact that the party is at last free. And for every Herrinite Republican driven to Bell from this cause a score of free Democrats will be attracted to Johnson.

No matter what Republican leaders might or might not promise to do if Johnson were defeated at the primaries they could not have stopped the tide of free men toward Bell. Only Bell could have done that and, judging by the sort of campaign he has made against Johnson, it is not unlikely that Bell's own conduct would have stemmed that tide abundantly. He is not of the stern stuff that either heroes or martyrs are made of, well-meaning and likeable though he is.

But, as a matter of fact, the leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League movement held no conferences with Theodore Bell and promised him nothing.

The Watchman's State Ticket The Watchman's standard of advice for others in voting is what he would do were he in the voter's place. Judged by that standard his state ticket is as follows:

Governor—Hiram W. Johnson.
Lieutenant-Governor—Albert J. Wallace.
Justice of Supreme Court—William P. Lawlor.
Justice of Supreme Court—M. C. Sloss.
Secretary of State—S. S. Bayley.
Controller—A. B. Nye.
Treasurer—W. R. Williams.
Attorney-General—U. S. Webb.
Surveyor-General—William S. Kingsbury.
Clerk of Supreme Court—B. Grant Taylor.
Superintendent of State Printing—D. W. Ravenscroft.
Superintendent of Public Instruction—Edward Hyatt.

The Watchman's District Ticket The Watchman cannot vote all over the state. The law won't let him, but if he were permitted to vote by proxy in all the subdivisions of the state he would vote about so:
For members of congress—Englebright, Kent, Knowland, Macarthur, Hayes, Needham, Stephens and Smith. He would choke a little on Englebright, but swallow him as the best thing to be done under the circumstances. The Republicans of that district should bring out a bigger and better man next time.

With reference to the State Board of Equalization, a very important arm of government, frankly, The Watchman knows no especial reasons why either Democrats or Republicans should bolt their tickets.

All things considered, The Watchman is inclined to sustain the Republican nominees for the railroad commission. Of Alexander Gordon and John M. Eshleman there can be no question. The source of Mr. Loveland's original appointment was objectionable. If he had not been known to be acceptable to the railroad interests he would not have been selected, but with Gordon and Eshleman on the board with him he will be powerless to show the railroad interests any unwarranted favors even if so disposed, and he does know something of rate-making. The knowledge he has acquired will be of advantage to his associates. Besides, The Watchman is not sure that justice would not require that one member of the board be representative of the transportation view of the transportation question. Heretofore the railroad interests have had either two out of three or the whole three. That plan did not work well. What is wanted is absolute justice between shipper and carrier, consumer and producer. Of Barclay Henley, The Watchman thinks highly, and if there were not to be one lawyer on the board (Mr. Eshleman) he would certainly support Mr. Henley's candidacy.

The Watchman's Appellate Ticket The Watchman's preference for presiding judge for the first District Court of Appeals is Judge James V. Coffey, of San Francisco, the Democratic candidate, and this without the smallest disrespect for the Republican candidate, Judge Lennon, who is a man of high character, but Judge Coffey will give to that court a strength and confidence in the public mind that almost no other judge can, and that court is in great need of being so strengthened.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK---Continued

In the second appellate district The Watchman would vote for Victor E. Shaw, for the full term because he has made good, and for Judge Conrey of Los Angeles in preference to Judge James, for the unexpired term, more because of the political influences behind the two men, respectively, than for any other reason.

In the third district Judge Burnett has made good and should be re-elected.

Bell Betrayed Into Downright Falsehood In his Dreamland Rink speech Theodore Bell declared that the "Republican insurgents in this state have been arrogant and bigoted," that they proceeded upon the "unwarranted and purely gratuitous and unfounded assumption that unless a man belonged to the so-called insurgent movement of this state he is not a decent man—he not only ought to be kicked out of the Republican party, but he ought to be ostracized from decent society in the state of California."

In so declaring Mr. Bell allowed the lure of office to betray him into absolute falsehood. The only persons who were so denounced by any person who had a right to speak in the name of Republican insurgency were William F. Herrin and the willing tools employed by him in betraying the Republican party into the hands of special interests, and nothing was said as to the private characters even of these men. It was only their public and political relations that were criticised.

Mr. Bell's sympathies should have been, and until he found that the triumph of Johnson at the primaries involved his own defeat at the general election, they were with the insurgent cause. Then he became wonderfully sympathetic with "organization" Republicanism and distrustful of the Republicanism of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League.

There never was a manlier campaign conducted in this or any other state than that made by Hiram W. Johnson and his associates for a free California and a free Republican party. They were indignant rather than arrogant; profoundly in earnest rather than bigoted. A more splendid triumph of righteousness than theirs neither this state nor this country has witnessed in a generation. There is good stuff in Theodore Bell, and when this campaign shall have ended, and the smart of his defeat shall have ceased to sting, no one will be more ashamed than he of the friends he has made in the last two months or more sorrowful for those he has lost.

Theodore Bell At Dreamland The Watchman affirms, in this final issue before the election, that Theodore A. Bell is a clean-minded, well-intentioned young man of excellent abilities and honorable ambitions, but he is not strong. He has not that toughness of moral, mental or physical fibre that is required to carry on to completion the splendid work of freeing California from corporation domination which he so finely espoused four years ago. He bends before the storm. He yields to pressure. The lure of office deflects from his true course. His weakness is a fatal objection to his candidacy.

By all outward signs and symptoms Theodore Bell should be in hearty sympathy with that newer nationalism that is shaking the nation to its foundations. He should be a Roosevelt Democrat, but he is not. His need for attracting "organization" Republicans to his support has betrayed him into denouncing the Republican insurgent movement in California, which is only a part of the national movement, in unmeasured terms and to ally himself definitely with the standpat element in both the Republican party and his own. If he go into office it will be with that element behind him, beholden to it, and he will be representative of it. He has not the strength to resist hard pressure.

No one needs to be told that if Johnson had been defeated in the primary campaign Bell would have made a very different campaign from what he has. Not one word of censure of Republican insurgency, of Johnson, or Lissner or Rowell, would have escaped his lips.

On the contrary, he would have honeyed and treacled and paid court to them and he would have adjoined all Roosevelt Republicans to flock to his standard as they loved liberty and wished to see California free. Theodore Bell trims his sails to suit the political winds that do blow. He breasts no storm that he can avoid. No man is stronger than the weakest spot in him and Mr. Bell's weak spot is his love for political preferment. "Though he speak with the tongue of men and of angels," and have not strength of will, robustness of courage, a rock-ribbed power to resist political pressure, he is a "tinkling cymbal" and won't do at such a time as this when the manhood of America is aroused as never before to fight for political freedom and to resist corporation domination. If Theodore Bell have any claim upon a reactionary Republicanism he certainly has none upon a progressive Democracy.

The Truth About Kent The San Francisco Sun, of last Wednesday, contained an attack on William Kent, based on an affidavit sworn to by one F. H. Collier. The substance of Collier's affidavit is this: "that there are now employed on said property [Kent's ranch home in Marin county] and have been for two years past, a number of Chinese laborers, usually as many as seven; that all the farming operations on said property are performed by said Chinese laborers."

The facts are these: Mr. Kent, owing to the well-known inability of country residents to keep white domestic servants at any price, has been compelled to hire a Chinese cook. He pays this cook $75 a month and keep, which is the topnotch price paid white domestic servants, so that this Chinaman does not compete with any white labor. He is simply willing to work where white servants refuse to work. Furthermore, Mr. Kent absolutely never employed any Oriental labor in any capacity until the exclusion act made it certain that no additional Chinese would be allowed to compete with white labor. Mr. Kent has never, at any time—on principle—employed a Japanese, because no such exclusion act operates against Japanese.

On the Kent ranch are two other Chinese, employed not by Kent but by his mother, to do menial tasks unacceptable to white labor. The statement that the farm work on the Kent ranch is done by Chinese is a falsehood. The foreman is William Jones, an American. His chief assistant is Robert Cunningham, a Scotchman. Several other Americans and two or three Italians make up the farm crew.

This Collier affidavit is of a piece with the anonymous activities of the "Zumwalt Non-Partisan Club of the Second Congressional District," which is issuing a circular containing such falsehoods as that Kent has spent practically all his life in Chicago, that Kent does not understand or sympathize with laboring men, that Kent spent $50,000 to obtain the Republican nomination, and similar nonsense, disproved by Kent's records.

Hiram Johnson's Client Brown Theodore Bell has stated that Hiram Johnson left the graft prosecution to undertake the defense of Dalzell Brown. This statement is not true. Hiram Johnson publicly announced his severance from the graft prosecution on October 28, 1907, at which time it was not known that Dalzell Brown had committed any crime. Dalzell Brown was not indicted until December 20, 1907, and Hiram Johnson did not take his case until several days thereafter. Johnson's first appearance in court in behalf of Brown was on January 2, 1908. Hiram Johnson was not connected with the graft prosecution at any time during his connection with the Brown case.

Frank E. Hering, Bell's imported orator, has asserted, mainly by innuendo in the form of questions, that Hiram Johnson received a fee of $55,000 from Dalzell Brown, wholly or in part in the form of stocks of the Western Pacific railroad that were properly a part of the assets of the California Safe Deposit company. This also is untrue. Johnson received a fee of far less than $55,000, and no part of it consisted of Western Pacific stock.

Propositions and Constitutional Amendments

Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 1—Providing for the separation of State and local taxation, and providing for the taxation of public utilities and other corporations for the benefit of the State.	Yes	X
Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 2—Providing that the State shall not be bound by any contract or obligation by which a debt is secured when land is pledged as security for the payment thereof, together with the money represented by such debt, shall be exempt from taxation.	No	X
Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 36—Relating to Judges of the Superior Court.	Yes	X
Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 38—Relating to the formation of new counties, and altering the boundary lines of existing counties.	No	X
Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 44—Providing for the classification by the legislature of cities and towns by population for the purpose of regulating the business of banking.	No	X
Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 52—Relating to how money may be appropriated and drawn from the State treasury, and providing for the raising of $5,000,000 to be used in establishing, maintaining, and supporting in the City and County of San Francisco the Panama-Pacific International Exposition.	Yes	X
Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 14—Relating to the right of the people to fish.	No
Assembly Constitutional Amendment No. 35—Authorizing the City and County of San Francisco to amend its charter in aid of Panama-Pacific International Exposition.	No	X
"For the San Francisco Harbor Improvement Act of 1909."
"This act provides for the improvement of San Francisco Harbor and for the payment of all costs thereof out of San Francisco Harbor Improvement Fund."	X
"Against the San Francisco Harbor Improvement Act of 1909."
"This Act provides for the improvement of San Francisco Harbor and for the payment of all costs thereof out of San Francisco Harbor Improvement Fund."
"For the State Highway Act."
"Against the State Highway Act."	X
"For the India Basin Act."
"This Act provides for the acquisition of a tidal basin in the Bay of San Francisco for harbor purposes, and for the payment of all costs thereof out of the San Francisco Harbor Improvement Fund."	X
"Against the India Basin Act."
"This Act provides for the acquisition of a tidal basin in the Bay of San Francisco for harbor purposes, and for the payment of all costs thereof out of the San Francisco Harbor Improvement Fund."
"For the San Diego Sewerage Act."	X
"Against the San Diego Sewerage Act."

THE CRIPPEN TRIAL---A MODEL

AN EXAMPLE OF BRITISH JUSTICE, SWIFT BUT DIGNIFIED

The Crippen case in London, gave a vivid illustration of the English method of administering the criminal law. The best account of the legal side of this trial we have seen is in a recent issue of the New York Sun. We reproduce it here for the study and comparison of our readers. It will repay a careful reading. Says the Sun of October 23:

Lord Alverstone, Lord Chief Justice of England, is the most impressive and dignified figure on the British bench. Robed in ermine and scarlet and attended by the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs wearing their official robes and gold chains of office, he is the personification of judicial strength, of which the black and gold scabbarded sword is the emblem. Beneath him sat the black gowned, white wigged clerk, and in the well of the court between him and the prisoner's dock, where Crippen's dapper, insignificant figure was dwarfed by the burly forms of three warders, sat gowned and wigged counsellors at a large table, at which the instructing solicitors with books and papers were also seated.

Three loud knocks behind the Judge's seat warned the court of the Chief Justice's entrance, preceded by a mace bearer and accompanied by the officials already mentioned. The Judge and the standing court exchange bows, and forthwith the trial begins. Twelve men file into the jury box and are sworn one by one to see justice between "Our Sovereign Lord the King" and the prisoner. Three jurors, and this is very exceptional, are rejected by the prisoner's counsel. It is done by an almost inaudible word. The men's personal appearance was sufficient explanation of their rejection. Three others are brought in, and within eight minutes of the Judge's entrance the jury is empanelled, the prisoner is arraigned and the clerk reads the indictment to Crippen, who pleads not guilty.

"Mr. Muir," says the Judge, and the leading counsel for the Crown stands up and begins his statement of the case for the prosecution in calm, passionless language, without a gesture, without the slightest attempt at rhetoric, with no trace of feeling against the prisoner, frequently even pointing out facts which may tell in the prisoner's favor. In eighty minutes counsel gave a lucid masterpiece of narrative, throughout which he confined himself to the admitted facts of the long story of the relations between Crippen and his wife and his mistress.

Once only in the four and a half days did counsel protest at anything that happened. This was done by counsel for the defense, who objected to the introduction of a Crown witness after the case for the Crown had been closed. The Judge said: "I will admit the evidence so far as it is justified by the prosecuting counsel's opening statement."

Counsel for the defense remained standing a moment in further protest.

"I will take care of you, Mr. Tobin," said the Judge. Counsel bowed and took his seat.

The incident occupied hardly a minute.

Not a single witness was examined or cross-examined by counsel on either side without the Judge's intervention, sometimes requesting counsel to make his question clearer, sometimes helping the witness to couch his answer; always making every effort to save time. It mattered nothing whether it was a Crown or defense witness, when counsel had finished with him or her the Judge would say: "Now I want to ask a few questions." Then in three or four lucid questions he would elicit in plain, concise form what counsel would take twenty minutes and innumerable questions to get out. Then the Judge would ask a few questions, always straight to the point, which counsel had overlooked or did not desire put.

A good example of the manner in which Lord Alverstone took the case into his own hands was his dealing with the medical witnesses for the defense. The identification of the mutilated remains, apart from the fragments of garments buried with them and from mere inference, depended upon whether a mark on a piece of flesh was the scar of an operation or merely a mark caused by folding and pressure when beneath the bricks of the cellar floor. The medical experts for the Crown brought overwhelming evidence to prove the mark was a scar, and it was known that Belle Elmore had such a scar, the result of an operation.

The medical witness for the defense gave a directly opposite opinion. After both counsel had finished with him the Judge took him in hand, pressed him and shook his evidence. Then, expressing regret that the witness had absented himself from the court when the Crown witnesses gave their evidence, he called one of the latter into the witness box and made him demonstrate on a piece of skin and flesh his grounds for declaring the mark must be a scar. This done the Judge said to the witness for the defense, "Now, after hearing and seeing Mr. Pepper's reasons for declaring the mark must be a scar resulting from such an operation, is not your opinion modified? Do you not think it may be a scar?"

The witness adhered to his own opinion, but when he left the witness box there was no doubt that his evidence had been robbed of all value in the jury's eyes.

Earlier in the case, when numerous exhibits of the dead woman's jewelry were produced for identification by witnesses, the Judge examined all and selected a few for the jury to inspect, dismissing the rest as of commonplace, ordinary appearance and thus of no value for purposes of identification, so that it would only be a waste of time for the jury to examine them.

Again, when counsel for the defense outlined the story of Crippen's arrangement with the quartermaster to hide him on board the steamer Montrose, after the first sentence the Judge interposed, asking: "Do you produce the quartermaster?"

"No, my Lord," counsel responded.

The Judge nodded, and the weak story, evidently shortened, fell ineffective from counsel's lips. So it was throughout the trial; the Judge would pull up counsel when, after receiving an answer from a witness, they worked around to the same question.

"He has answered you," Lord Alverstone would say, "and you must take his answer."

Frequently he would interpose, telling counsel: "It is now time to establish this point," or to press another point as being important. It was the Judge's questions that made Crippen contradict himself on an important question, the date of the purchase and who purchased, whether himself or his wife, the incriminating suit of pajamas, part of which was found with the remains.

Twice the Judge intervened in behalf of Crippen, once when the prosecution was pressing him as to what he meant by the word "it" when he said to Inspector Dew of Quebec: "It is only fair to say I told Miss Le Neve nothing about it." Crippen said he had meant he had told her nothing of his series of lying letters and telegrams. The Judge made counsel accept the answer, but in summing up he drew attention to the weakness of the explanation. Again he refused to put a question a jurymen suggested because, said he, "it is rather argumentative."

In fact, it is hardly too much to say he was the chief conductor of the case both for the Crown and the defense. What little could be suggested in Crippen's favor he pointed out in summing up. What points might be considered debatable—and they were very few—he stated, saying it was for the jury to decide on them. But his whole lucid retelling of the story from the evidence could not have been more damning had it come from the mouth of the prosecuting counsel. Indeed, its impressive delivery and its aloofness from all personal feeling made it far more convincing of the prisoner's guilt than the final address of the prosecution to the jury.

Mrs. Lionel Marks, wife of Professor Marks of Cambridge, Mass., who is known in the literary world by her maiden name, Josephine Preston Peabody, has had her play produced at Stratford-on-Avon, which she wrote for the prize festival play. She comes of an old Boston family and is a graduate of Radcliffe. Before her marriage she was an instructor in Wellesley College.

Town and Country

THE city and the country are linked together by Bell Telephone service.

The city man when away can keep in touch with his office and business interests.

In a like manner, the man from the country who is visiting in the city, can telephone his home and find out how things are.

This is possible all over the country because Bell Telephone service is universal.

THE PACIFIC TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO.

THE CALIFORNIA STATE LIBRARY

ITS ORIGIN, HISTORY AND PRESENT USES

By MILTON J. FERGUSON, Assistant State Librarian

The California State Library is an institution having more than 150,000 volumes; its law collection is one of the best in the western part of the United States; its general library is rich in Californiana, history, art, sociology and other lines; it is headed by a man who actually knows the library business, and under whose direction a staff of more than thirty persons works with business-like directness.

Origin

On January 24, 1850, the legislature passed a law providing for the establishment of a state library, of which the secretary of state was made ex-officio librarian. The law left this officer largely to his own devices in the management of the library; its only specific direction to him covered the subject of distribution of official state documents. Later in the same session, April 9th, another act defining the duties of the state librarian and prescribing rules for the management of the state library was passed. State officials, alone, were eligible to borrow books.

The Fund

But alas for the early development of the library, the legislature forgot one essential—no money was turned into its treasury. So the backbone of the collection, for a time at least, was the one hundred volumes given the state by John C. Fremont, who, on January 19th, received a vote of thanks from the senate for his generosity. In those days, these one hundred books on law, medicine, travel and a few government documents formed a pretty respectable library. It was during the third session of the legislature, in 1852, that the library fund was created, by requiring each officer, civil or military, commissioned by the governor, to pay five dollars to the secretary of state for that purpose. The controller was likewise directed, in making settlement with the members of the legislature, to hold out five dollars from the pay of each, and to credit the library with the total. From 1853 until 1901 all fees collected by the secretary of state became a part of the state library fund. In the latter year the law governing fees collected by the secretary of state was amended and the amount thereby greatly increased; so the library was given a definite sum of $2,500 per month. Since 1901 this allowance has been increased gradually until at the present time it amounts to $5,000; and considering the work being done by the institution is decidedly inadequate.

The Trustees

In 1852 the first library board, consisting of five members, all of whom were state officials, was provided for. The legislature of 1861 decided that three of the members should be elected by it, on joint ballot. Until 1899 the legislature retained the immediate appointing authority; and as a consequence the library was periodically thrown into the political arena. In 1899 better advice prevailed; and the trustees became appointees of the governor. The boards have almost invariably been composed of men who desired the best results from the institution in their care; their error, if such it might be called, was one of method. Library system is a new thing; so it was not until the administration of the present librarian that far reaching plans were formed for the library, aside from the law departments, and consistently carried out.

The New Administration

From April 1, 1899, dates the new order of things. The newly appointed librarian, like his predecessors, came into office frankly as a political appointee. He was a business man trained in the art of getting results, a vigorous thinker and straightforward in his methods. The biennial report made within a few months of his taking office shows clearly that he was beginning to see larger things as a possibility for the state library. The business methods of his office were speedily made to conform to well recognized principles of accountancy. Reports of the work done in his institution and of his recommendations looking toward its betterment, together with a tabulated statement of expenses, were regularly made to the board of trustees. Persons desiring an easy reserved seat in the library, and a place on the pay roll were asked what their qualifications were for such a business as library work. Regular hours were insisted upon; and a time clock, the only one in the capitol, was installed. By the time the new man was well in the saddle he ceased to be merely a political appointee and began with an admirable fund of strength and energy to serve the people of the state through their state library. At first things naturally moved slowly; but the wheels were started and they have never stopped.

The Departments at Present

In 1903 the librarian made a trip east, visiting some score or more of the large state and public libraries. He had been told that New York, for example, was doing a wonderful work in sending small collections of good books to the people who lived in hamlet and village and country district, far removed from the privileges of a town library. He saw what the east was doing in the matter of making books of use to the people and came home determined to put the institution in the very forefront of the most progressive libraries. When he went into office he found a law department and a general department of the library; henceforth new divisions of work and duties began to be made until now there are well defined departments as follows: the law department, the reference department, the California department, the documents department, the order and accessions department, the catalogue department, the legislative and municipal reference department and the extension department.

Law Department

Naturally legislators busy making and unmaking laws would first of all desire access to a collection of law books. Consequently the early laws on the state library directed that books on law, political economy and history be procured. In 1855 a select committee on the state library was appointed by the legislature with the purpose of recommending some plan to supplement the very inadequate and incomplete collection of books. William B. Olds, owner of the San Francisco Law Library, offered to sell his library of American, English, French and Spanish law books numbering upwards of 3,500 volumes, and, in accordance with the recommendation of the committee the legislature of 1855 voted the sum of $17,250 for that purpose. This purchase at once put the state law collection at the head of similar libraries in the west.

Even well-equipped attorneys could not hope or even desire to own such an array of legal literature as the law department of the state library now possesses. Packed on the shelves in the room that was once the supreme court chamber will be found more than 40,000 volumes. The books of William B. Olds' San Francisco Law Library are lost in the crowd of later acquisitions, though volumes still bearing the little label of this first law library daily turn up among the books pulled from the shelves by the lawyer tracing his case back to time-honored sources. The lawyer with a difficult and important case is drawn to the law department of the state library for such things as British reports in complete sets; colonial reports from all the widely scattered countries which Englishmen dominate; full sets of our own national and state reports and laws, far antedating the foundation of the union; old Spanish and French law tomes, invaluable to the student of legal history; long files of law journals; everything good in the way of texts; and the priceless collection, in more than 4,000 volumes, of the transcripts and briefs filed in our own state supreme and appellate courts. These books are now sent over the state on the request of lawyers and others who are vouched for by a superior or higher judge, or a state official.

The Reference Department

The state library makes no attempt to compete with the public libraries. Its object is to supplement those collections. It does not buy fiction except such as is written by California authors and then as accessions to its collection of Californiana. Consequently the requests which come to the reference department for books and information are not for the latest best seller.

Books Lent

The person living in a town having a public library which cannot furnish the books needed by him, may get through his library anything in the state library collections. The request should come through the public library. The person who does not have access to a library may, by making a small surety deposit of five dollars, have books shipped to him direct. This, of course, has the disadvantage that the borrower must pay the transportation both ways. To be sure Wells, Fargo express company gives the borrower the half merchandise rate on the return shipment, but even then the expense of transportation keeps many scattered residents of the state from borrowing from the state library. The county library plan which will be explained later will remedy this fault.

Some of the most satisfactory service of the reference department is that done with study clubs, debating societies and granges throughout the state; composed of individuals with purposes of serious study and self improvement. Many sets of books sent to these organizations are, in reality, little libraries covering historical, artistic, economical, agricultural and domestic subjects and are often illustrated with stereoscopic views. These loans are made on request of the president, secretary or librarian of the organization and the cost of transportation is paid by the state library.

Much of the work of the reference department is carried on by correspondence, as information is furnished to any inquirer.

California Department

For years before the present librarian came into office, a more or less systematic effort was made to get hold of the books treating of California and the books written by Californians. Early in his first term the present librarian made a new department of the library and placed in charge a member of his staff who gathered together not only California books, but pamphlets, manuscripts, letters, newspapers, broadsides fugitive pieces, election ballots, etc., biographical information and photographs of pioneers and early settlers, artists, musicians and writers. The merest scrap of matter printed or manuscript which would be of value to the student or historian of the state's political, social or economic history was and is eagerly sought for and preserved.

Newspaper Files and Index

Special emphasis is naturally laid upon the collecting of files of newspapers representative of each section of the state. As far back as 1865 the legislature appropriated $2,500 for the purchase of eight volumes of early newspapers, among which is the unique complete volume one of the "Californian," the first paper published in the state. Long files of these newspapers, numbering now about 6,000 volumes, with their day by day reports of the happenings, plans and ambitions of the commonwealth, are invaluable to the historian, the lawyer tracing estates and family matters and often to cities like San Francisco in 1906, whose records were completely destroyed.

The newspaper is a difficult book to use unless the reader has a very clear recollection of dates and happenings. To know a thing took place within a year or two is not enough; for often weeks of searching would be necessary before the record wanted would be found. Soon after he came into office, Mr. Gillis set one of his assistants to work indexing representative papers. This index now covers the years 1846-1889 and 1902-1905, with a total of more than 186,000 cards. Work on the gap from 1889-1902 is being pushed. No other library in the United States has attempted the task of newspaper indexing on such a large scale; but it is safe to say that no other one piece of work done by the state library has been of greater value, or has brought people to the library from a greater distance to get what was unobtainable elsewhere.

Material on California Pioneers, Authors, Etc.

The biographical material collected on uniform blanks furnished by the library, filled out by or for pioneers, authors, artists, musicians and others, is also a part of the collection of Californiana which is greatly used by students. The collections include photographs of most of them and many reproductions of the works of the California artists and original scores of the works of musicians.

As an example of service that the state library can be to the writer on our political and economic history take these instances: the library's collection of election ballots arranged chronologically presents, in a nutshell, the development of election machinery from frontier freedom in ballot juggling to the present day Australian system. Again the library has a large number of account books, ranging in size from sweat-stained pocket day books to folio ledgers, and beginning in the 30's and running into the 50's; forming a rich mine of first-hand information on trade, commodities and values.

Information on any subject connected with Californiana will be furnished by this department to any inquirer.

Documents Department

Everyone acknowledges that some of the best material on almost all subjects is issued by the federal and state governments. The state library receives all the publications of the United States government, many from other nations and from other states of the United States. In the documents department careful arrangement is made of these files, and with the indexes to them, they are available so that the valuable material in them is ready to be used there for reference purposes.

California State Publications

The problem of the economical and successful distribution of federal publications has not been solved. It is generally conceded that there should be some distributing officer, but up to the present the departments issuing the publications have not all agreed to place this distribution entirely in the hands of the superintendent of documents at Washington. So it is also in the distribution of state documents. No successful plan of distribution has been agreed upon. The present law should be amended by the next legislature.

Order, Accessions and Catalogue Departments

In the order and accessions department, detailed information is kept about all books ordered and all books received. There are now 151,878 accessions, exclusive of the 1,497 books for the blind and the 14,200 volumes in the traveling libraries, records of these last two being kept in the extension department.

In the catalogue department records are made on cards sufficient to make available all the important material in the book, so that when these cards are filed with the others in the card catalogue, the book can be readily found either by the public or by the librarian in charge.

Legislative and Municipal Reference Department

Some of the later work of the library is that of furnishing the legislators and state officials with the most reliable information on all subjects connected with their offices. Current economie questions are followed day by day and clippings from newspapers, magazines, books and pamphlets bearing thereon are made and arranged convenient to the hand of the legislator or state officer. All such information is non-partisan. Researches along lines of what other states and nations are doing on any subject are undertaken and the results of such work presented to the official, who is thereby enabled to devote his own time and energies to tasks which cannot be delegated.

The importance of the municipality in the state has led to the collection of a vast deal of information on the various systems of city government. The library, consequently, is prepared and willing to give any city struggling with a new charter, or amendments to an old one, the fullest information on what has been done by municipalities both in America and abroad.

The material, although often collected for some particular purpose first, is always available for any inquirer and will, if he calls, be given him to use at once; or, if he writes to the department, information requested and material needed will be sent to him promptly. The student who wishes to borrow can either deposit five dollars, get the signature of a state officer, or that of the librarian of any local library in which he is registered.

Extension Department

In order that, according to newer practice, the book might be brought to the reader, instead of requiring the reader to come to the book, the librarian organized in 1903 what is called the extension department. Its activities followed several different lines and to insure economy and dispatch the department was made up of three divisions. The first immediately began the work of sending out collections of fifty volumes made up of history, biography, fiction, literature and a few scientific and juvenile works. The popularity of the new undertaking was immediate; it was the first chance that the family far from library or bookstore had had to get reading matter. At first a small charge was made to help cover express charges; a little later even that was abated. When one considers that in California at the present time there are only 120 towns having public libraries, while there are 487 communities which are now borrowing these traveling libraries, he will realize something of the development of this plan to furnish the bookless with good books. In the past two years 1325 traveling libraries have gone out; and the circulation of books totals almost 125,000 volumes. It is safe to say that more people have learned of the state library and been benefited by it through the traveling libraries in the past seven years than heard of it during the preceding quarter century.

Books for the Blind

Another class of people whom the librarian thought to reach through a division of his newly organized extension department was the blind. Heretofore no systematic plan had developed to supply them with reading matter. The United States government, in order to encourage the sending of books to blind readers, carries the big volumes through the mails free. The state library found these readers eager for books; and is now supplying them with books and music in five styles of embossed types. Three hundred and sixty-six blind persons in this state are now using without cost the collection of 1,497 volumes. And during the past year these 366 persons, including, of course, a large percent of children and of old persons, averaged more than ten volumes each. Furthermore, the library is diligent in gathering information and samples of writing appliances, games and maps especially adapted to the use of the blind.

Any blind person who wishes to use the books simply sends in his request and blanks for making his requests are furnished if he merely sends to the department his name and address.

County Free Library System

The county free library system, in a few words, is the business man's method for supplying all the people of a county with the books needed, at the most economical outlay. Heretofore two schemes had been tried by the librarian and both were found wanting. The traveling libraries while a success in some respects: were fixed collections of fifty books sent out for a term of three months from a center so far distant from the reader that his individual needs could not be met. On the other hand, the small town library when once organized was financially weak and did not reach any one living beyond the town limits. The county system breaking the state up, potentially at least, into fifty-eight natural subdivisions, made it possible to avoid the drawbacks referred to in both of the above mentioned plans. On a very small tax levy, the county could raise a sufficient sum to carry on the work of the library adequately. And with a central library, presumably in the county seat, deposit stations or branches in hamlets, school-houses, cross-roads stores and farmers' houses, and frequent exchanges of books to meet special requests, every individual in the county from the school child to the

(Continued on Page 799)

HONOLULU

And the Volcano

THE TRIP MOST COMPELLING and worth while, excelling all others for grandeur, beauty and pleasure. And this splendid trip can be made in two weeks and a day by sailing on S. S. SIERRA (10,000 tons displacement). The Volcano of Kilauea, the largest in the world, is tremendously active just now, and a few quick dispatch trips have been arranged. Never before has it been possible to make this desirable trip with such speed and comfort, and the price is low, $110, first class, to Honolulu and back, and $41 for side trip from Honolulu to volcano, including rail and auto to Kilauea; hotel at Hilo, also Volcano House. No other trip compares with this. Be sure to visit the islands, and DO IT NOW, while the volcano is active. S. S. SIERRA sails Oct. 22, Nov. 12, Dec. 3. Write or wire, OCEANIC S. S. CO. 673 Market Street, San Francisco.

John O'Donnell D. E. Alexander

ALEXANDER & O'DONNELL

ATTORNEYS AT LAW

Tels.: Sunset Douglas 1538; Home J 1508
845 Pacific Bldg., Market and Fourth Sts.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD
The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed	$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital	300,000.00
Surplus	400,000.00
Profits	45,000.00

DIRECTORS: James D. Phelan, President; John A. Hooper, Vice President; J. K. Moffitt, Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R. D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.

Attorneys: J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy. Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial
(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)
526 CALIFORNIA ST., San Francisco, Cal.

Guaranteed Capital	$ 1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash	1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds	1,555,093.05
Deposits June 30th, 1910	40,384,727.21
Total Assets	43,108,907.82

Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co's. Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President and Manager, George Tourny; Third Vice-President, J. W. Van Bergen; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, A. H. Muller; Assistant Secretaries, G. J. O. Folte and Wm. D. Newhouse; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, George Tourny, J. W. Van Bergen, Ign. Steinhart, I. N. Walter, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Streets. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Hever, Manager.

JED'S world never got to be as big and as broad as it deserved, but then it began very small. It was confined to a bend in the creek, almost a loop, comprising a deep, placid pond above the ford; then the ford, rock bottomed all the way across; then the cataract, by far the most wonderful spot in Jed's world, and, after that, the great boulder-faced bluff across the toes of which the creek had cut a rushing way down into the woods. That bluff bounded Jed's world on the north, the highest possible hill, Jed thought, for the oaks that grew at its base hardly reached half way up its side and the very sky came down and rested on its summit, along and across which ran a trail that the Pawnees made. Sometimes Jed saw a whole band of them file by on their ponies, coming out of the prairies and vanishing into the woods.

But ever and always there was something calling to Jed from beyond where the sky and the earth, the sky and the treetops, came together, saying to him, "Come over and see what is here." He dimly knew that the earth was bigger than the bend in the creek for, now and again, people came from somewhere and went away again, and they must naturally have some place to go to. Jed was never able to remember a time when he was not yearning to go, oh! just anywhere at all, so that he might see what lay beyond.

Once he was taken to York and then, for the first time, learned that there was a stream, across which he was taken in a boat, much bigger and broader than the Serpentine. That was a most memorable expedition which took all day, and it whetted Jed's interest in the outside world more than ever, so that he soon began to make excursions on his own hook, much to the perturbation of his parents, who complained that they did not know how in the world they were ever going to break Jed of the habit of running off. Jed wasn't running off. He was only trying to discover what lay beyond where the sky came down, but somehow or other he was unable to make others appreciate the importance of his knowing such things at his time of life.

After he had learned to hold on in the saddle and to guide either old Kate or old Jennie, his horizon rapidly widened. Once he rode to the top of Mount Maria and there saw stretching out before him the wide bottom of the Sandy and the blackjack hills beyond. It was a great vision; something akin to the emotions which rose in the breast of Balboa when he discovered the Pacific, or of De Soto when he discovered the Mississippi, filled the bosom of Jed with a sense of triumph. After that he prosecuted his discoveries in all directions until he came to know every path and by-path in the whole region of the Serpentine.

Then he removed with his father's family to York and the horizon of Jed was again enlarged. There the hills were farther away, there were real rivers instead of a little creek, and in those rivers there were islands. All of these had to be explored. Parting the ranges of hills were deep, dark ravines containing pawpaw and plum patches and ledges of rock cropping out. It was not a great while until Jed had threaded every one of these "gulches," as they would have been called farther west, from end to end, had stood on the pinnacle of Pierson's Peak, the highest point in two counties, but still the sky and the earth came together out there somewhere and the voice kept calling, calling to come out beyond the rim of Jed's world to see what might be there. No one who has not been a boy with an instinct to broaden his outlook, and has not forgotten, can understand or sympathize with the insistent urgency of that call.

By and by fortune favored Jed with an opportunity to visit The Fort where many soldiers were stationed. He went with a teamster neighbor who suffered for companionship of any sort on his way and who promised to return Jed safe and sound after two nights of camping out. The wagon broke down at the crossing of the Catamount, the teamster swore horribly and went off after another wagon, leaving Jed to watch the load for lonesome hours and hours, but he came at last; there were fried onions for supper and the wide open sky to sleep under for a first time. It was glorious!

RECOLLECTIONS OF JED

DIE WANDERLUST

BY

A. JUDSON

At The Fort, where they spent a second night, the soldiers took a fancy to Jed and he was taken to the barracks to eat with more than a hundred men, who piled his plate so high that he could scarcely see over it or make any impression on it. His waistband pinched so hard that he had to unbutton the first button of his trousers to afford relief but, alas! he forgot to button it up again and the soldiers fairly howled with delight when they discovered what he had done.

After supper he followed out to the parade ground, where an officer came along, drew his sword and fanned the air all around Jed with it like flashing lightnings. If Jed had lifted a hand it must surely have been cut off, he thought, but he stood like an image and came off unscathed. Jed returned home feeling that, at last, he had caught a glimpse of a real outside world.

But Die Wanderlust grew on what it fed on. The wider Jed's excursions were the wider he wished to make them. Printers who straggled along and worked now and again in his father's office told him of the wonderful cities they had seen, the big rivers they had crossed, the mountains they had climbed and Jed could scarcely contain himself for that inward yearning to see something of the outside world.

He heard of a man who had a cattle ranch over on the head of the McDowell, nearly twenty miles away, who was going to Texas after a band of cattle and wanted a boy to go along and drive his team. Jed could hardly sleep that night for thinking of the opportunity. It was early fall and Jed had already supplied himself with his winter boots, but had worn them hardly a day. After breakfast he put on his boots and, taking a warm coat from the chamber where he slept, slipped out the back way, leaving just a note on his bed saying: "Gone to Texas. Will be back soon." He was half right, anyhow. If he wasn't really gone to Texas, he was back soon all right enough, but it was not a joyous homecoming. He trudged all day on a bee-line over the hills to avoid the highway where he might meet too many people and reached the stock-ranch almost too tired to put one foot in front of the other and with his feet so sore that he could scarcely step on them at all. No, the cattle man did not want a boy to go to Texas, at least not a runaway boy too little to bridle a horse or put a harness on and who looked as if about ready to drop dead in his tracks.

Jed was fed and put to bed, where he slept like a log until the sun was high, but when he went to put his boots on again he couldn't. Great white blisters adorned his heels. The stockman took him in his buggy across the hills to the high road and there set him down, boots in hand, to await a chance to ride to town with some passing team, but none came into view and he trudged along in his stocking feet half the way home before he got a chance to ride, and then it was with his own father who, after a day and a night of searching, had at last gotten an inkling of where Jed had started for and was driving in haste to catch up with him.

It was a very sober, serious talk which Jed had with his father on the way home. Jed protested that he was tired of York, that he had seen everything there over and over again and he wanted to see what there was outside Jed's father, with a sterner emphasis, protested that he, himself, and not Jed, was responsible for Jed's future until he should grow to be a man; that the direction Jed was taking pointed toward vagabondage, hunger and hardship, criminality and a short and inglorious life; that unless Jed remained contentedly at home and went to school he would be dressed in girl's clothes, locked in his chamber every night and taken to and from school by the constable; but on the other hand, if he were a good boy and went to school and did his best his father would take Jed with him on some of his surveying trips so that he could learn to know his own county if nothing more. The prospect was not very alluring, but Jed jumped at it and felt it a great hardship if, no matter what the weather, he was not permitted to drop his school work and go on a surveying expedition with his father.

Often he went and served as flagman, his duties requiring that he run at the top of his speed, up hill and down, through the brush and the tall grass until he got as far away as he could go and still see his father at the instrument, who would motion to him to move to right or left until he got on the right line, when both hands were thrown up by his father and there Jed must stand like a monument, with his tall staff planted between his feet, until his father and the chainmen came up. It was a laborious job, but it was a joy to Jed, for he saw new valleys and hills, new creeks and woods, almost every trip.

Jed's father must have had some inkling of what was in the mind of Jed, for he took the boy with him many times when he should have been in school. Had he felt "Die Wanderlust" surging in his own blood some time in his life? But he was right about its leading to vagrancy and to crime, as the testimony of every prison and reform school will readily prove. It prompts the first false step that leads to a wasted life, but it is a lust to be controlled, not smothered, and if parents find it manifesting itself in a child they will do well to direct it into wholesome channels rather than to try to drive it out by dusting the jacket that contains the boy.

Jed thought that he knew all that there was to be known of the hills and gulches about York, but when, in after years, he conceived a passing passion for studying the geology of that district he found those very hills and gulches a wonderland. He had seen only the topography of the country, beautiful, it is true, but there was more real knowledge to be gained, under the tutelage of his old professor, from a shovel full of earth than Jed had learned in all his explorations. It is Die Wanderlust, as often as anything else, that leads to vagabondage and crime, and yet it is no more evil than appetite or desire and needs training, not obliteration. No more fortunate thing occurred in the life of Jed than the reasonable opportunities afforded him for satisfying his wanderlust.

One of these opportunities came to him the very next summer when he was allowed to go with a freighter to "The River" for goods. What though the weather was bad and the roads worse; what though the wagons got stuck in the mud and the freighter had to double teams, swear and scold; what though the rain came down in torrents and a little river ran under the wagon down the rut wherein Jed lay, coursing along his spine and wetting him to the marrow; what though crawly things got into his hair and into his clothes so that, when he got home, he had to be stripped and scrubbed and "anguintumed" before he could be permitted to come into the house? There was something doing every minute and it was glorious to be alive.

Jed had to know the name of every stream, of every cross-roads, where all the roads went that branched off, and he listened with rapt attention to the teamster's tales of fights and horse trades, getting stuck and pulling others out of trouble, of the life of the freighter ahead of the railroad. At "The River" there were wonders upon wonders opened before Jed's inquiring eyes, none of them quite to be compared with the swan-like steamboats coming into or shoving off from the cobblestone levee, belching huge columns of black smoke and uttering such stupendous, almost guttural whistles as nearly shook the earth. The lure of those steamboats! It was a decade before Jed got that out of his head.

On the way home Jed caught his first glimpse of a railroad. It was coming up the valley of the Sandy at a rate of something like half a mile a day. The team drew up by a watering trough and, while the teamster was taking a "nip" at a nearby grocery, Jed ran over to the track and stood by the side of a puffing locomotive. Presently an Indian, bare legged and blanketed, ambled down the road, dismounted and, leaning against a fence post, looked at the great piece of machinery with visage as set as though carved in stone. At last he gave vent to the single ejaculation, "Wa!" remounted his pony and rode away, but he left Jed with a new word added to his vocabulary that he nearly wore out, or wore other people out with, before he had done with it. No traveler on the continent of Europe ever got more in proportion to his size out of his trip abroad than Jed out of that trip by wagon to "The River," but the lure of the steamboat! That was the one fateful incident of the expedition.

The vision of those swan-like steamboats swimming gracefully on the bosom of the Missouri scarcely left the mind of Jed sleeping or waking. He wanted to be a pilot and be up in that little house on the tipmost top where he could see out over the broad valleys each side of the stream, or he wanted to be the captain to stand out on the roof and give crisp quick orders to the hustling men casting off lines or taking them aboard. In his day dreams, and Jed dreamed more in daytime than by night (which is another story), he saw his own line of steamers plowing the waters of the Sandy and the Indigo, navigable, alas, only for catfish not exceeding a hundred pounds weight, saw the smoke from their tall stacks through the treetops curling away toward the horizon and heard their resonant whistles warning the whole town out to come down to the levee and see them come in. Jed dreamed steamboat and talked steamboat and made up his mind that the life of the steamboat man was the life for him. Three months as "mud-clerk" on a Mississippi steamboat, years after, worked an effective cure, but it required that to do it.

Jed talked steamboat to Hank Woodley all that summer, fall and winter, and Hank concluded that the steamboat life was the life for him, too. They planned to "strike out" for it as soon as navigation opened the very next spring. That they might not go away empty pocketed they took small contracts to saw wood after school and Saturdays all winter. They did janitor work for churches and swept the school-house, salted their gains, kept their counsel and talked steamboat to each other only when they were alone. At last the ice went out of the rivers, the papers said that the boats were running again and it was time for Hank and Jed to be off if they were going, and they were going.

They must take their best suits, shirts, collars and stockings, but to be seen dressed up would provoke comment, so they packed their best suits in Hank's father's big valise, hid it under the hay in his father's barn and, as soon as it was dark, slipped out of sight down the railroad track toward Blackjack, not as unseen, however, as they supposed. They had six or seven dollars each in their pockets, dared not be seen getting aboard train at home, so walked seven miles to Blackjack, intending to get aboard the midnight train at that point, buy tickets to the next station, get off there, swing on in front of the blind baggage and ride as far as ever they could before discovery in the morning. Their plan was to apply for work as dishwashers and pot-wrestlers on a steamboat and, at least, make one trip as far as New Orleans to see how they liked steamboating. If they did not like it they were coming home. If they did they were not going to be heard of until they could return either as captains or pilots, but as to which should be captain and which the pilot, they nearly came to blows before they reached a decision. Finally Jed, for the sake of harmony, conceded the captaincy to Hank, consoling himself for the loss of prestige with the satisfaction of knowing that the pilot house gave the better chance to see the country than the deck, the office or even the roof.

It was a long, tiresome trudge down the track through the woods to Blackjack, but the boys got there more than an hour before train time, as hungry as young wolves. They went straight to the little hotel, keeping open for the train, and ordered ham and eggs. Perhaps they whispered too much together and too loudly. Perhaps the good old, motherly landlady wasn't a fool. Anyhow her suspicions were aroused and she questioned the boys in a quiet, unobtrusive way as to where they were from and where they were going.

Now Hank Woodley was a liar. He couldn't tell the truth if he wanted to and just then the boys did not want to have the truth told, so it seemed that Hank's abilities of prevarication should stand in good stead if ever dishonesty were to prove the better policy, so Jed suffered Hank to do the talking. He insisted that they were brothers, Jim and Joe Smith, by name, that they had been on a visit to their uncle over on the Serpentine, who had put them across the river in a boat, and they were going to their home at Kansas City. Questioned about the Serpentine, of which Hank knew nothing while the landlady knew everything, despite Jed's whispered promptings, Hank made a mess of the whole business and what was a suspicion in her mind became a certainty.

While the boys were eating the landlady slipped out the back way and, by the time they had finished their late supper, and had that comfortable feeling inside, the town constable slipped in the front way. He fell into conversation with the boys and Hank, who had forgotten the lies he had first told, undertook to repeat them with such manifest divergence from the first narration that the good landlady, listening outside, laughed outright. The constable went out nonchalantly, seeming to be little interested, and when the boys reached the depot he was pacing the platform. He watched them buy their tickets to the next station and, when the train thundered in, he reached for the big valise saying, "It is rather heavy for you and I'll help you on with it." Nice man, that constable, the boys thought, for he led them into the car, found a seat for them, shook hands, said good-by and, just as the train started and the conductor entered the door, he said: "There the rascals are. Turn them over to Jim, who'll jug 'em 'till morning when the up train can take 'em home to their mammas."

It was so. As the train neared the next station a brakeman came along and, seizing hold of the big valise, said, "Come on, you kids. There's a friend looking for you at the station. I expect he'll be right glad to see you." Sure enough there was, in the person of the city marshal of that town, who had been routed out of bed just to meet and greet those two boys.

"Hello! Jed," he called as soon as he had laid hold of the valise. "Hello! Hank. Which is Jed and which is Hank? Ah! so you are Hank. They say that as a liar you are a wonder and that Jed blushes scarlet every time you lie. We've had such a nice talk over the wires about you that I feel that I know you quite well. Now I tell you what I'll do with you kids. You can fork over your cash to be held in trust by the station agent, together with this valise, and you can hang around the station here until the up train comes along, when he'll put you aboard it and hand you over to the conductor, or I'll lock you up in the 'calaboose' until it is train time and put you aboard myself. Which shall it be?"

The lads concluded that they preferred the waiting room of the depot to a nest in the 'calaboose' and, exacting from Jed his parole of honor to stay by and be ready to go back when the train went, saying that a parole from Hank would not be worth the trouble of taking it, the marshal returned to his own home and broken rest. The night grew chill, the stove in the waiting room had no fire in it and the boys stamped around and kicked their heels together as best they could until the train came, received back their cash, less the price of their tickets home, were turned over to the conductor and, in the gray dawn of the Sabbath morning, were met at the depot in York by the grim, taciturn father of Hank. Jed shivered with cold, Hank with the sad certainty of the retribution which would be meted out when he should reach the seclusion of his father's barn, for he knew what the voiceless greeting of the grizzled captain boded.

As the tugging lads, with the great valise between them, reached Jed's father's gate a halt was made long enough to suffer Jed to dump his best suit and sundries out upon the lawn and then the captain resumed his march, erect and commanding, with his prisoner struggling with the valise that now swung against his legs at every step. No one being astir at his own home Jed stood under the shadow of the budding black locust and watched the procession of Captain Woodley and Hank across the open square, first to the door of the Woodley home, where the valise was deposited, and then to the door of the Woodley barn, from whence there speedily issued sounds of the thwacks of the carriage polestrap and the howls of Hank that awakened the neighborhood and gave notice to Jed's drowsy father that the wanderers had returned. The skulking out of town the night before had been noted and reported, but not until the wayfarers had been apprehended and reported safe in custody had Jed's father retired. Being not at all well, and very anxious, the captain had insisted on his going home and to bed.

Jed's father arose and, slipping on his trousers, came down and let Jed in, arms filled with that precious best suit and etceteras. Then, instead of whipping Jed, as Hank's father had done to him, Jed's father took the boy in his arms, drew him to his side, sank into a chair and cried, "My son, my only son," he said, "a year ago I promised your dying mother to do the best I could for her little brood that she must leave behind. Her dread was not of the grave, but of leaving you. I have done my best to keep a home for you, and God knows I have had no other thought but for the welfare of my family of motherless children, and now you must run away and leave us all to roam up and down the earth a vagabond and, in all likelihood, a criminal. It is too much. My God, it is more than I can bear," and he bowed his head upon his arm across the back of the chair and sobbed so that his frame shook.

Getting the mastery of himself, he rose and taking Jed by the shoulders said: "I shall not whip you as the captain has whipped Hank, although you deserve it as richly as he, but this I will do. If you run away again I'll follow you to the ends of the earth. If it costs me every dollar's worth of property I have in the world I'll follow you and I will keep you under my control until you are twenty-one. If I cannot keep you subject to my control I will find an institution for the care and custody of incorrigible youths and I'll keep you there until you are twenty-one. God helping me, if I do nothing else in life, I'll prevent your growing up a vagabond and a criminal. You shall not have your own way until you are old enough and wise enough to have it. Mark my words! Now take your things and go to your room."

Jed could have stood the whipping that Hank got, and could have resisted it to become the vagabond, or little better, that Hank became, but his father's tears and sobs and his stern resolve—before these Jed weakened and "Die Wanderlust" froze out of his blood then and there.

That morning Jed, much protesting that he had had no sleep, attended church with the family. The news of his escapade had gotten there before him and, at least so it seemed to him, every eye was upon him. The minister when he rose to open the services looked straight at Jed, Jed was sure of it. The hymn given out began with something about weary, wandering feet, and Jed's eldest sister cast a sly glance in his direction and snickered, and the minister said: "We will read for our Scripture lesson this morning from the Gospel according to Luke, the fifteenth chapter and beginning with the eleventh verse, 'A certain man had two sons,' and Jed knew that he was in for it. The sermon on the Prodigal Son was, the good brothers and sisters testified to each other as they passed through the vestibule, "powerful and so much needed." Whether others forgot it or not Jed did not. He sat through it with visage blazing, and it did seem so good to get out into the air again so that the fresh, moist, southeast breeze, presaging rain, could blow into his face. Through it all his father sat with a determined look in his face, resolute to control himself if he could and yet, from out the corners of his eye, Jed detected now and again the glister of a tear. Not for more than half a year, Jed afterward affirmed with an emphasis more remarkable for strength than for delicacy, was he able to poke his head inside of a church door that the minister did not hurl the Prodigal Son at him in some form or other, and from that time on, he hated that prodigal and wished that he had starved to death and never been heard of after. His sympathies were, and remained, with the elder brother.

As for Hank, after being soundly thrashed, he was locked in his chamber and fed on bread and water until it was just time to reach the school without being tardy Monday morning. No sooner had he taken his seat than he scrawled this on his slate and slipped it over to Jed: "If ever you say steamboat to me again I'll kill you dead."

("The State Library"—Continued)

farmer, tradesman, mechanic, housewife and professional man would really have the service which a library should give him.

In advocating such a plan the state librarian intends that his institution shall enter upon an epoch of increased usefulness. Though its inflexible traveling libraries would be withdrawn it would become the head of the library system of the state supplying each individual through his county library, free of all transportation charges, with the books and information not readily obtainable nearer home. Relieved of the expense of furnishing miscellaneous reading to the country districts the state library would not only be able to pay transportation on all shipments to individual and county library, but it would also be able to specialize along lines of greatest usefulness to all the people. At present the state library is under such a great expense in sending out the traveling libraries that it cannot undertake paying transportation on books lent to libraries and individuals in counties that have not established the county system. With the county and state libraries working in harmony and covering the whole field we could truthfully say that California has a library system, in the same sense that she has a school system.

The 1909 session of the legislature passed a county library law, which has been adopted, to date, and in a modified form, by nine counties, namely, Sacramento, Santa Barbara, San Joaquin, Fresno, Madera, Merced, Tulare, Yolo and Alameda, which appropriated for this work sums ranging from $4,000 to $12,000. It is believed that certain amendments will be passed during the coming session of the legislature, which will greatly facilitate the adoption of the system.

Proposed Branches of State Library

For some time the state librarian has felt that one headquarters was not sufficient for an institution like the state library in a state the size of California. There should be at least an office in Los Angeles and in San Francisco, where information could be furnished and material kept while being used in those localities.

At the last legislature the following amendment was passed to the state library law (See sec. 2293, par. 10). It is one of the powers and duties of the state library board and reads as follows:

"To establish, in their discretion, deposit stations in various parts of the state, under the control of an officer or employee of the state library; provided, that no books shall be kept permanently away from the main library, which may be required for official use." [Amendment approved March 18, 1909.]

This was not possible to carry out as the state library's fund is not sufficient to rent suitable quarters in the two centers of population of San Francisco and Los Angeles, furnish them properly, supply them with the absolutely necessary library equipment and add the necessary assistants to its staff to take care of such branches. The state library hopes to have quarters in the new building which the State Harbor Commissioners plan to erect south of the present Ferry building on the San Francisco waterfront, as such a location would be safe in the case of fire, and would be the most convenient location for San Francisco and all the country about there.

Convinced as the state librarian is that the idea is a good one, every effort will be made to carry it out fully as soon as the fund allows or some feasible means of doing so is offered. An application for a branch was received from the state university at Berkeley, but as was pointed out to that institution at the time, this, of course, is not necessary because the university library needs only to send its requests for books to the state library and all such are sent immediately. Every educational institution in the state has this same privilege. The need of branches is more to have headquarters that are accessible to a large territory where complete information about the state library could be obtained by calling instead of by writing. Then, too, there is no doubt that the state library would receive at these two branches material from local people, if such material were to stay in the locality. Valuable private collections and historical material might be given to the state which otherwise would be sold and distributed and perhaps lost to California entirely.

Quarterly Publication

This publication was begun immediately after the San Francisco earthquake, the first number being May, 1906, and this first number gave as complete a record as could be obtained at the time of the enormous losses to California libraries, in the valuable collections both public and private that were destroyed. The publication, in addition to special material published in it at different times, gives regularly each quarter complete information about California libraries, about the California Library Association, and the California state library, including the books and other material added, and the state publications received during the quarter; a directory for library supplies is also printed regularly, this being made up only of firms recommended by California libraries. The state library has also compiled since July, 1908, an index to current events in California, as taken from California newspapers, and this index has been published in the News Notes of California Libraries every quarter since October, 1908.

The publication is in great demand, requests to be placed on the mailing list being received constantly. Of course it is placed in all of the California libraries and can be used there for reference but it is sent as an exchange in almost all other cases.

Present Location of State Library

The greatest drawback to an economical and efficient administration of the state library is the fact that its quarters in the capitol building are in no way adapted to its needs. They begin in the basement, continue on each floor to the fourth, where they spread out the whole length of the building on the east side. It was hoped, when the capitol building was remodeled, that the library would be equipped with its own elevator, but it was not. So attendants are compelled to cover long stretches of floor space in attending to their duties, consuming time and energy which should be devoted to legitimate work. The fourth floor has only a ten-foot ceiling and is disagreeably hot and close in summer, and very cold and uncomfortable in winter. This, unfortunately, is the part of the library where the larger proportion of the staff is obliged to be located.

The dignity of the state and the value of its library, totaling, as it does, about half a million dollars, demand that California follow the lead of New York and Connecticut, to name no others, in the matter of providing a library building. The space now occupied by the library in the capitol is needed for other offices; it is not adapted to the library use; the deduction therefore is simple—give the state library a building of its own.

A Summary

The state library is making every effort to develop in California a library system under which every resident—no matter where he is located—will have free and convenient access to all that he needs, and the development of the system at the present time is promising and encouraging. It is the privilege and the duty of everyone in California who wishes anything in the way of books or information to communicate with the California State Library, as that institution stands ready to assist every one.

In a speech delivered in Boston one of the leaders of the Irish party is reported as describing a division of the House of Commons in these words: "The Tories went out into the right-hand lobby, and the Liberals went out into the left-hand lobby, and when the house was entirely empty, only the fifty Irish members remained."—New York Times.

NOTICE OF STOCKHOLDERS' MEETING

Notice is hereby given that in pursuance of a resolution and order of the Board of Directors of the Buclimo Mining Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, unanimously adopted at the regular monthly meeting of said board, duly held on the thirtieth day of August, 1910, at the office of said corporation in San Francisco in said State, a meeting of the stockholders of said corporation is hereby called for, and will be held at the office of said corporation at Room 941 Monadnock Building, No. 681 Market St., San Francisco, California (said place of meeting being at the principal place of business of said corporation and at the building and place where the Board of Directors usually meet), on TUESDAY, THE TWENTY-NINTH DAY OF NOVEMBER, 1910, AT 8 O'CLOCK P. M. on said day, for the purpose of considering and acting upon the proposition to increase the capital stock of said corporation from One Hundred Thousand (100,000) Dollars, divided into One Hundred Thousand (100,000) shares of the par value of One Dollar each, to Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) Dollars divided into Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) shares of the par value of One Dollar each. The amount to which it is proposed to increase the capital stock of said corporation is Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) Dollars.

By order of the Board of Directors.

Dated September 1, 1910.

THOMAS E. HAVEN,
Secretary Buclimo Mining Company.
9-23-10t

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Department No. 4.

Action No. 22744.

JOHN CHARLSON,

Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof,

Defendants.

A. M. DE VALL, Attorney for Plaintiff.
667-9 Mills Building, Tel. Douglas 5990.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of John Charlson, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Chapultepec Street (now Winfield Avenue), distant thereon seventy-five (75) feet southerly from the southerly line of Esmeralda Street; thence running southerly along said easterly line of Chapultepec Street (now Winfield Avenue) twenty-five (25) feet; thence at a right angle easterly seventy (70) feet; thence at a right angle northerly twenty-five (25) feet; and thence at a right angle westerly seventy (70) feet to the point of beginning.

Being lot No. 393 of Gift Map No. 3, as per map on file and of record in the office of the Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be met in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 24th day of August A. D. 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
By J. J. McDONALD, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM.

The first publication of this Summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 9th day of September, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

NAMES.	ADDRESSES.
G. S. Crim,	2360 Howard Street, San Francisco, Cal.

9-9-10t

TITLES RESTORED

TITLES RESTORED UNDER McENERNEY ACT, complete for $35.00. Burnt Records Title Co., 951-953 Monadnock Building, ninth floor, Market street, near Third.

JULIUS G. ALMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office,
80 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491

Residence,
1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4890

SAN FRANCISCO

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

A Straight Talk to First Voters

Son, you are about to discharge one of the highest functions of citizenship. You are to vote. This is not a glory that you have achieved. It is purely accidental. If you had been born a girl you would not have had the right. Being born a boy all you had to do was to keep alive until twenty-one and the right or privilege, whichever it is, was yours, no matter how well or how ill you may be prepared for the duties of a citizen.

This is all wrong. Your common sense teaches you that being a male instead of a female does not make you a bit of a statesman, the least bit fit to take a part in government. Next Tuesday young men will vote who would not be able to say, if asked, whether tariff should be for revenue or for protection, what conservation means or whether or not it is a good thing, whether President Taft is Republican or Democrat, or be able to tell the difference between Republican and Democrat.

You do not need to be told that suffrage is a privilege that should be accorded to those only who are fit to discharge the duty of an elector, that it should be something to be achieved, like admission to the bar or being certificated to teach school or practice medicine, something that should be accorded after an examination which, if successfully passed, should be evidenced by the issuance of a diploma setting forth that the holder of the same is of good moral character and intellectually competent to be a citizen of California and of the Great Republic. You know, too, that whoever meets these requirements, without respect to sex or color, should receive such diploma. You know all these things down in your heart, but you cannot help that our citizenship is not ordered after that fashion, at least you cannot yet, and it remains to you to go forth Tuesday next and do the thing that you can do, vote right as God gives you grace to see the right.

Belong to some political party, preferably one or other of the great political parties. In a government where electors are numbered by hundreds of thousands and by millions a lone individual voter counts for little. If anything is to be accomplished men must unite with other men for a common cause. States that have many parties are unstable. Whichever party gets into power, in such a country, as in Germany and France, has to govern with a minority held together loosely by coalitions, and with a majority in opposition. The English and American way of dividing into two main great divisions is better. Join one or other of the great political parties. Join now.

In a political party with hundreds of thousands of others you cannot have your own way about everything. You will have to give and take with the rest. Having had your say you must let the others have theirs and, except you be required to do violence to your conscience, abide the will of the majority. It is not for any light or trivial cause that you should bolt your ticket. To refuse to go with your party merely because you cannot have your own way is to be an irreconcilable and a nation of irreconcilables cannot be governed by "consent of the governed" because the governed will not consent to be governed. Such a nation can be governed only with power. That power may come through an overmastering autocracy, as in Germany and Russia, or through usurpation and dictatorship as in Central America. The glory of our republic is that we Americans, having had our say, having cast our ballot and had it counted, acquiesce for the time-being in the result, trusting to time and events to justify our opinions and bring others to think as we think.

But while we should stay with our political parties through all minor differences, and should not permit ourselves to be stubborn and intractable over non-essentials, or over things not truly vital, we should not venture to vote wrong on vital issues, or for bad men instead of good, merely because our political party has headed itself in the wrong direction or nominated unfit men. In the last analysis every voter is answerable for how he votes to God and country, not to party. Hide bound partisanship is for the fool, to make him as little of a nuisance as possible, not for the man of sense and self-direction. Whoever permits party to claim his allegiance before country is far from being a patriot.

Finally, it is not enough for a voter to vote the best he knows. He must do his best to know how he should vote. He should put himself upon inquiry. His duty as a citizen puts him upon inquiry. He must seek that he may find out how to vote. He must ask that he may receive information. Whoever trusts to another to vote him is servile.

It is a man's job, Boy, conducting this state and this nation so that justice may be established, order be preserved, a square deal be given alike to rich and powerful, poor and lowly. Heretofore in the world's history the many have toiled without ceasing merely that they might keep the breath of life in their bodies, while the few have been clad in purple and fine linen and fared sumptuously every day. It is the hope of the world that free America may not repeat the heartrending histories of Asia and Europe, but evolve a civilization based upon fraternity and so near an approach to equality as differing abilities may permit, anyhow, that ours shall not be a civilization for the strong alone. If you are a man, or have in you the making of a man, you will do your manful part next Tuesday.

A sketch of the work of Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett in the American Magazine tells about her first attempt at authorship. She was only 12 years old when she wrote a story and sent it to a publisher. She put into the envelope a slip bearing the stern young admonition: "My object is remuneration." The story was accepted and paid for and it is said that to Mrs. Burnett has fallen the singular good fortune of never having had a piece of work rejected.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE

A full line of Theosophical Literature from Point Loma, California, the headquarters of the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society, under the leadership of Katherine Tingley, is now on sale at A. M. Robertson's, 222 Stockton St., S. F., and at Smith Bros., 462 13th St., Oakland, California.

FOR RENT—Ten-roomed house on Kings-ton avenue, Piedmont (rear Linda); rent forty dollars per month. Real Estate Co., 4054 Piedmont avenue, rear Key Route Depot.
10-28-21

Day School---Night School

Electrical, Mining, Civil

AND

Automobile Engineering

Architectural Drawing

Wireless and Morse Telegraphy

BOOKKEEPING : SHORTHAND

Our Graduates in Every Department Secure Good Positions

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO

16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved

KRYPTOK

Invisible Bifocal Lenses

181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tels: Oakland 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

This Week: "San Francisco Charter Amendments"

By J. E. White and James A. Johnson

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY: NOVEMBER 11: '10 FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH·GOOD COURAGE·GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, In Advance. No. 51.

A Little Thing Like That

THE CITY OF MEXICO TORN by riots, Americans mistreated and their flag torn to shreds all because Antonio Rodriguez accused of murder, was burned at the stake at Rock Springs, Texas! What barbarous persons those Mexicans must be! Their inability to appreciate the humor of the playful Texan way of dealing with crime is to be regretted.

The Heney Banquet

THE BANQUET TO BE TENDERED Francis J. Heney at the Palace Hotel on Tuesday next should be well attended. He fought a great and good fight for civic decency and, having rested from his unrequited labors, he carried the banner of a progressive Republicanism through winning battles in the middle northwest and yet reached his home state in time to lend a valiant and effective aid to a splendid triumph. Richly he has deserved. Hearty should be our testimony of appreciation.

Out With the Voting Machines

HAVING SERVED THE PURPOSE of passing out a good thing to a favored politician, why do the Alameda voting machines lag superfluous on the stage? If they be quicker in counting they are enough slower in registering the vote to make up for it. They are of questionable accuracy, open to the suspicion of manipulation, easily put out of gear, and inasmuch as only one machine can be afforded at a voting place, those who can't wait can't vote. Out with them and give us the Australian ballot with the little old cross! When we stab a man with that we know whom we are hitting. With the machine we are voting in the dark. Out with them!

Scratch Gravel

SUPPOSE THE SHORT SESSION of the sixty-first congress gets back to Washington and gets right down to unfinished business without waiting to renew old fights or play to the galleries, what then? There are those conservation measures and the legislation whereby Alaska may be developed without being exploited, the parcels post, the authorization of the tariff commission to report to congress and the American people, the national incorporation of interstate corporations! Put these things through in proper shape, and Champ Clark and his cohorts will have nothing to do but twirl their thumbs, draw their salaries and talk against time, occupations for which past experiences have made them well fitted.

Non-Explosive

VICTOR BERGER, THE MILWAUKEE SOCIALIST, will have a seat in congress. No occasion for alarm! He'll not go off. He is a reasoning animal full of the faith that is in him and full of reasons for it, not very good reasons, but the best there are of their kind. His presence on the floor of the lower house will be valuable in habituating the membership to the presence of Socialists. Also as an object lesson to the Interests exemplifying what is in store if they do not cease to do evil and learn to do well. There will be more Socialists in congress before there are less. We cannot have Rockefellers and Morganheims without having Socialists in congress and out, and fortunate shall we be if all of them are of the non-explosive type of Victor Berger.

Watch Los Angeles Grow

ONLY THINK OF IT! Where nine-and-twenty years ago were a dozen thousand people, more or less, the census enumerators have found 319,198 living in contentment! If it be good for a city to be big, how happy must the Angelenos be and what a slice of the unearned increment some of us might have made off with if we had foreseen the achievements of three short decades! Nature did not make Los Angeles. There was no eternal reason why a city must be just there, as in the case of San Francisco. The people of Los Angeles have done it themselves, and all honor to them for doing it.

Not a Bad Send-Off

IN RETIRING FROM PRINCETON UNIVERSITY to go into politics, Woodrow Wilson was voted half a year's salary, an L. L. D. and a professorship in jurisprudence and history. He'll take them all, but his professorship will be more of an object lesson on history in the making than by other method of instruction. It is not unlikely that as a progressive Democrat, almost as good as an insurgent Republican, he will try conclusions with stand-pat Harmon of Ohio for the Democratic nomination for the presidency two years hence. We are for Wilson.

All Bets Off

ALL BETS OVER THE SUPREMACY upon the high seas of England or Germany have been called off and the German ship-shops have shut down pending the pondering of Britannia's most recent coup. Her latest Dreadnaught is to be armed with thirteen-inch guns hurling shells weighing 1,250 pounds instead of the 850 which the German gunmakers had studiously sought to equal in penetrative power. It is the Kaiser's next move on the road toward universal bankruptcy.

British Kiddies

DURING THE DECADE BETWEEN 1885 and 1895, 147 out of each thousand children born in England, Scotland and Wales died before they were a year old. By 1900 the ratio had been reduced to 110 to the thousand and, for the last ten years, it has averaged 91. All because the constitutional right to be dirty has been vigorously invaded by minions of the law and ignorance has been taught how to care for the babies. This is socialistic and socialism won't work, but there are some aspects of that peculiarism that work rather well nevertheless.

Conservation of Men

OUR AMERICAN MINES kill double the proportionate number of miners at work that are killed in the mines of Europe but, inasmuch as the killed were mainly "ignorant foreigners whose places are easily supplied," because there are plenty more where they came from, relatively little attention has been given by the above-ground operators to the safety of the below-ground workers; but our government has taken the subject in hand and is sending out special cars equipped with the best modern devices for saving and safeguarding life in the mines, with teachers equipped to give demonstrations. In fact, we are carrying the idea of conservation to the conservation of men, as well because of the humaneness of the enterprise as because each worker in the country is an asset of the country. Great idea that of conservation! One of the blindest words in the whole vocabulary!

Three Things

The unthinking citizen is solicitous for three things for his home city: a large population, a low tax rate and good business. As for the rest, joy rides, the theatre, a dive into some sort of social swim, high or low, as his taste may run. So lives Man, the Animal! Created in the image of God he may be, but he is as certainly without the spirit of his maker as the steer on the range.

The thinking citizen rejoices in the growth of his home city because it corroborates his judgment that his city is a good one in which to live; he approves a low tax rate because it indicates economy and integrity in public affairs, and he rejoices in prosperity for, when times are good, people are cheerful and there is little of human suffering to be relieved.

But if the thinking citizen thinks at all deeply he realizes that these good things of city life are only means to ends, that among the ends to be attained are the development of the individual and the race, that such development must come through the establishment of justice and the making of conditions of urban life conducive to growth.

Now the hope of the future is in the child, and the hope of the child lies in his having opportunity to develop powers of mind, of body and of moral purpose. Unhindered by love and sacrifice economic pressure will crush the child of the city as inevitably as the advance of civilization crushes those primitive peoples who bar its path, and largely by the same instrumentalities—the vices of civilized man.

Three things are indispensable to the development of the child: wholesome home surroundings, education, play. The first comes of holding poverty, vice and drunkenness in check, the second through schools that teach the child the things he needs to know, the third through free access to some fraction of God's out-of-doors.

Play is the greatest educator the world has discovered. Only jellyfish refrain from play and it is because they can not play that they remain jellyfish. It is through play that the mind is given mastery over the body, and it is through competitive play that enthusiasm, courage, self-confidence are evolved. Without play in the open air, lots of it, for the children of a city, urban peoples are doomed to inferiority and death. To liberate childhood from sweatshops avails little if it be to turn the liberated into dark streets and alleys.

Charter Amendment twenty-one is more important to the future of San Francisco than any and all other amendments being submitted. It proposes that a tax be levied year by year of four to six cents on each $100 of assessed valuation to be used for the purchase of open spaces for playgrounds. We can, without serious harm to this generation or to the race, get on without parks wherein well-dressed men and women may decorously strut, but for the want of open spaces, free open spaces within four blocks of the remotest child, the race must suffer. Every city child is robbed of a normal childhood. No matter what in the forthcoming charter amendment election any voter may vote for or against, he will, if he loves childhood, if he regards the welfare of his race, vote "yes" on this amendment to purchase, continuously as the city grows, free, open spaces wherein the children of the present San Francisco may become fit to be the citizens of a better San Francisco by and by. Vote for Charter Amendment twenty-one.

The Business in Hand

California is free! The government of the state may now move forward unvexed by cor-

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage. Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Moir, 330 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

poration domination. It required a tremendous struggle to free our state and only by vigilance and fortitude can our dearly bought freedom be preserved. The devil never sleeps and greed is never sated.

The first duty of those who come into power is to see to it that hungry schemers do not convert this struggle for political liberty into a carnival for political plunder. More than likely zealous demagogues, newly converted from following in the train of Herrin, will come forward with drastic legislation having the hold-up for its object. The forces making for good government in this state are not fools. They will know cinch legislation for what it is as soon as they see it and they must be resolute to expose it, and the advocates of it, as soon as they make themselves manifest. Heretofore corporate interests have been protected in wrong. Henceforth they must be protected from wrong or they cannot stay out of politics. There are not two ways about that.

For a generation the government of California has, in the main, been in the hands of men who were not builders. They have been inspired by small zeal for perfecting the machinery of government. It sufficed them to operate that machinery as they found it. The need is for better governmental machinery as well as for better operation of that machinery.

The national model is before us. It is a far better model than any of those state systems of government that hark back, first to colonial times and from thence to royal charters. Put responsibility and power into the same hands and, in each case, let some one person be held accountable for results. Abolish commissions and, in their places, give us commissioners; abolish boards and in their places give us heads of departments; remember that state institutions are state, not local, to be managed by local men that they may subserve local interests. Unify, simplify, standardize! Efficiency is just as necessary in education, in caring for the insane, in operating state prisons as in railroad, manufacturing, army or navy.

Government has supplemented place-hunting with place-making, with the result that cost is high and efficiency low. Every supernumerary functionary, even though he draw no salary, adds to the cost of government and detracts from its efficiency.

The short ballot, made indispensable by the direct primary law, paves the way for a general simplification of the machinery of government. The new administration can devote itself to no better ends than to these herein suggested. Not all the work can be done at the next session of the legislature, but a great deal of it can be prepared to go before the people to be enacted into law two years hence and, at the end of four years, California should emerge with a form of government fit for a model for other states of the nation.

There Is a Difference

Nothing so enrages the man without character as to see a man with character assume that he has character and assume to place a line of demarcation betwixt himself and the indecent thing that would pretend to be his equal. There is a difference and the line that delimits the one from the other should be so broadened and deepened as to become a gulf fixed, a gulf that can be in no wise crossed except through penitence and works meet therefor. There is, for instance, all the difference between the person or periodical that stands for the adaptation to our present-day political problems of the old moralities and integrities, and the person or periodical that damns the moralities that he may have financial prosperity, that there is between unsullied womanhood and the hag that plies her trade on the streets by night, and if Californians have lost any part of their power for distinguishing good from evil, those who have character from those who have not, it comes of having admitted to their homes papers published by characterless men. It is time that the people of California cast out of their homes leprous papers and gutter periodicals. They defile whoever touches them. It is superfluous to mention such papers by name. They are known for what they are, but the public has grown indifferent to the harm they do. There is a difference between those who stand for Right Things at a sacrifice and those who chase the dollar to its lair reckless of how they get there. That difference is measured by the distance from heaven to hell, a distance so considerable that not since Dives and Lazarus has converse been held across it.

The Sacramento Union

Every good citizen in the Sacramento valley will rejoice that the Sacramento Union has passed into the hands of L. E. Bontz. For thirty years it was a decent paper, but handicapped by being the property of the Southern Pacific Company. During all those years it was a bill of expense. Its ownership discounted every word it said before it said it and the people would not have it. Then for a little more than a year, it was under the control of Col. E. A. Forbes. During that time it stood for Right Things frankly, courageously and against such odds that its sale to the Calkins syndicate was forced, but it was exactly during this short period that, for the first time in more than a generation, it came to show a balance on the right side of the ledger. For some months the people of the Sacramento valley were unable to credit their own senses, but when they came to know that The Union was free they rallied to it by thousands. During that period Mr. Bontz was its business manager and he knows how well it paid The Union to be free and up-standing. He also knows what a fall there was from prosperity and grace the moment Col. Forbes let go and the grafting interests in San Francisco succeeded to the Union's ownership. He will profit by that experience. Mr. Bontz is a clean and clear-headed man. We look for a resurrected Union of the Forbes era and for the people of northern and eastern California to meet him more than half way.

The Women of Washington

It is no easy load that the Women of Washington have taken upon their shoulders. Whoever discharges, and does not shirk, the duties of citizenship must give to it time, thought and effort. Whoever assumes the obligations of citizenship and neglects them is morally culpable and answerable for the sin of omission, generally more grievous than that of commission and harder to be expiated.

But if the women of Washington are only to double the burden of campaigning for Right Things, if they are to multiply by two, if not by three or four, the inert mass of enfranchised indifference to the public welfare, then will the men of Washington, to their latest day, regret the re-enforcements they have called by a two-to-one vote to aid them in making Washington a model commonwealth. If this paper cherishes any misgivings over the step taken by our sister state at the north they are due to the fear that the women of Washington will prove indifferent to their new obligations and unresponsive to the call to battle. The danger is that the willing few will wear their lives out trying to infuse zeal into the inert and unresponsive mass. It is so with men voters and seems likely to prove more so with women. It were better if the extension of the franchise could be coupled with some form of compulsory voting penalized by general disfranchisement for neglect of civic duty.

The franchise is a privilege, not a right, and with every privilege goes an obligation the neglect of which should work, automatically, the loss of the privilege and, if persisted in, then irrevocably. But how in the world did they do it? Were the saloon interests first crippled and then put to sleep or how was it? It was the saloon and the tenderloin that beat the suffrage amendment in California fourteen years ago and, doubtless for a substantial monetary consideration, the San Francisco Chronicle led the fight against the amendment.

Johnson's Backing

Never did governor take office with a better backing than Hiram Johnson will have. First there were the 26,000 men who, without distinction with regard to party, voted for Francis J. Heney for district attorney in San Francisco last year, men who hate graft and can be counted on to ally themselves with Right Things whenever the issue between Right Things and wrong is fairly presented to them. Then there are the 102,000 men who stood for him at the primary election, and those other thousands of independent Democrats who sacrificed party preferences in the belief that Johnson, rather than Bell, stood the best chance of making California free. Scarcely one vote went for Johnson that was not cast for the purpose of making California a free commonwealth. This backing of Johnson is militant. It will not only stand for what is right but it will fight for it. This makes Hiram Johnson the representative of an unflinching moral purpose, and backed by such a support, California has a right to expect, and will receive, the most progressive administration it has ever had. It is only necessary for the supporters of Johnson in the election to continue to be his supporters throughout his administration. When he calls for help the answer must be: "Here, Governor, am I." He cannot man his administration with office hunters and make it a success. The offices must hunt the right men and the men he needs must be as willing to make sacrifices for the common cause as he was in making the race. It is the only way.

Animosity Toward Railroads

Otto Kuhn, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., returned east having found little animosity toward railroads in the West and on the Pacific Coast, but fully persuaded that the railroads should keep out of politics and attend to railroading. Why should there be animosity toward the greatest of all modern instruments of progress and industrial well-being? We western people want more railroads and better. What we do not want is to have to whip the railroads to a standstill every time we try to elect decent men to office or inaugurate wholesome measures of government. It angers us to find the railroad management ever consorting with the saloon and the tenderloin, rich grafters and impecunious job chasers. And if, as now seems likely, the united railroads of America undertake to assess upon the industry and the commerce of the country an annual tax of $400,000,000, mainly that a value of two or three billions may be added to railroad securities already at or above par—well, if that is attempted as it is reported that it is to be, and Mr. Kuhn comes west again, he may trundle through a seething sea of animosity from ocean to ocean. The American people feel kindly toward railroads as railroads, and will be large-mindedly liberal with them; but railroads as freebooters, extortioners, debauchers of government and enemies of popular sovereignty, well, that is different, extremely different, Mr. Kuhn. All these things the railroads of California have been, and more, ever since railroads came to California and the sinners above all others have been those in which your house, Mr. Kuhn, has been so largely interested, to wit: the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky.

Deep Sea Thinking

With that sagacity that has, during recent years, characterized the stall-fed utterances of the San Francisco Chronicle, the morning after election it declared that the Democratic triumphs over standpatism in Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, New Jersey and Ohio, together with the triumph of the new Republicanism in California, New Hampshire, the entire Middle West and Northwest, excepting Indiana, made it clearly evident that the country had no use for insurgency.

But the President will be under no such misapprehension. He is not an absurd person. He is going to Panama and, while going and coming, is to do some "Deep Sea Thinking" on the lessons to be drawn from the recent standpat catastrophe. Put issues up to him, pro and con, in plain terms, and he will reach a sound conclusion. He is by temperament and training a judge, a bit stubborn, but no bourbon. He will see a great light before he returns if he has not seen it already.

Let him take these fundamentals with him. The American people believe in his sincerity and intent to do well. His mistakes are that he pitched his tent in the camp of the wrong wing of the party and he has yielded to pressure rather than fight. The awfulest foe that free government ever faced is now confronting it. That foe is an incorporated, purse-proud plutocracy. It is to fight. May the President return resolute for the conflict. Only by going at special privilege hammer and tongs can his administration be saved from ignominy. His deep sea thinking will do him little good if it does not make this much clear to him.

Beveridge

The one instance wherein an insurgent Republicanism was definitely beaten was in Indiana. The loss of Indiana will mean the loss of A. J. Beveridge from the United States senate and that is a great loss, a loss to the nation.

But is it not possible that the stone thus rejected may become the head of the corner? There is good presidential timber in Senator Beveridge. He is clean, strong and courageous, and unless the President can see his way clear to ally himself with the progressives instead of the reactionaries it is not improbable that the judgment of the people may turn toward the now defeated Beveridge to lead the contest in 1912.

Open Alaska

Secretary Ballinger, who had sunken into inglorious desuetude, lately emerged long enough to declare that Alaska should be opened to development. So it should. But let us have development, not exploitation.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Were you born in the United States? Were you born in Europe of parents having enterprise enough to come to the United States? Were you born to wealth or to poverty, to middle-class life or in a slum, of a father rejoicing in the health and cleanliness of a free manhood, or of a father bleary-eyed with "booze" and poisoned with disease? Was your mother a sweet, wholesome, pure-minded woman, loving your father as she loved her life, or was she a bedizened, painted, faded wretch, living in sin and squalor?

Were you given every chance that nurture and culture could give, or were you starved and neglected, kicked and cuffed, permitted to run with the street gamins and, at an age when you should have been tucked into your bed with fond hands, prayed for and taught to pray, were you forced into the street to sell matches and papers, chewing gum and lead pencils, profanity and obscenity your native tongue, bitterness toward those better off than you absorbing your thoughts and fashioning your soul? If the one, have you remembered to thank Almighty God that he has been so graciously kind to you? If the other, have you cursed the author of your being for having made you as he did, causing you to be born where he did and of parentage such as you had?

Do you fancy that if you had been born a coolie you would ever have been anything else than a coolie with the mind of a coolie? Or that if you had been born a slum child you would ever have been anything but a slum child with the thoughts of a slum child and the soul of a slum child? Do you imagine that your children's children, sinking under the crushing weight of an unequal chance, will be anything better than those now below the poverty line and their children anything better than gamins? With schools and churches and good society all about you, with love and example and the expectations of your set to hold you up, is it still as much as you can do to live cleanly and soberly, uprightly and in the love of God?

Why then this pride of spirit that causes you to draw close about you the coat or skirts of superiority lest you touch that which is unseemly and unclean? Is not the greater part of what you are purely accidental? Or if not pure accident, then attributable, nine points out of ten, to conditions lying wholly outside yourself? If only a tenth of what you are is due to what you have done of yourself, need you hate those who had more of a chance than you, or feel yourself superior to those who have less?

Can you go through life surrounded by these nine-tenths differences in condition wholly unconcerned by them? Is it nothing to you that the boy down the hill from where you live has not the chance to be a Right Man that your boy has, or that the daughter of your neighbor is working in a department store for a wage that will scarcely feed her, let alone buy the fineries you see her wearing, while your daughter sets the pace in dress for that girl to follow? How can you expect the daughter down the street to be and remain an "All Right Girl" under the conditions that surround her? Are these things nothing to you?

Do you laugh at the vagaries of those visionaries who, in seeking a solution to the riddle of inequality of opportunity through the world, bring forth that which is either revolutionary or imbecile, dangerous or unavailing? At least they have tried to solve the problem. Have you? Is there nothing due from you more than being thankful to your fortunate stars? Equality of condition we cannot have. But how about equity? Are you striving for equity for all mankind or only accepting it for yourself with a chuckle?

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

As the Law Works in England

It was not alone in the trial of the Crippen case, but also in connection with some of its side features, that comparison with American administration of law is most striking. For example, the editors of three influential English papers were fined (and unhesitatingly paid) $1,000 apiece for contempt of court in publishing erroneous statements about the case. Withal, the statements were of such a nature as would have received no attention whatever on this side of the water; compared with some assertions our papers publish in connection with any notorious trial, they were almost absurdly harmless. One paper, for instance, published a rumor that Crippen confessed after his arrest, and another asserted that on the last day of the trial counsel for the crown was in consultation with the quartermaster of the vessel in which Crippen tried to escape. No American need be told how harmless such publications would be considered over here or how entirely they would be disregarded by courts, but there the editors paid their $1000 fines without a murmur. If the mother country possibly errs on the side of severity, it is certain that we more grossly err on the side of laxity, and we would do well to look across the waters to learn those methods by which our administration of law might be improved. Doubtless we have too much of trials and convictions by newspapers.

Jewelled Anklets for Fair Women

Rings on her fingers and bells on her toes;
Now all that she needs is a ring in her nose.

The couplet should not seem inappropriate, for it is reported from London that certain Englishwomen now are wearing golden circlets about their ankles, the present fashion in short skirts permitting them to be displayed and to lure—but of course nobody could guess whom the fair wearers intend to lure. But if golden and bejewelled anklets are not just one step from the nose-ring of barbarism, will somebody mention where the other step might be taken? And, too, it is reported that these English women make it a point to display just enough be-laced or embroidered petticoat to add to the fascination of the anklet, on the principle that "half concealed is most revealed." And still some wonder that man does not progress more rapidly on the upward march: How could he if he is so unfortunate as to be the son of an anklet-wearing mother?—not to mention the real hobble of hobbles skirt.

The Progress of Oklahoma

The first white child born within the present limits of Oklahoma barely is a voter, so wholly new is this infant state. In 1900 Oklahoma City had a population of 10,037; by the census of this year the population was given as 54,168, an increase of 540 per cent in ten years. Nor do these figures in relation to the chief city give an adequate idea of the all but miraculous growth of this new commonwealth. At a conservative estimate the mineral and agricultural productions of Oklahoma during this year will exceed a half billion dollars in value. Note, too, the productions in which it stands either at the van or well toward the van of all the states: It is first in gas, in oil, in asphaltum, gypsum, glass sand, and in cement; second in lead and zinc, third in salt, fourth in granite, fifth in building stone, clay and slate, and seventh in marble. It also ranks seventh in cattle production, ninth in horses and in mules, and twelfth in hogs. In all of these respects, as well as in others that might be enumerated, it has surpassed the great majority of other and older states. Oklahoma has a right to be proud of its record; it is not often equalled.

Pneumonic Plague Discovered in England

From 1348 to 1369 the entire civilized world, extending from the east coast of China to the west coast of Ireland, was ravaged by the pneumonic plague, then known as the black death. In England one-third of the population was destroyed by the plague, and the English record was very similar to that in other countries. Not long ago, in Freston, Suffolk, four people died, and post mortems revealed the fact that their fatal illness was due to the "black death." This terrible disease, then, again has gained a foothold on English shores, and yet an epidemic is not now feared. Why? Simply because medical science has so increased its knowledge within the last six or seven centuries that physicians now know what to do to prevent its inroads. Sanitary precautions will be taken, rats, hares and squirrels (which convey the disease) will be exterminated, and the possibility of its spread will be reduced to a minimum. In brief, England now does not fear the spread of the plague because it need not; because doctors now can say to it, "Thus far, and no farther," and it must heed their command. Thus much has a knowledge of nature and her ways done for mankind since the old days of medical ignorance.

Making a Map for Aviators

When any government deliberately plans to map its territory for aviators, and so mark it that they cannot go astray by day or night, it looks very much as if that government, at least, judges that aeroplanes and dirigibles have come to stay and to do a practical work in the world. This is what the government of France now is doing. In conjunction with the aerial league, it has been making experiments in reading from great heights numbers traced in vivid colors upon the ground. The experiments were so successful that it now is proposed to divide all France into gigantic squares, at all corners of which immense figures, colored by day and outlined in light at night, will indicate to aviators flying above exactly where they are. It is understood that the government and the aerial league will operate together in thus re-charting and marking the country. If the system is successful in France doubtless it will be adopted elsewhere, and before long when we wish to learn exactly where our aviating friend is, the wireless will inform us that his ship at present is on the N. W. quarter of the S. E. quarter of section steen, etership blixty. Ah, the world certainly does move!

Buildings Erected for Spite

In a city so large and so densely crowded as New York human nature necessarily is seen in all its infinite variety. Good, bad or indifferent, men hustle and jostle one another, and virtue and vice have full opportunity to exhibit themselves at their best or worst. This being the case, it is not strange that the ugliest of all human frailties, spite, frequently displays itself there, and nowhere does it erect so notable monuments unto itself as in the construction of spite buildings. Years ago it chanced that a certain man was the owner of a strip of land more than 100 feet long and five feet wide running along Lexington avenue from the north side of Eighty-second street. Adjoining owners would not pay him the price he asked for his land, and so on that five-foot strip he erected a four-story building, thus shutting off the light from a row of his brownstone-front neighbors. There the building (occupied by its owner until 13 years ago) has stood for 28 years, but it is reported that it soon will be sold at auction. Nor is this monument to spite the worst of its kind, for at the corner of Melrose avenue and East 101st street is a three-story building 22 feet long which is but 3 feet 8¼ inches wide, or but 3 feet 2¼ inches interior width. Folding stairs, tables, etc., make these buildings more or less habitable. These are the extreme instances of a species of spite-work not entirely unknown to San Francisco, but there are other instances in plenty.

The Sex Point of Variance

The age-point of sex variance in play (which is where this variance first is revealed) has been determined with some definiteness by the English child study society. The society sent several thousand blanks to school children, in which they were asked to name their choice of plays, why they choose them, etc. About 9,000 answers now have been received, and from them it appears that the choice of English children from three to six years old, regardless of sex, is "ring of roses," known to us as "ring around a rosy," and the reason they prefer it is "because I like to fall down." At six years at the latest, however, the variance begins. Then the average girl turns to her doll, and the boy to balls, tops, horses, etc. From that time the variance becomes more and more marked as the years progress. From the foregoing it will be seen that the society merely has set a time of beginning to a variance which all of us knew to exist and almost any mother, at any rate, could have set the time about as definitely.

"Gone, Left No Address"

The foregoing words, and "Return to Sender," were printed on copies of the Paris Figaro and the Paris Temps which recently were sent to the former Portuguese address of ex-King Manuel and Dowager Queen Maria Pia. When the papers reached the place where the distinguished addressees recently would have been found the once royal personages did not appear to be at home. Something had happened, something necessitating a change of that address which, the post office assures us, they didn't leave. Thus dispassionately runs the official record of a royal tragedy, but nobody can successfully dispute that it is correct; they have gone, and they left no address.

CHARLOTTE PERKINS GILMAN'S LECTURE

Charlotte Perkins Gilman, the well known author and lecturer, arrived in San Francisco last Thursday, and is the guest of Mrs. J. B. McChesney, of 2334 Steiner street, (phone West 5739). During her stay in this city Mrs. Gilman will deliver a series of lectures, of which the first, on "Woman's Place in Civilization," will be given in the Palace Hotel on Sunday evening, November 13th.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

Luxor Oil Company, a corporation. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Southeast ¼ of Section 22, Township 32, Range 24, County of Kern, California.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 4th day of October, A. D. 1910, an assessment (No. 1) of two cents ($.02) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the above named corporation, payable in U. S. gold coin on Monday, the 10th day of October, A. D. 1910, at the hour of 10 o'clock A. M. of the said day, to H. F. Gordon, the Secretary of the said corporation, at the office of the said corporation on the ground floor or first floor of the building known and designated as No. 219, Sansome Street, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Monday, the 14th day of November, A. D. 1910, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on Wednesday, the 7th day of December, A. D. 1910, at 10 o'clock A. M. of the said day, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.
H. F. GORDON,
Secretary of Luxor Oil Company,
a corporation.

Location of office: 219 Sansome Street, San Francisco, California.

The California Weekly
IS PRINTED BY
Donaldson & Moir
PRINTERS
330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

FREEBOOTERS OF THE WILDERNESS
(By Agnes C. Laut)

The Uncle Tom's Cabin of Conservation has been written, and by a woman. What "The Planter" did or should do to make the American public understand what "Barbarous Mexico" is like, what "A Certain Rich Man" did, or should do, to make the American people know and understand the manner of man our modern captain of industry and finance is, "The Freebooters of the Wilderness" should do to carry to the American consciousness an understanding of the criminals who, by prostituting or breaking down the laws of their land, have taken for the benefit of the few the heritage of many, reproducing in free America that stratification of peoples that is the negation of democracy and which, if it be not withstood hand to hand and knife to hilt, will repeat in America the immeasurable miseries of Europe and Asia.

If we mistake not Miss Laut is of Canadian birth and knows the West, both sides of the line, just how well the reviewer does not himself know the intermountain West well enough to know, but her stage settings are varied, picturesque and in strong colors.

The book is a love story. The hero is a forest ranger fighting all the powers of plutocracy to preserve his forests from loot and to recover for the government coal measures that have been fraudulently located in the interests of a smelting company. The heroine is the daughter of a sheep owner, who also came over the line from Canada to escape punishment for his sympathy with the Indians in the Riel rebellion. The heavy villain is an ample belied, white waistcoated United States senator who gets for The Interests the things they want and, to do this, makes use of such tools as he needs including newspapers, handy-men in politics and journalism, cut-throat cattle rustlers, town toughs and murderers. Like other men of affairs this man does only those things that are necessary to be done to gain his point, and employs only such instrumentalities as are required for gaining them. He is big enough and brave enough to face the fact. However it may be with others he is under no misapprehensions as to the truth. He makes no effort to find excuses for what he does and he heartily despises those who do. His ruling passion is for prosperity, the building up of the country, not for the advantage of the many, whom he despises, but for the few who, by virtue of their strength and capacity, are fit to survive. As with all of his ilk, democracy is an exploded theory. His life was an intelligent exemplification of the "Damn the moralities, what we want is prosperity," philosophy of life, as fit an epitaph to be graven upon his tombstone as upon that of the San Francisco newspaper owner who first put in choice idiom what so many of his kind felt but did not say.

This heavy villain of plutocracy did things no worse than the San Francisco grafters did and went free. He hired cattle rustlers, whose stealings he bought to hustle thousands of sheep over the Rim Rock of the mesa, gave them a license to kill the herders and burn their bodies with their wagons and treated as an accident their excess of zeal in driving the boy of a missionary among the Indians over the rocks to his death with his pony and the sheep. He hired a drunken vagabond to kill the troublesome forest ranger, but the ruffian stupidly killed the flock owner instead, certainly not worse than dynamiting and assassination to be rid of troublesome prosecutors and witnesses.

The moral of the story is the identity of our modern industrial and commercial freebooters with the robber barons of old, the inefficacy and imbecility of government in Washington, the cowed toadyism of local government through politics by put-up-jobs, such as we have been familiar with in California for a generation, such as we are enduring in San Francisco now.

A crazy squaw, redeemed from starvation by the flock owner, her arm nerved to vengeance through love for the dead boy and gratitude toward the flockowner, metes out summary justice with her knife where law, and all that righteous fortitude may do, had failed of doing, and the story closes with the stage cleared for the dawning of a better era in the retrieving of the republic from special interests through an aroused public sentiment. The ranger is removed from his job because of being absent from duty without permission although tracking the cut-throat outlaws to their deaths in the desert, a task self-imposed because the sheriff was elected not to do the things that his office required him to do. In short, the "Freebooters of the Wilderness" is a story of the breaking down of the law told with verisimilitude and power. It is a book one is loth to lay down until finished, as free from the hysteria of the woman as it is charged with the righteous indignation of a man. Apart from the name on the title page, and a few feminine descriptive passages, there is nothing in the book to betray the sex of the writer. It is a man's book and has to do with a man's job, the preservation of democracy in America from the greedy clutch of the robber baron through the prostitution of public sentiment and the breaking down of the law. Moffat, Yard & Co., 31 East Seventeenth street, New York, $1.35 net.

Californian Poets' Corner

ON THE BORDER-LAND OF TEARS

By Carrie Stevens Walter

Mrs. Carrie Stevens Walter was a classmate and early friend of Charles Warren Stoddard. She died in San Jose, where she had long made her home, two or three years since.

On the border-land of tears,
Raised by hopes or crushed by fears,
Joy and grief alternate swell,
In the soul no peace can dwell.

On the border-land of tears
Stand the ghosts of vanished years,
All we might be and are not
Greet us on that haunted spot.

Clouds like ships, from shore to shore
To and fro pass evermore,
Sable-bordered—scarce appears
Tint of pearl through mist of tears.

All Life's quivering mile-posts loom
Sad as grave-stones through the gloom;
Trembling hopes are crushed by fears
On the border-land of tears.

TO THE SIERRAS

By Edward Robeson Taylor

Thou beckonest to me and I come once more;
Once more to lay my head upon thy breast,
And feel thy careful, all-sufficing rest
Body and mind deliciously steal o'er.
My soul so hungers for thy liberal store,
That every feeling with insatiate zest,
On thought's own wings by fancy's magic blest,
Leaves far behind the town's tumultuous roar.
'Twere joy enough to have thee once again,
If such possession were my very last
This side of death: to fly the haunts of men,
And mid thy solitudes outstretching vast,
To be as one with all thy countless brood,
Nor dare to question God's eternal good.

OF WRITING FOR MONEY

Two curious points of view toward this question seem to be deeply rooted in the modern mind. One is that held by Lord Rosebery, and enunciated by him some time recently at a Burns celebration, when he said that he believed one of the greatest pieces of good luck, for posterity, was Burns's failure to go to the West Indies, because he would probably have become a prosperous planter and never again have written his immortal verse. Lord Rosebery added the dictum that poverty seemed to be an especially salubrious soil for the growth of literature, that the possession of money seemed fatal to that growth.

The other view is the reverse of this: that the coarse, commercial element in the business of writing for gain destroys the finer fibres of being and lowers the tone of an author's work.

Either view obviously falls before the test of history. It is not of record that Aeschylus or Sophocles had to write for a living; on the contrary, they belonged to that favored Greek aristocracy that, of all men, was most favored in wordly ease so far as livelihood was concerned. Bacon's crystalline English seems only to have mellowed with his rise in fortune. Ruskin had no need to take thought for the morrow, and surely Ruskin wrote well. Goethe was a child of fortune, Byron too, and they adorned the literature of their lands. Hugo never really knew the need of financial prudence, yet he wrote himself into enduring fame.

On the other hand, Shakespeare wrote for a living. Moliere did the same, and neither seemed to gain or lose in force with the fluctuations of fortune, only with the passage of time and growth in experience. Thackeray was a slave to his pen, so was Dickens, so was our own Poe. None of them, save Poe, spurned to profit by his art nor to husband thriftily his gains, and Poe only because he could not.

Both views, to our thinking, are beside the truth. May it not be simply that, like the rest of us, most people have to live by labor, and that most people can earn most at that thing they can do best, and that any occupation that is done well requires most of one's time? And is it not probable that the possession of the ability to write is as much a peculiar gift as the possession of unusually good vision, and as disconnected with money, or the absence of it, as the possession of sound nerves? It seems to us that this is a more rational explanation. Some men write just as other men take naturally to chemistry and others to mechanics. They write because they like to write, because they are by nature adapted to it and impelled to it, just as others like to live in the open air and are impelled to use their strong muscles.

Money may affect writers in the same way that money affects everyone else; it may tempt to idleness or dissipation or frivolity. And some writers succumb to these temptations. But there is nothing in the temper of writers to cause a larger percentage of them to so succumb than of any other class. If the rich merchant's son goes the primrose path of dalliance we say simply, "Another fool." If a writer does likewise we say "Those hare-brained authors." Now authors as a class are not hare-brained; the class contains its proportion of fools, sluggards, dullards, weaklings, degenerates and lunatics, but no more than the proportion in any other class. The difference is mainly in the relative prominence of the author. The merchant's son is merely stowed quietly away in a private sanatorium, where everybody forgets him, because he was of no account at any time. The author, on the other hand, having given promise of achievement and proven himself possessed of unusual gifts, is pointed to as an example and people do not forget his fall.

OUR SUPERLATIVE COUNTRY

By E. FRENCH STROTHER

The editor has instructed me to destroy the fallacy that the United States is the greatest country in the world, and at the same time to be careful to impart no information to the reader. Genuine information is as rare and as precious as radium, and this office does not propose to lose what little it has by careless leakage through the columns of this paper. We have, however, like everybody else, an unlimited supply of near-information, perfect imitations of the genuine, something just as good, and the reader is welcome to all of this he cares to read. This page, though, is sacred to the dissemination of no information at all.

Its purpose and function are exactly illustrated by the dialogue of the minstrel show:

End man—Would you like to hear the sad story of my life?

Interlocutor—No.

End Man—Then I will tell it to you.

I know that you hug the fond delusion that the United States is the greatest country in the world. I know that you heartily wish not to have that delusion destroyed. Therefore I will destroy it.

Now the first step in the work of destruction is to point out the prime failing of us as a people. We are obsessed of the superlative degree. The veriest trifle is our shibboleth. That trifle is a combination of three letters, e, s and t. Sometimes it is only s and t. It is the sign manual of the extraordinary, the insignia of the superlative. It changes "great" into "greatest," it excites the imagination from indifference to lively interest, it magnifies the sober truth into an intoxicating delusion, it transforms us from a nation of well-meaning and industrious citizens into a nation of braggarts and liars. So fond are we of this trifling delusion that we let it warp our sense of proportion until we lose all judgment of comparative values, until the truth is insignificant by the side of our extravagant magnifications of fact.

In California, for instance, the first thing observed by the visitor is the rhythmical succession of superlatives that the natives thrust upon him. He hears that California has the biggest trees in the world, the bluest skies, the most temperate climate, the most magnificent coniferous forests, the lowest dry land, the highest mountains, the deepest valleys, the most fertile soil, the biggest irrigation systems, the finest schools, the most beautiful university campus, the best bathing beaches, the finest harbors, the earliest oranges, the best fruit, the most wonderful flowers, the most luscious grapes and most of them, the largest yield of raisins, the biggest crops of alfalfa, the most productive oil fields, the longest electrical transmission lines, the most beautiful women.

Then, having exhausted our superlatives in the upper register and the superlatives of things that one should be proud of, we are not content to stop, but let our mania for est take us to the lower register and to the superlative of the things we ought, by right, to be ashamed of. And thus we proclaim to all the world, and with pride, that we have the most lunatics in proportion to population, that San Francisco has the vilest dens of vice and most of them (right now we are putting the soft pedal on this—we want the exposition), that California has the most degraded Indians, the oldest frame shack (at Monterey—see Harper's Weekly of recent date), the toughest outlaws and hardest to kill, the most tramps, and "the d—dest finest ruins ever looked on anywhere," as the thoroughly characteristic poem, written right after the fire, puts it.

And the wan and weary Easterner never fails—never fails—to add, "And the most monumental liars I ever met."

Now I am not sticking any pins that I haven't set upon myself. By voice and pen I have given currency to nearly all of these superlatives myself—from sheer force of habit. Everybody does it. Why shouldn't I? I have.

But isn't it really funny—or pathetic—when you come to think about it? We don't stop even with the superlatively big and the superlatively small. Oh, no. That would cut too many of us out of a chance to boost our own little brag. So, to give all of us a chance, we have invented something that we may call the "qualified superlative." A few samples will illustrate what I mean: Milpitas, we will say, has the most first-class mail of any town of 200 inhabitants in the United States; Imperial has the coolest climate of any county whose average of yearly temperature is 100 degrees or more; San Francisco has the best city government of any city destroyed by a combination of fire and earthquake during the month of April, 1906. More samples are superfluous; having the formula, anybody can figure himself into the superlative class. Even this observation is gratuitous; we have all got into the superlative class, already, by approximately this route.

But the gently scornful Easterner who classes us with the superlative liars and lets it go at that, is plucking motes and forgetting to harvest his own crop of beams. Missouri is bragging of the biggest production of eggs of any state in the Union, just as she has long bragged of the biggest farms, the most lead, of the tallest corn, and the cussedest mules. New York brags of the tallest buildings, the most people, the corruptest Tammany, the richest rascals, the most impolite public manners, the greatest commerce, the most fashionable women, and the greatest Great White Way. Boston lets it leak out that she has the most cultured classes and the choicest beans that ever were. Philadelphia has the homeliest homes of all. Pittsburg has the most smoke, the most millionaires, the most steel (spell it either way), the quickest fortunes and the fastest possessors thereof.

Altogether, the Easterner has not much "on" us in this matter of bragging. Truth to tell, most of us are Easterners, simply moved West. So we may say that the worship of the superlative, to give it the kindest name, is a national failing.

Now we have got down to the proof of our first proposition: that the United States is not the greatest country in the world. We might achieve this at a stroke, simply by quoting "the first shall be last," but that would presume that at some time the United States was first, and, anyway, we scorn to be simple when we have opportunity to be profound, or to be frivolous when we can be serious.

Proceeding to our proof, we shall need, as geometricians do, an axiom or so. One, perhaps, will suffice: we may assume, from the experience of ages, that lies are told to conceal the truth. Hence does it follow that half lies are told to conceal half the truth. Now bragging is simply half-lying. It may be that we tell the truth when we brag, but in telling that truth we are seeking to hide another truth; we brag about one thing to distract attention from something else; we laud the superlative fit of our vest to hide the superlative hole in the seat of our breeches.

And so with our boast that we are the greatest of nations. We are merely whistling to keep our courage up. Deep in our inmost souls we know a great deal better. We dare not specify, we simply lump our individual realizations of weakness, throw out our aggregated chest, and say, "Look at the mightiest front of all." We know very well the danger of being specific. Shall we boast of numbers? China and India merely smile. Are we a republic? Switzerland laughs. Have we a democracy? England grins. Are we rich? France grows facetious. Are we mechanical? Germany wriggles her thumb. Are we artistic? Italy scoffs. Are we lovers of literature? Greece mocks us. Do we a mighty commerce? Britain sniffs from the sea. Are we devout? The Hebrew sneers. Have we vast dominions? Russia glowers from the north.

Napoleon made no boasts before Austerlitz; he did before Waterloo. The virtuous woman blushes at the name of virtue; the strumpet proclaims her virtue in the streets. The ingenious reader is welcome to multiply these apothegms, these sparkling facets of wisdom upon the incrustations of experience, to his heart's desire. Suffice it for the writer to add one more: that boasting is a sign of weakness, an admission of deficiency. We know that we are not the greatest nation on earth; therefore we shout that we are. We know that Kipling was right when he applied all those stinging epithets to us, "easy," "careless," "a brother hedged with alien speech, and lacking all interpreter." We know that our back yard is full of the weeds and tomato cans of a hurried and unassimilated civilization; we know that our pants are short and our cuffs are dirty; we know that, though our clothes are all new, they are not of a piece—we are like the newly civilized Indian, who wears a gray suit striped with green, a yellow tie, a red vest, lavender socks, tan shoes and a derby hat. Our mixture of races is a very pousse-cafe of bloods. We have no national art, we have no great literature, we have no architecture, we have no vital drama, our government is still an experiment, our moral consciousness is dull, we are inchoate. We are not the greatest thing that ever happened. Not by a long shot.

But we have wonderful qualities and wonderful possessions in which we may take pride—only, as we love truth and hate pretense, let us not tack est on to the end of their names. If a thing is good, call it good, and have done. Don't call it best. If we are great—and we are—say great, and let it go at that. Don't add est and convict ourselves of three crimes: bragging, lying and folly.

We have, for instance, exactly what made the Renaissance glorious—a magnificent energy and the desire to know. Every cross-roads woman's culture club is a symbol of a thirst for knowledge, nation-wide and conscience-deep. That is the saving grace of our boasting: we boast of the possession of the things we think are desirable, and among these, along with trash and much worship of mere bulk, we do include some things that really are elements of human greatness, of an advancing civilization.

This is written the day before election. Tomorrow the country will be saved—it makes no difference which side wins, that side will save it—and peace from the waving of Old Glory will be ours. But leaving Old Glory out of it, and the grand old parties and all the rest, we can be proud of our country without ranging up for comparison alongside such others as Britain, Germany and France: we can say, with much truth and without shame that, by the grace of God, this is our country, we've got to live in it, we like it, it suits us—sinners, saints, back-yard and all—suits us down to the ground. Isn't that enough to say?

The rumbling and groaning train had been toiling along from Memphis, Tenn., toward Bald Knob, Ark., all through the hot afternoon. The stops had been frequent, but at last came one of unusual duration. After a tiresome interval, the conductor walked back through the mosquito-punctuated aisles until his glance met a sympathetic face. He bent over the kindly looking passenger and whispered: "Stranger, have you got a bit of string about you? The engine's broke."—Everybody's Magazine.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

It's Never Too Late

If you've galloped along in a reckless way until you have stubbed your toe,
And have fallen flat in the mire or dust, while the gallopers shout, "Ho, ho!"
If you've hit the places that some term high till the places low you've found,
And you feel that the universe is awry from your view-point on the ground;
In short, if you've gone at a giddy pace—a pace I confess I have tried—
And are left behind in the earthly race, with the fool and the sluggard tied,
Why, rise from the mire, stand stalwart, and go! Be never discouraged, my friend,
For it's never too late to mend, you know,
until it's too late to mend.

I look to the past and I see where I fell, a fact I dislike to recall,
But be you as honest, no doubt you can tell of places where you had a fall.
The soul knows of heights it longs to attain,
but fetters upon us are set,
And the man who is perfect, I'm sorry to say,
is the man that I never have met.
But what of it, brother? We'll up, and press on regardless of scars that we bear;
Our hopes in the dust, ideals betrayed, we will hold there is One who doth care.
Let us rise though we fall, let us win though we lose, till failure with intent shall blend,
For it's never too late to mend, you know,
until it's too late to mend.

I have seen, I have seen, in these few years of mine, where failure grew into success,
And the error that's written, through effort divine, may merge in the life that shall bless.
Oh, pitfalls surround us, each placed by a hand that the hand of a brother should be,
And, blind and misguided, too late we have seen the snare that a wiser might see;
But we will not heed the scars that we bear denoting the falls that we knew;
We'll hold that a Man to the battle must fare,
though knowing that wounds must accrue.
And we'll rise though we fall, we will win though we lose, unheeding the day and its trend,
For it's never too late to mend, you know,
until it's too late to mend.

Adapted to Its Purpose

The statuesque and willowy young lady who floated into the office said that she had a verse which she wished to submit for thoughtful criticism.

"It is," she said, "but a simple quatrain, but I think the trobbing soul of it must be visible to the most thoughtless. That is why I have brought it to you."

"Very well," the editor remarked, "go ahead."
"I ask only that you will judge its simplicity simply," she prefaced. "Here it is:

"The dinkly birds that dinkle sweet
Within the blunksome hollow
Unto my glogly soul repeat:
'Oh, follow, follow, follow!'"

"While I do not recognize some of the words," the editor said, "I entertain no doubt it must say something. In strict confidence between ourselves, would you be willing to assume me that it does?"

"Er—no," the young lady replied, "but—that is—you know it is intended for magazine poetry."

"Ah," the editor responded, "that being the case, I feel no doubt that your contribution will be eagerly received and appropriated."

Thus encouraged, the young lady was filled with a glad content when she departed.

"He used to pose as a patron of the arts, I recall." "Yes, but he does so no longer."
"Why not?" "He gradually grew up to the idea that the arts were so big and so fine that they did not need his patronage."

The Opinions of Rufus

Seems to me that the man that can't make a heap of 'lowance fer sinners ought to git somebody to introduce him to himself.

'Pears to me that some folks that say, "Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner," put more emphasis on the "me" an' less on "a sinner" than the facts justify.

I hate to deny that women deserve to be called gentle, but did you ever notice them at a bargain sale?

All the world's a stage, but some of the actors are 'nough to make any man tired of the show.

I heered of a woman that was beautiful an' didn't put in any time admirin' herself in the glass. Alas, she was blind.

Josh Bings says he can't see why Ananias an' Saphiry was struck dead, es long es they don't seem to be any 'tention paid to the rest of us.

If "I meant to do it" is accepted as a good excuse at the narrer gate, I reckon that the most of us 'll pull through.

It ain't recorded that Adam asked Eve to 'give him a bite of that apple, but I'll bet he wuz lookin' at it mighty wistful.

In the numeral system of a good many families the woman is the cipher that multiplies the man's worth by ten.

Ezry Pennick says he understands that the church without women is situated on the bank of the lake without water.

I reckon it's true that there's jest es good fish in the sea es ever was caught, but I don't see es that proves that you an' I are goin' to ketch any of 'em.

* * *

Microbes and Bacilli

Microbes and bacilli, bacteria not a few,
And every time I breathe I gulp a million bugs or two.

I take a drink of water, and the doctors all proclaim

That I'm a walking arsenal of bugs I cannot name,

And if I take a drink of milk to mitigate the curse,

The wise physicians jointly yell, "Well, really,
milk is worse!"

Bacilli-haunted, e'er assailed by every microbe shape,

Ah, woe is me—you bet it is, for how shall I escape?

I kissed a lass the other night, and thought it was a snap,

But, oh, the man who saw thg deed, he was a doctor chap,

And straightway then he proved to me—it was a cruel blow—

That probably I had absorbed a million bugs or so

From those red lips. Oh, heart of mine, why thus my ardor treat?

And yet I here and now confess those bacilli seemed sweet;

And if a man can't sample sweets without an insect scrape,

Ah, woe is mine, and woe is thine, for how shall we escape?

Oh, little bugs that me assail through every day and night,

I wish the docs would call you off, your epitaphs would write.

I yearn and yearn for those good days my grandpas ne'er did lack,

When stomach-ache was stomach-ache, and not a bug attack.

With microbes, microbes everywhere, and not a drop to drink

Without a dose of bacilli to make one's vitals shrink;

In food we eat, in air we breathe, their hungry
jaws agape,

Oh, woe is mine, and woe is thine, for how shall we escape?

Your Occupationless Wife

You took unto yourself a wife, and it is your duty to support her as best you may; also, in due season there came straggling along certain very small and very absurd travelers from Noman's Land, and it is your duty to support them. Consequently you must dig; you must be at the office even when you would greatly prefer to go fishing; you must earn the bread, not only for yourself but for from two to a dozen others, by the sweat of your brow and by keeping your nose faithfully on the ever-whirring grindstone. Tough, isn't it? Oh, you bet one has to pay the price for being a man! And then, to add to the sting, the average woman has nothing to do except to keep house.

Yes, it really is a fact that many women have nothing to do—except, of course, to keep house, and, as the United States census bureau so happily states the case, that is not an occupation. For a light and enjoyable form of entertainment commend me to keeping house, although the women do make such an immortal row over it. Consider for a moment what a snap it is. All the housewife has to do every day without intermission is: Get the breakfast, wash and wipe the dishes, make the beds, straighten the rooms, get lunch, wash and wipe the dishes, mend the kids' clothing, spank the baby, make a new gown for Susie,
get the dinner, wash and wipe the dishes, look neat and cheerful so she will attract her husband, improve her intel—

Oh, see here! I haven't the heart to continue the list. The wonder to me is that, in this ceaseless grind of petty, monotonous cares,
the majority of women do not go insane.
Most men would; ours may be the stronger sex, but we would.

And we do not wish our wives to seek some occupation that, strangely enough, suits them better, and hire a housekeeper, because we are so tenderly considerate of them, you know!
John, Henry or Adolph, don't you make yourself tired when you think about yourself and your self-considering regard for your wife?
Just between ourselves, I do

* * *

Hobble, Hobble, Little Skirt

Hobble, hobble little skirt!
How I wonder if you hurt
When you make her come a cropper
As too suddenly you stop her.
When she tries her steps to hasten
Does she often bust a bastin',
Or a thread, and does she mumble
Words as hot as men would grumble?
Does she mind her skip and wobble
In her hobble, hobble, hobble?
Do man's jeers her feelings hurt?
Tell, oh, tell me, hobble skirt.

* * *

Now Look Out for Rain

"Now, then," said Jupiter Pluvius to his ablest assistant, "I want you to get busy immediately."

"For instance, how, sire?" the ablest assistant inquired.

"I want you to open the heavens and turn a rain loose on the earth."

"Yea, sire."

"And it must be a good rain."

"Yea, sire."

"A cleansing rain."

"Yea, sire."

"An extra-clarifying, super-purifying rain."

"Yea, sire. By the way, I suppose it is the same old trouble?"

"Oh, yes, you've guessed it; they have been holding another election down on the earth.
I realize that mere rain is woefully inadequate,
but it is the best we can do."

With a heavy sigh, Jupiter Pluvius turned away and seizing a long pair of tongs, dropped the Morning Political Howler into the hottest furnace.

And the ablest messenger got busy.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Only Hiram Johnson Could Have Done It

Hiram W. Johnson proved to have been the man of the hour. Francis J. Heney might have done it three years earlier, but not at the end of his three years' fight against graft when he was worn out and unstrung. Hiram Johnson went into the battle fresh, in the full vigor of manhood at its prime, he made the greatest personal canvass ever made in this or any other state, carried his "message to Garcia," as did the "fellow of the name of Rowan," and he arrived a free man at the head of a free state. He had not one iota of support from any man or interest for whom he or anyone need make explanation or apology. He virtually dared the interests and their following to do their worst, and they did it. No more unpollitic man ever entered politics. He asked nothing of either administration, national or state, and he went forth declaring to all Californians, as Paul declared to the Philippians, "This one thing will I do"—make California free. With the newer Republicanism defeated in New York and Indiana and the old Republicanism snowed under in ever so many states east of the mountains, the triumph of the party in California makes Hiram W. Johnson a national figure. It was a splendid victory splendidly won. And if anyone among the candidates before the primary, except Johnson, had been nominated in his place the very gates of heaven, to say nothing of the other place, could scarcely have saved California to the Republican party.

Give Hiram Johnson A Chance to Rest

Either our elections should be held earlier or our inductions into office should come later. Hiram Johnson is tired out. There is a limit to what flesh and blood can endure and Mr. Johnson has reached his limit. Mr. Heney thought himself invulnerable, but the three years of his fight against graft floored him and he had to have months of rest before he became himself again. Hiram Johnson will have only weeks in which both to rest and to make preparation for taking up a new business. Office hunters, keep away until well long into December and so give him that rest which he must have if he is to be fit to take up the duties of his high office when he must take them up. He must also put his own affairs into shape. He hasn't looked at them for eight months, during all of which time he has been working for nothing and supporting his family. Give Hiram Johnson a chance to rest. If he needs you he will send for you.

How Is It With Theodore Bell?

The Watchman has believed in the sincerity and cleanliness of Theodore Bell and is of the same opinion still, but never was helpless orphan in more undesirable surroundings. The lure of office swept him from his feet. The most outrageous slanders were hurled at Johnson in the cause of Bell and Bell was consenting that they be used. The Devil took the Democratic leadership up to the top of a high mountain of opportunity and showed them the kingdoms of California to be had in exchange for worshipping that same Devil. The chance was jumped at. The lure of party success was a greater temptation than could be withstood. It was so in New York, where Democratic success was won at the cost of an alliance between Wall street and Tammany Hall in control of the party. With the best intentions in the world Theodore Bell could not, had he been elected, have withstood the pressure of the forces that made him Governor. His administration would have lacked the vitalizing power of a living soul. A fine fellow, Theodore Bell has made the supreme mistake of seeking a public career for Theodore Bell rather than an opportunity to serve, it may be at a sacrifice, the highest good. A fine type of man, he is not of that toughness of fiber that fits him for this time and this service. Per contra, The Watchman chances personally to know with what reluctance Hiram Johnson entered the lists: "I can't, and I won't," was his reply to repeated urgings from many sources, and not until convinced that he was, as he proved himself to be, the one man who could fill all requirements did he consent to run. Theodore Bell is young. He should devote himself to his profession. If his state needs him it will call him as it called Johnson. There is no need that he keep his ear to the ground lest he fail to hear.

The Case of Roosevelt

At first glimpse it would seem that the spell of Theodore Roosevelt had been broken. In New York he tore the organization of his party from the hands of the political bunco-men who had made merchandise of it, only to go down to defeat before a combination of Tammany Hall Democrats, Wall Street financiers and the Republican Old Guard, re-enforced by timid souls haunted by the specter of the man-on-horseback. He made speeches in Indiana, Ohio, Massachusetts and Connecticut and they all went Democratic. We shall hear from all sides that Roosevelt is done for. But he is not. He is a man, and not a god. He threw himself into the fight to save the administration of his friend and for the redemption of his party from vassalage. He was a man to double-business bound. Believing that it must be through the Republican party that greater and better things are to come to his country, he took the party as he found it in each state and made the best of it. In New York he was handicapped by a bad platform that he could not prevent, in Ohio by a bad party organization and bad platform, in Massachusetts by the shadow of that old first family aristocracy of intellectual exclusiveness against which the common man has risen in a well-justified wrath. Roosevelt has not been vanquished. He is a Republican, has preserved his party regularity without compromising his principles, and he will up and at 'em again before he is a fortnight older. And remember this: Only in those states where Rooseveltism dominated party and platform was the Republican party successful. Republicans of New York were beaten by their platform and Roosevelt did not make that platform and was not responsible for it.

Standpatism Explains It

The reason for the slump to the Democrats throughout the East is not far to seek. Notwithstanding the President's oft repeated assurances the American people do not believe that what he says is so. They know that the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill is not such a measure as they expected and not such a measure as they had a right to expect. His Winona, Minnesota, speech doomed the American Congress to a Democratic majority. Elected as a progressive Republican, the fact that the President made his bed with Cannon and Aldrich, Elkins and Lodge, discredited him for the reactionary he seemed to be rather than was. Naturally an indolent-minded man, loving golf-links of peace and pleasantness, he shunned conflict with his enemies only to be forced to fight his friends, and now the whole country lays more blame and less credit at his door than he deserves. He has probably learned a thing or two.

Moreover the Republican party is in the throes of a new birth, always a painful experience. It has got to be a progressive party or a dead party and if it loses something during the process of being born again it will be all the stronger when it comes out with a new skin and renewed vitality. The standpaters knifed the ticket and the lure of party success held too many progressive Democrats to the ticket of their party.

But not all Democratic victories were disasters. The one in New Jersey was a distinct victory for progressive policies. In Ohio the Republicans deserved the thumping they got. Only in New York does the sting of defeat really hurt, and even there the platform builders right well deserved what they got.

The Meaning of the Socialism is as certain the wail of discouragement as anarchism is of despair, and the big vote given the Socialist ticket measures the number of those who say in their hearts: "It is of no use. The common people cannot beat the power of money to oppress in any other way than by making the power there is in money to perish in the hands of its owners, and this can be done only by taking into the hands of government all the means of production and distribution. Socialism is our last card. Let us play that and die."

Socialism is the penultimate answer of the common man to The Interests. The final one is anarchy. There was danger that Socialism might take full possession of unionism. Now the chances are that labor unions will take possession of socialism. Two-thirds of the carmen in Oakland, on a straw ballot in their lodge, voted for socialism, and to about that extent they voted in the election. If these men had believed that the regeneration of the Republican party within the party were possible they would have helped it, but they had no hope, and the incapacity of Democracy to govern has become a habit of mind. Therefore Socialism! We shall have more of it before we have less, and nothing short of a Republican party that does things and undauntedly dares to undertake to do them, will avert the danger of a wide-spreading gospel of socialistic discontent.

Standpaters Were Bolters

If we may judge from certain precincts in Oakland, and a lot more in Sacramento, twenty percent of the Republican voters bolted the head of their ticket. It was notorious that extreme partisans of the President and of Gillett had their knives whetted to a keen edge with which to reach, if they could, the vitals of Johnson and Wallace. Of course all those who sympathized with the grafters voted against Johnson and Wallace, also every mother's son who could be so influenced to do by the railroad, the saloon and the red-light push. It is more than likely that the victory of a progressive Republicanism in California was won by the help of the progressive Democrats. The Watchman hopes they have come to stay. They are the kind of men needed to man a party that has the grit to go forward. The coming two years will see a world of recruiting, drilling and making ready for the great struggle of 1912. There are bully fights ahead.

The Triumph of William Kent

The more the Kent campaign, both for nomination and election, is studied, the more remarkable will his triumph appear. Glenn county went for Bell by 500, and for Zumwalt by less than 90; Napa gave Bell a majority of 700 and Kent 500; Sacramento went for Bell by 600 and for Kent by 500, and yet those who knifed Johnson generally knifed Kent, but Mr. Kent drew more from the Democrats than did Johnson. He was entirely frank with his constituents on tariff, parcels post, anything and everything that the people wanted to talk about, and they took to him with more regard for the man than for party.

San Francisco Legislators

The legislative delegation from San Francisco is, as usual, a disappointment. The only men elected from whom there is any reason to expect good records are Assemblymen

POLITICAL TABLE TALK---Continued

Gerdes, Beatty, Walsh and Joel. In almost every other case the man defeated was better timber than the man elected. Three of the four senators and four of the eighteen assemblymen are either deputies in Sheriff Tom Finn's office or owe their political being to him. Tom Finn is a McCarthy machine man, a waterfront saloonkeeper and politically of unsavory type. Conspicuously good men defeated were J. E. White in the 39th, J. T. Kane in the 31st, E. A. Murphy in the 32nd, and J. A. O'Keefe in the 33rd. The election of M. L. Schmitt in the 40th and Nat Coghlan in the 41st returned two straight machine incumbents from districts that offered better candidates in their opponents. The defeat of C. Lightner, incumbent in the 45th, removed a man with a good record to give place for a man, D. M. Denegri, backed by the old Ruef ring. Of the 22 elected, all but four will probably take orders from either the McCarthy machine or the Espee machine.

THE SAN FRANCISCO CHARTER
AMENDMENTS

No. 1. Directs supervisors to issue $5,000,000 in bonds, the proceeds to be turned over to the Panama-Pacific International Exposition Company upon demand; excludes this bond issue from the bond-ridden indebtedness limit of 15 per cent of assessment value; grants control of all of Golden Gate Park west of Twentieth Avenue to the Exposition Company until one year after the closing of the exposition; grants same control over all lands of school department west of Twentieth avenue, and not in use; and authorizes Exposition Company to close streets in these districts except where such closing will bar access to private property not acquired by Exposition Company.

Discussion: No. 1 simply gives the Exposition Company necessary funds and powers to carry out the proposed exposition. The sections relating to Golden Gate Park are permissive and not mandatory upon the Exposition Company as to the matter of a site for the exposition, but practically the passage of this amendment is likely to settle the question of the site in favor of the park. This may not be the best solution, but if you want the exposition. Vote Yes.

No. 2 Ousts the present Board of Trustees of the public library and substitutes a board consisting of the Mayor (ex-officio) and six appointees of the Mayor, to hold office for six years and in such manner that one trustee is appointed every year.

Discussion: The public library, since 1878, has been managed by a board of trustees who hold office for life and fill vacancies in their number by vote of remaining members. The plan is unusual but the personnel of the board has always been good and the claim is made for it that it has reduced expenses of administration to the lowest point per public served of any library of equal efficiency in the country. Probably the present plan is better than the proposed change, which is likely to put the library into politics. Vote No.

No. 3. Provides for raising the "dollar limit" of taxation, in the event of the passage of Amendment No. 1 of the State Constitution, by an amount equal to one-half the rate of taxation levied for State purposes in 1910. Provides further for special tax levies, in addition to taxes within the dollar limit, for and only for eight specific purposes: 1. street work, 2. sewer work, 3. construction or reconstruction of public buildings, 4. extension of fire protection system and equipment of fire department, 5. acquisition of lands within county for municipal purposes, 6. construction of bridges and other public structures, 7. collection and disposal of garbage, 8. special sanitary measures.

Discussion: Vote No.

No. 4.—Declares intention of city to gradually acquire and operate its public utilities; vests power and discretion of necessity to acquire, lease or dispose of necessary property and franchises to effectuate such intention, in the Supervisors; limits leases of public utilities to twenty years; provides for initiative and referendum in the matter of acquiring public utilities; two-thirds vote necessary to carry bonds for this purpose; permits creation of special commissions, superseding Board of Public Works, to operate public utilities so acquired.

Discussion: Vote No., for reasons given by Merchants' Association. Should be rejected until perfected.

No. 5.—Permits Supervisors, at discretion, to contract for official advertising with the lowest bidder at a uniform rate for all advertising except the delinquent tax list, which shall be bid on separately, or to cause to be printed weekly in a newspaper to be called the "Municipal Record" containing all matters of public interest and a legal substitute for the publication of advertising in the daily press.

Discussion: The alternative of a Municipal Record is the new feature proposed by this amendment. It is a good one. Vote Yes.

Nos. 6 and 7 and 8 are exhaustively treated on another page. Vote Yes on all three.

No. 9. Provides four-year terms of office for Mayor, Supervisors and other elected officials, in such manner that the Mayor, County Clerk, Auditor, District Attorney, Sheriff, Coroner and half of the Supervisors shall so hold office from January 8, 1912, while the Tax Collector, Recorder, City Attorney, Public Administrator, Treasurer and remaining Supervisors shall so hold office from January 8, 1914.

Discussion: This is a step toward the "short ballot" and has also the virtue of setting city elections in years when neither President nor Governor is elected. Vote Yes.

No. 10. No city officer, except policemen, may absent himself from state without permission of Mayor and Supervisors, under penalty of removal.

Discussion: Removes former limitation of absences to 60 days. A matter of no great importance. Vote Yes.

No. 11 and No. 12. Empowers Supervisors to order construction of tunnels, subways and viaducts and, in their discretion, to order that not more than half the cost be paid by the city, the remainder to be assessed against assessment districts of adjacent private property; restricts use of such works to ordinary traffic and street railways only; prohibits grant of exclusive use of tracks to one corporation and secures right of municipally owned railways to use such tracks.

Discussion: Nos. 11 and 12 are practically identical in wording. No. 11 is proposed by the Supervisors, No. 12 by initiative petition. This legislation is practically necessary for such improvements as tunneling the Stockton street hill and Twin Peaks. Vote Yes.

No. 13. Removes 50 per cent limit on street improvement assessment as relating to sewers; gives property owners discretion as to closing streets; provides method for changing street alignment; authorizes city, instead of property owners, to pay for improvement of unaccepted streets, by contract or day labor.

Discussion: For reasons advanced by Merchants' Association, Vote No.

No. 14. Provides a method by which property owners may be required to keep unaccepted streets and sidewalks in safe condition and repair, and places the liability due to defects in unaccepted streets upon the abutting property owners. At present the members of the Board of Public Works are personally liable for such damages, and the charter makes no adequate provision for repairing this class of streets at the city's expense, nor are the present charter provisions sufficient to provide a means of making such repairs a charge upon the property owners.

Discussion: The effect of the amendment will be to place the liability for damage where it belongs. The Board of Public Works will remain liable for damages due to defects on accepted streets if they have five days' notice of such defects and fail to make the necessary repairs when they have sufficient funds for that purpose. Vote Yes.

No. 15. Empowers Supervisors to use discretion as to method of procedure and payment in matters affected by Nos. 11 and 12, especially permitting the payment of assessments in annual installments covering not more than ten years.

Discussion: Vote Yes.

No. 16. Empowers Supervisors to maintain a free employment bureau and to provide for the expense thereof.

Discussion: Submitted by referendum petition prepared by Union Labor. Vote Yes.

No. 17. Grants permission to The California Academy of Sciences to erect and maintain buildings in Golden Gate Park for a free public museum.

Discussion: Vote Yes.

No. 18. Raises, from thirty-five to fifty-five years, the maximum age at which engineers and pilots of fire boats, engineers, mechanics and employees of the Auxiliary Fire System or of the corporation yard, and of clerks in the office of the Fire Commission, may enter the service.

Discussion: So far as this amendment applies to engineers and pilots, it is eminently just and sound. As to the others, it is not very important. Altogether, we should advise, Vote Yes.

No. 19. Provides that all future franchises for street railways shall be granted subject to right of city to buy tangible property and plant at an arbitrated valuation which shall exclude value of franchise or right of way or earning power, but shall include interest on actual investment in construction prior to operation, plus a bonus of ten to twenty per cent of such valuation if purchased prior to ten years after construction or of not more than ten per cent if after ten years after construction; provides for eight-hour day, $3 minimum wage and time and a half for overtime to all employees of railway operating under such franchise.

Discussion: A necessary additional step in any program looking to municipal ownership. The fixing of wages in a charter is very objectionable. Nevertheless, we advise to Vote Yes.

No. 20. Limits street railway franchises to twenty-five years; provides for competitive bidding for such franchises on the basis of a percentage of gross receipts to be paid the city by the operating company, such bids to be for not less than 3 per cent during the first five years, 4 per cent the next ten and 5 per cent the last ten; requires three-fourths vote of supervisors to grant franchise; requires, with penalties for failure, prompt construction of road; suspends grant of franchise for sixty days, and allows for a referendum by petition of 5 per cent of voters or by demand of mayor or of six supervisors; refuses any franchise to corporation having capital stock and bonded indebtedness exceeding by more than 10 per cent the amount of each stated by applicant as the amount he intends to expend upon such road, and imposes additional restrictions upon franchises in the interest of referendum vote and facility for acquisition by city.

Discussion: Sound in theory, and in practice in other cities. Vote Yes.

No. 21. Provides tax levy to acquire and maintain playgrounds, and prescribes duties and powers of Playgrounds Commission.

Discussion: A vital and worthy amendment. Vote Yes.

No. 22. Reduces the minimum tax rate for park maintenance and acquisition from 5 cents to 3½ cents on the hundred dollars.

Discussion: Vote No.

No. 23. Provides that all public work done under the supervision of the board of public works shall be done by contract, except that "the work performed in the repair of accepted streets and sewers, and in the construction of municipal street railroads, and in the cleaning and sprinkling of public streets, and in the maintenance, repair and improvement of public buildings owned by the city, shall be done by day labor and not otherwise.

Discussion: The city should have the right to contract for this work as well as for all other. This amendment should certainly be defeated. Vote No.

No. 24. Raises term of Civil Service Commissioners from three years to six years, and provides for their removal only in the manner of removal of elected officers.

Discussion: Vote Yes.

Nos. 25-36. All deal with the salaries, wages and hours of labor of municipal employees. It is generally understood that these amendments are submitted at the instigation of the employees affected. It is safe to assume that they do not increase their work nor reduce their pay. They amount, in brief, to this: eight-hour day, pay for overtime, fifteen days' annual vacation, weekly half-holiday, fixing of number of employees and their salaries in the various clerical offices. No. 28 provides a pension of $45 a month for all firemen retired prior to Jan. 1, 1900.

Discussion: The vicious feature of amendments 30, 31, 32, 33 and 34, is the fact that they give the permanent sanction of the charter to a lot of officers whose employment and pay should be determined from time to time by responsible boards. They also almost uniformly raise salaries. These amendments should be defeated. No. 25, so far as it provides for half-holidays and vacations, is good enough, but its reduction of working hours from 8:30 to 5 to 9 to 4 is bad. No. 26 has been rescinded. No. 27 has no effect unless 30-36 carry. No. 28 is a good measure: the firemen have earned it. No. 29, raising pay of supervisors from $100 to $200 a month, should pass. Nos. 35 and 36 are in the line of economy and efficiency, and should pass.

No. 37. Changes basis of calculation of school fund from about $30 per pupil to 3.6 mills per dollar of assessed valuation, including state school tax.

Discussion: This amendment makes it mandatory upon supervisors to levy a tax with a specified minimum. This is a vicious feature and should not be permitted. Vote No.

No. 38. Changes the minimum wage for labor from $2 to $3 a day.

Discussion: No restriction upon wages should ever have been put in the charter. That matter should be left for settlement from time to time by responsible boards. Raising such limit is simply aggravating a mistake. Vote No.

No. 39. Requires that three drivers be assigned to every police patrol wagon or police automobile patrol, and fixes salary of such drivers at $1,464 a year.

Discussion: All such restrictions upon the power of the city are bad. Vote No.

A NEW LINCOLN STORY

Prof. James T. McCleary of Mankato, Minn., who for fourteen years represented a district of his state in congress, has a new Lincoln story.

"A friend of mine out west who is now about 65, told me that when a boy he attended, with his father, one of the famous Lincoln-Douglas debates in Illinois," said Prof. McCleary. "My friend's father was a Lincoln man, but the place in which this particular debate took place was a Douglas stronghold.

"Douglas spoke first, and he was frequently interrupted by vociferous applause. The cheering and the hand-clapping at the end lasted four or five minutes. When Lincoln was introduced the crowd broke out into cheers for Douglas and kept it up for several minutes. Lincoln meanwhile waited patiently.

"When at length the enthusiasm had subsided, Lincoln extended his long right arm for silence. When he had partly got this he said in an impressive tone: 'What an orator Judge Douglas is!'

"This unexpected tribute to their friend set the audience wild with enthusiasm. When this applause had run its course Lincoln, extending his hand again, this time obtained silence more easily.

"What a fine presence Judge Douglas has!"

exclaimed the speaker earnestly. Again tumultuous applause followed the tribute. More and more easily the tall, gaunt lawyer got silence as he went on with admiring exclamations:

"How well rounded his sentences are! How well chosen his language is! How apt his illustrations are!" ending up with, 'What a splendid man Judge Douglas is!'

"Then when the audience had again become silent at his call, Lincoln leaned forward and said:

"And now, my countrymen, how many of you can tell me one thing Judge Douglas said?"

"My friend told me he searched his own heart for an answer and found none. Afterward he asked his father if he could remember anything Judge Douglas had said, and the latter remembered practically nothing. 'But,' my friend said to me impressively, 'even now, half a century later, I can recall practically all that Lincoln said.'"—New York Sun.

In the old days, when oral examinations of lawyers were still the thing, an examining board was pommeling an applicant with questions from Blackstone, Kent and other legal lights. "I didn't study anything about these fellows," complained the applicant. "What did you study?" asked one of the judges. "I studied the statutes of the state," he replied. "I studied them hard. Ask me a question about them, and I'll show you. That is where I got my legal knowledge." "My young friend," said one austere judge on the examining board, "you had better be very careful, for some day the legislature might meet and repeal everything you know."—Kansas City Journal.

When a prominent lawyer left his home at noon, his wife informed him she was to give a 5 o'clock tea, and exacted a promise that he would assist in receiving the guests. The lawyer went to his club, where he drank numerous Scotch highballs. Suddenly he thought of the 5 o'clock tea. It was then 5:15, and an excuse came to him like an inspiration. Scrawling the following note he sent it by messenger: "Dear Fannie: I am sorry to disappoint you, but I have been take unexpectedly drunk."—Case and Comment.

As a countryman was sowing his ground, two smart fellows were riding that way, and one of them called to him with an insolent air. "Well, honest fellow," said he, "'tis your business to sow, but we reap the fruits of your labor." To which the countryman replied: "'Tis very like you may, for I am sowing hemp."—Lippincott's.

Would you like to know more about the work we are doing in the way of preparing for, and placing young men in, good positions in the great busy new San Francisco?

SAN FRANCISCO
BUSINESS COLLEGE
MARKET, POWELL
& EDDY STS. S.F.
WRITE FOR CATALOGUE

A CONVENIENCE WHILE AUTOMOBILING

THE Bell Telephone keeps the traveler in touch with all the resources of civilization.

The Bell Sign becomes an old and tried friend.

He can order his dinner, explain his delay, summon relief in an emergency, or say the word forgotten in the hurry of starting. He can do this from almost any point on the road, because the Bell System has stretched out its lines to meet his unexpected needs.

The Bell Telephone not only furnishes neighborhood communication but gives Long Distance Service throughout the whole system.

THE PACIFIC TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO.

Every Bell Telephone is the Center of the System

SAN FRANCISCO CHARTER AMENDMENTS

DISCUSSION OF NUMBERS 6, 7, AND 8

By J. E. WHITE and JAMES A. JOHNSTON

By J. E. WHITE

There will be submitted to the voters of San Francisco at the special election to be held next Tuesday, 39 amendments to the charter. In this number are three which I consider of special importance and deserve to be carried. They are 6, 7 and 8, and relate to the initiative, referendum, recall and election of city officials.

If these amendments are carried we will elect our city officials under their provisions by a majority vote rather than a plurality vote as at present and we will provide for a workable initiative, referendum and recall.

Providing for Initiative

In the first place the amendment relating to the initiative provides that any measure within the power of the Board of Supervisors or other board, commission or officer of the city may be enacted by the direct vote of the people and upon approval by a majority vote shall be the law upon that subject. If the signatures to the petition calling for the submission of the proposed measure be signed by ten per cent of the vote cast for the Mayor at the last preceding municipal election, it shall be the duty of the Board of Supervisors and Board of Election Commissioners to call a special election at which time the measure shall be submitted. If the petition be signed by four per cent of the voters and not more than ten per cent, the measure shall be submitted at the next general state or municipal election that shall occur at any time after thirty days from the filing of the petition. Upon filing the petition the Board of Election Commissioners must cause the proposed measure to be printed and mailed to each voter at least five days prior to the election and the petitioners shall have the right to send out printed arguments favoring such proposition. Under these provisions the initiative will be made workable and will insure to the elector the fullest measure of power in enacting into the law those measures which the Board of Supervisors or other parties may refuse or neglect to enact.

The Referendum Amendment

With reference to the referendum it is provided that any ordinance which the Supervisors are empowered to pass may be submitted by the Board of Supervisors at a special election for the approval of the people. It is also provided that any ordinance granting a public utility franchise or privilege or authorizing the lease or sale of any lands, or authorizing the purchase of lands for more than $50,000, shall not go into effect until the expiration of 60 days after it becomes final by the approval of the Mayor or by its passage over his veto. At any time within the 60 days a petition may be signed containing the signatures of 5 per cent of the entire vote cast for the Mayor at the last preceding municipal election requesting that such ordinance be submitted to the electors; in which case the ordinance must be so submitted and will depend upon the vote of the people as to whether it shall go into force at all or not.

The Improved Recall System

Under our charter as it stands at present the recall is unworkable, impracticable and could never be effectively used. It is proposed by these amendments that a recall petition may be filed, signed by at least ten per cent of the entire vote cast for the Mayor at the last preceding election, providing a minimum of 7000 names and a maximum of 15,000. Upon the filing of this petition it becomes the duty of the Board of Election Commissioners to call a special election, at which time it shall be determined whether the officer may be removed or not.

The most radical provision of the amendments has to do with the election of the city officials. In the first place it provides that any officer may be nominated for the primary election by filing a declaration of his intention with the registrar of voters and also filing a certificate by not less than ten nor more than twenty sponsors who shall make oath that they believe the person so nominated is qualified for the office.

It also provides that all names shall be put upon the ballot without party designation and the names shall be alternated upon the ballot in such a way as to obviate the possibility of the candidates whose names begin with the first letters of the alphabet having an advantage over those whose names begin with the last letters of the alphabet.

Guaranty of Majority Rule

If at the primary election any person should get a majority of the votes cast for that particular office he shall have then been declared elected without any further election. If, however, no person gets a majority at the primary, then the two persons receiving the highest number of votes for each office shall have their names printed upon the ballot at the final election and the one receiving the majority at that election shall be declared elected.

These amendments should all of them be adopted. There ought to be at all times the fullest measure of power lodged in the people at large to control legislation with reference to local government. It may not be necessary to use this power if given, but the mere fact that such a power exists will make the Board of Supervisors more responsible to all of the people and more desirous of passing such legislation as will meet the approval of the voters at large. They will not risk the possibility of measures which they have turned down being enacted in the law by direct vote of the people nor will they care to have ordinances which they have passed vetoed by the people and therefore they will endeavor at all times to carry out what they believe to be the will of the majority. The same thing may be stated with reference to the recall amendment. An elected official knowing that there are contained in the Charter provisions which make it possible for him to be recalled in case he fails in his duty or is guilty of misconduct in office, and that this power can be exercised without much difficulty will, no doubt, endeavor to do the right thing and be more apt to give a faithful administration of the office to which he is elected.

Will Aid People Against Bosses

Many of us have been sorely disappointed at many of the elections that have occurred since the adoption of our Charter. It seems to be possible under the ballot vote system for designing politicians and political bosses to manipulate affairs either at the primary or in political conventions, so that the solid conservative vote of the city is divided and the so-called "push vote" will unite upon the candidate representing the allied interests and he will be elected. By putting up a candidate who will be subservient to the interests and take his orders from the bosses and at the same time putting up two or more fairly decent men who will declare their opposition to those interests, the anti-machine force will be divided, and allow the other men to slip in. Then again there is absolutely no reason why we should be bound by partisan considerations in selecting our city officials. There are no questions of national or state politics involved. All we desire is an economical and efficient administration of the affairs of our city by those entrusted with that responsibility.

Removal of Partisan Obligations

It becomes a matter of personal rather than political obligation. In a city of this size the voters at large can become fairly well acquainted with the candidates for office, and judge fairly well as to their qualifications for filling the offices, and there is not the necessity for the responsibility that there is in the wider field of State and National affairs. By this means we would obviate to a very large extent the interference of State and Federal officials in the attempt to control municipal elections by the use of patronage doled out on a partisan basis.

By requiring a majority vote we will feel that all the people have had a fair chance to express their preference, and we have secured thereby an expression of the majority which in governmental affairs should control.

Under our present system a minority may win and as a result the majority may be governed by the minority. If the amendments proposed are approved this will no longer be possible.

Encourages Better Class of Candidates

Many men are willing to run for office if they feel that they may possibly win by political manipulation, but would be unwilling to go before the people upon the basis of their own character or fitness for the office and by this means we are apt to have a better class of men presenting themselves as candidates than under the old system.

Many of us have been somewhat disappointed with the present Charter. Somehow or other it has not met our expectations. We prefer to think that most of the difficulty is with the men called upon to administer our affairs under the Charter rather than with the document itself and if some means can be devised by which we can secure men of good moral character and executive ability to perform these duties much of our trouble will vanish.

It is true that we must have good laws in order to have a good government, but it is equally true that we must have good men in any event. Better to have good men with poor laws than bad men with good laws.

We believe that if the amendments referred to in this article are approved it will result in the selection of better men as city officials and a better administration of their offices when elected than under the present system.

When this is accomplished and the affairs of government are in the hands of our friends the task of further amending our substantive law can be better undertaken. We certainly desire to have not only the best form of city government but the best administration as well.

For these reasons we believe that the amendments, 6, 7 and 8, should be adopted.

By JAMES A. JOHNSTON

Of the thirty-nine charter amendments many are good but only three vitally important. These three are amendments 6, 7 and 8. Six, seven and eight—remember the numbers.

The adoption of number 6 will make government by the people a reality instead of a make believe. It will enable the people to enact ordinances desired and to veto measures not wanted. The voters retain their present privilege of electing officials and secure also the right of recall, or, in other words, the right to oust or discharge them when unsatisfactory, unfaithful, incompetent or dishonest.

The Initiative—By its provisions four per cent of the voters may require the submission of wanted legislation to the voters at a general election, the carrying of the proposed measure depending upon the approval of the majority of the voters at said election. Ten per cent is required to call a special election.

The Referendum—Under the referendum provisions of Charter Amendment No. 6, no ordinance passed by the supervisors granting a franchise, or authorizing the purchase of lands of more than $50,000 in value, or authorizing the lease or sale of public lands shall not go into effect for sixty days after its passage so that if in the meantime the people desire to pass upon the matter they may do so by filing a petition signed by five per cent of the voters requesting opportunity for all the citizens to vote upon the question at the next general election. In case such petition is filed the ordinance granting a franchise, proposing to lease or sell public land, or proposing to purchase lands of more than $50,000 valuation must secure approval of the majority before going into effect. This is merely optional referendum and it is reasonable to assume would be exercised by the voters only in cases where the wisdom of proposed measures seems doubtful. There are only two kinds of ordinances that the Board of Supervisors would be compelled, under the terms of Amendment No. 6, to submit to the voters, namely, ordinances involving the lease or sale of a municipally owned public utility, or the granting of a new franchise for the operation of a public utility whose franchise has expired or is about to expire.

The Recall—The recall provisions of Amendment No. 6 if adopted will enable the voters to discharge any man whom they have hired if his work is not to their satisfaction. If having elected a man upon the supposition that he will render attentive, efficient and honest service and he does otherwise, ten per cent of the voters may start the machinery for his recall. Provision is made in the amendment whereby the official is enabled without expense to himself to send to each registered voter a circular article justifying his conduct and policies. And the official retains the office unless a majority of the voters decide otherwise. If retained in office the official having been subjected to the necessity of defending himself at the recall election is to be reimbursed for his expenses; and he cannot be subjected to the recall a second time unless double the number of signers of the first recall petition sign a second petition nor can he be subjected to a third recall unless triple the number of signers of the first recall petition sign the third petition—thus is the official protected against possible harassment at the hands of a disgruntled minority.

Charter Amendment No. 7

The adoption of Amendment No. 7 will restore the Australian ballot, do away with party columns and circles, provide that all candidates for a particular office shall have their names grouped together and alphabetically arranged under the heading of that office, so that voters may have opportunity to consider and weigh their respective qualifications for that office. It also provides for direct nominations and for majority rule. This makes it possible for any citizen having the necessary qualifications to get himself nominated without seeking the favor of or making promises to any boss, clique, party, class or organization but impossible for him to be elected unless the majority of the voters want him. Under our present system of party primaries with numerous candidates in the field at the general election straw men are put up merely for the purpose of confusing the voters and dividing the majority while the minority man slips in by a mere plurality.

Charter Amendment No. 8

Amendment No. 8 is a necessary corollary of Amendment No. 7, and both should be approved. Number 8 merely substitutes a new paragraph for one paragraph of amendment 7 as it is written. If number 7 should be adopted and number 8 defeated, candidates would have the privilege of placing their party designation along with their names upon the ballot. If number 7 and 8 are both adopted candidates will not be permitted to use an organization name or symbol. The adoption of both 7 and 8 is necessary therefore to make both the nomination and election of candidates and the entire machinery of our municipal elections strictly non-partisan.

Remember the date of the special election, Tuesday, November 15th.

Remember the numbers of the amendments: Charter Amendment No. 6 provides for direct legislation, the initiative, referendum and recall; Charter Amendment No. 7 provides for direct nominations and majority rule and the Australian ballot; Charter Amendment No. 8 prohibits the use of any party name, symbol or designation and will place municipal elections upon a non-partisan basis.

In a certain school in an Ohio town the children are given widely varying exercises in the use of English. Sometimes they copy poetry from the blackboard, or they write letters and answer advertisements. On one occasion a "want" advertisement appeared on the board, and it was required that all the little girls should hand in written applications in reply. The "ad" read: Wanted: A milliner. Apply by letter to Miss Jones, 30 First Street. The following is one young lady's application, promptly written and handed in: Dear Miss Jones: I see you want a milliner. I hate to trim hats. Can't you get somebody else? Kindly advise me at once. Marie Smith.—Lippincott's.

"After Due Reflection, I Have Decided to Retire from Politics"

THROUGH THE SHADOWS

By Charles Warren Stoddard

All in a dream i' the twilight,
Stars glimmer out in their glee;
I hear the low murmur of far off
Ripples of tropic sea.

The sorrowful Sun, in the west,
Is bleeding to death in the wave,
Staining and tinting with crimson
The corals that fashion his grave.

Out through the mists and the vapors,
The cloudy wreaths and the rings,
The sunlight has flown like a butterfly
Brushing the gold from his wings.

A quiet is coming and folding
Our troubles away, and our woes
Are hushed in the cool fragrant shadows,
Like bees in the heart of a rose.

Come on, little stars, all silver,
For the terrible Sun has gone,
And forth from the castle of shadows
The Moon has set sail for the dawn.

Pale are the stars, for the morning
Is dawning fresh as May—
So through the shadows we wander forth,
Seeking the perfect day.

NOT YET

We have not heard
Here where we're stationed
That Ballinger
Has resigned. Houston Post.

Nor have we heard
The message cheery
That Bob's gone back
To Cavalieri. Springfield Union.

Nor have we heard
Here where we're revelin'
That Thaws have loosened
Up for Evelyn. Houston Post.

And we've not heard
That Time, the hussy,
Has Katherine handed
To Abruzzi.

HONOLULU

And the Volcano

THE TRIP MOST COMPELLING and worth while, excelling all others for grandeur, beauty and pleasure. And this splendid trip can be made in two weeks and a day by sailing on S. S. SIERRA (10,000 tons displacement). The Volcano of Kilauea, the largest in the world, is tremendously active just now, and a few quick dispatch trips have been arranged. Never before has it been possible to make this desirable trip with such speed and comfort, and the price is low, $110, first class, to Honolulu and back, and $41 for side trip from Honolulu to volcano, including rail and auto to Kilauea; hotel at Hilo, also Volcano House. No other trip compares with this. Be sure to visit the islands, and DO IT NOW, while the volcano is active. S. S. SIERRA sails Oct. 22, Nov. 12, Dec. 3. Write or wire. OCEANIC S. S. CO. 673 Market Street, San Francisco.

John O'Donnell D. E. Alexander

ALEXANDER & O'DONNELL

ATTORNEYS AT LAW

Tels.: Sunset Douglas 1538; Home J 1508
845 Pacific Bldg., Market and Fourth Sts.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD
The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed	$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital	300,000.00
Surplus	400,000.00
Profits	45,000.00

DIRECTORS James D. Phelan, President;
John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt,
Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph
Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R.
D. McElroy, J. C. Beatty.

Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy.
Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial
(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)
526 CALIFORNIA ST., San Francisco, Cal.

Guaranteed Capital	$1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash	1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds	1,555,093.05
Deposits June 30th, 1910	40,384,727.21
Total Assets	43,108,907.82

Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co's. Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President and Manager, George Tourny; Third Vice-President, J. W. Van Bergen; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, A. H. Muller; Assistant Secretaries, G. J. O. Folte and Wm. D. Newhouse; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS — N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, George Tourny, J. W. Van Bergen, Ign. Steinhardt, I. N. Walter, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Streets. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Hoyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Hoyer, Manager.

O H, my! but didn't the wind blow!—When I went around the house that night, locking doors and windows before going to bed, there was just a breath of breeze sighing about—nothing more; but by the time I had my head fairly plumped upon the pillow, the gale was going it like mad. When I first came to this Western country, I used to be surprised at the quick, unceremonious way storms had of coming upon people—half the time it seemed to me, out of a clear, innocent-looking sky.

In my old home I prided myself upon reading the signs of the skies; but here, goodness me! when I thought I would have taken a solemn oath that the clouds were going to pour, why, whisk they'd go, and the sun would shine out as though it was in high glee at having fooled me. So I gave up being a weather-prophet, and took it just as it came.

That night everything out of doors seemed to be in commotion. The loose shingles on the house clattered up and down, and half the time it seemed to me that the bed on which I lay would be blown through the side of the house. I know I'm a foolish old woman, but at the thought I couldn't help setting my ruffled night-cap straight, and smoothing back my hair, because if I should go, why, there was Deacon Albee's house right opposite, and—but, Lord bless me! what am I saying!

Well, naturally, I was lonesome enough without chick or child to speak to, but I did very well until I somehow got it into my head that burglars always chose just such nights to do their mischief in. After that I started at every sound, and as there were thumps and clatters on all sides, and in every direction, it isn't to be supposed that I got much rest.

I didn't stop to reason that there was very little in my poor house to tempt evildoers. I knew I had forty dollars and eighty cents laid away in my poor departed Jason's old wooden chest, and I felt that to lose that would be a terrible thing to me.

The house was a cottage, with a hall running the length of its two rooms—an "L" being built beyond. My room was at the back opening into the hall and the front room adjoining. So my eyes went first from one door to the other, lingering, I must say, with more dread upon the one leading into the hall.

"If I should be robbed of that forty dollars and eighty cents—" I said to myself. Just then a blind went whack, and springing up in bed I began to say the prayer my mother taught me—"Now I lay me down to sleep," though I am sure it looked a great deal more like sitting up asleep than lying down.

"What an old fool you are, Polly Quimby," I began to say aloud, trying to get my courage up at the sound of my own voice.

At that moment I was sure I heard a step in the little hall, and before I had time to move from my place, the door-latch lifted and the door swung back, and there he stood, the very object I had been dreading, Mr. Burglar himself.

"Good evening, ma'am!" he said in such a polite way that I found myself in the motion of bowing back, and saying good evening, too.

He was a middle-aged man with moustache and whiskers, and he had the brightest eyes I ever saw in a person's head. The hair on his temples was quite gray. All in all he looked like a respectable Christian gentleman, and not a midnight thief.

"Quite a windy evening, ma'am," he went on, as he stepped into the room. "You must be lonely by yourself?"

Somehow this touched my temper. I forgot who was speaking, and answered back as tart as could be:

"I prefer to choose my company, sir."

He laughed and shrugged up his shoulders. "You do, indeed! So do I. In this case I have my preference—not you."

Then he sat down leisurely in my rocking-chair, and stretched out his feet as though he intended to stop awhile.

"Will you be so kind, sir, as to go about your business? What do you think of yourself, sir, to be intruding upon the privacy of my room at this hour of the night, sir?"

AUNT POLLY'S BURGLAR

(From An Old Paper)

He leaned his head back upon my bright worsted tidy, and laughed fit to kill himself.

"No harm is intended to you, my charming woman," he said. "I swear it—no harm is intended to you!"

And saying this he laughed louder and longer than ever.

"Do you come into my house to make game of me before my very eyes?" I asked, my temper pretty well stirred up. "If you are a gentleman, sir—"

This was too much for him.

"A gentleman? Oh, aw—that's too good! If I professed to be a gentleman you'd stand a good chance of getting your throat cut without so much as by your leave, ma'am, to begin with! A gentleman? With all my faults, thank heaven that is not among them!"

"You need not have gone on that way to prove it," I said tartly.

"Well, you're a sharp old damsel, aren't you?" turning his big eyes upon me, and twisting his mouth in a comical way which I shall never forget. "I swear, you'd be pretty good looking if you didn't wear such a wide ruffle on your nightcap. Golly! isn't it a lunker—big enough for a graveyard fence!"

"Sir!" I said savagely.

"Madam?" he answered, imitating my voice and tone to perfection.

"Oh, if I were only out of this bed, sir" I began.

"And pray, madam, what is there to hinder you from getting from getting out, I'd like to know?"

"Do you intend to insult me, you good-for-nothing creature? Oh, if the wind would only blow you away!"

"If one goes the other is sure to go too," he said stolidly.

"If brother Joe would only waken," I said. He cocked his eye knowingly.

"You want to make me believe that he is in this house somewhere, eh? My dear madame, you are as transparent as air. Had he been under this roof, you would have screamed blue murder long before this time."

"Oh, oh, you varmint!" I groaned, in pure agony of spirit. "What do you want?"

"Well, ma'am, since that is a fair, honorable question, I will attempt to answer it. To begin with, my financial affairs are in a complicated condition. Money I have but little of—credit, none, so I am forced to levy a trifling tax upon my friends in this and other neighborhoods, to extricate me from my disastrous condition. As soon as I collect a certain amount, I intend leaving this country for France or Italy, never, perhaps, to return. Do not shed tears at this, dear madame, for wherever my footsteps tend, your image—ruffled nightcap and all—will remain forever imprinted upon my heart."

"You old goose!" I said.

"Please do not interrupt me, madame. I have but a few moments longer to stay and I must to business at once. I have learned that you have deposited in a trunk in an adjoining closet forty dollars and eighty cents. The forty dollars I would like to borrow of you for an indefinite length of time. The eighty cents I do not care anything about. You can retain that as a trifling evidence of my generosity in this great emergency of my life."

"You are a robber—a thief, then?" I said spitefully.

"Either, at your service, madame," rising and making a bow, for all the world like a French dancing-master. "Now the money, if you please."

He wasn't joking now. There was a determined look in his eyes and about his mouth.

"He that giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord," he said, speaking just like a preacher. "And he that steals from the poor, what of him?"

"My Bible does not dispose of his case, especially, madame."

"And you came here to rob me—me, a poor woman!"

"I came to borrow of you for an indefinite length of time."

I saw it was useless to waste words with him, besides, I didn't altogether like the look in his eyes; I closed my lips tightly together, resolving that I would not speak again.

"If you have no objection, ma'am, I'll look around a bit," he said, taking up the lamp as he spoke. "If I hear any noise from you, my dear, or I see that in any way you are becoming nervous, I shall be obliged to quiet you by the use of—"

He held up a small vial.

"Chloroform!" I gasped.

"At your service, madam."

"It would be the death of me!" I moaned.

"I should be sorry to bring such a loss to the world, but believe me, all that rests in your hands. This door leads into the closet where your trunk is, I believe," he said, making straightway for the closet where my forty dollars were put away for safe keeping.

I didn't say a word. To tell the truth the chloroform had scared me nearly out of my wits. He turned the key in the door, (I had always kept it locked) and glanced into the closet. It was large and the trunk was at the further end of it.—Let me say here that this closet or store room was in the "L" part of the house, fully a foot lower than my room. Mr. Burglar was not acquainted with this fact. Glancing toward me with his sharp eyes to see if I was quiet, he took a step forward, and went sprawling on all fours. I do not know, to this day how he managed to save the lamp as he did but it was not broken in the fall and burned as brightly ever. My wits came to me here. I sprang as lightly as a cat out of bed, and before he could get upon his feet, I had the door of the closet shut and locked upon him. He grew lamb-like in a moment.

"You've done it now, haven't you, my charming creature? I swear I'm in love with you from this hour to the end of my life. You've come a splendid dodge. You've got me tight and fast. What's the use of money now? I'll take eighty cents and you may have the forty dollars, if you will let me out."

"No, sir; I'm going to call the neighbors," said I resolutely.

"Going with that night-cap on? You will make your fortune. But don't hurry, that's a dear. Say, I'll give you a hundred dollars if you'll let me out."

"Yes, and leave you free to scare some other woman nearly to death—no, sir."

"Well then, I'll give you two hundred."

"No, sir."

"Name your price then, dear girl. I suppose every woman has her price—they say every man has."

"No, it wouldn't be right," I said, hesitatingly.

I heard him chuckle:

"First step toward it; she begins to talk of what is right."

I thought of my poor girl out to work by the week, and so anxious to get an education, and I am sure it isn't to be wondered at if I began to think of setting a price. But I said not a word.

"Look here I'll put five hundred dollars in good sound gold under the door, and you can count it as I push it through piece by piece, if you'll only let me out of this cursed hole. I'm smothering."

"Try some chloroform," I whispered through the key-hole.

"Curse the chloroform! Will you let me out?"

I had a light by this time and had slipped into a calico wrapper and my slippers.

"If I got the money, how could I let him out of the closet?" I wondered.

"I shouldn't dare to meet him; he'd rob me again, and perhaps murder me." But I said, "I'll take the gold," resolved that I would try to get out of it some way, just for the sake of poor Rebecca, who so much wanted to go to school.

"Your heart is in the right place," he said, and the next moment a big round gold piece came through the wide crack under the door.

I couldn't withhold an exclamation of delight.

"It's right enough now, isn't it?" he sneered. "There's nothing like gilding over our sins a little, Bah! all the world's alike! Here goes another, and another. Count fast, my pious damsel. I dare say there's no confession in your church."

"Is there in yours?"

"Well, if there was, gold gets into that, sometimes, they say. Hold fast there; you've got the last clinker; now set me free."

"Wait a minute."

"But I won't wait. I swear I won't."

"Can you help yourself?" I said coolly.

"Well, no, not much; but I'm smothering here. Can't you take pity on a poor fellow?"

"Sit down flat on the floor!" I said. I heard him plump down as obedient as a schoolboy.

"What next?"

I turned to the kitchen door to see if the lock was all right. Then I turned the key with a sharp click, which sounded like a report of a pistol.

"There!" I cried, and sprang into the kitchen, locking the door behind me.

He came out of the prison, swearing like a trooper.

"Sharp old Satan, she's locked herself up somewhere," trying the kitchen door as he spoke. Good night, Madame De'lia—good! You've got the best of this. You have robbed me. Good-night—get down and say your prayers."

And I did. What is more, I cried like a baby over my money, thinking what it would bring us.

I never saw the strange burglar again, and in a few weeks Rebecca was comfortably established at school. No one ever knew where the money came from. An uncle died about that time, and some of my neighbors shrewdly suspected that he had left us something; but I had nothing to say upon the subject.

About six months after my adventure, brother Joe came to me one day, and said that he had been stopped in the street by a strange man that morning, and that he had begged him to say to Madame Quimby that the frill of her night-cap was a little too wide! So saying, he passed on. "What did it mean?" Joe asked.

"Nothing, only that he was crazy," I answered quickly; but my face was as red as a blaze.

CLOSING THE DOORS

Irene P. McKeenan

I have closed the door on Doubt:

I will go by what light I can find,

And hold up my hands, and reach them out

To the glimmer of God in the dark, and call

"I am thine, though I grope and stumble and fall.

I serve, and Thy service is kind."

I have closed the door on Fear;

He has lived with me far too long.

If he were to break forth and re-appear,

I should lift my eyes and look at the sky,

And sing aloud, and run lightly by:

He will never follow a song.

I have closed the door on Gloom;

His house has too narrow a view.

I must seek for my soul a wider room,

With windows to open and let in the sun,

And radiant lamps when the day is done.

And the breeze of the world blowing through.

—Century Magazine.

When a man goes fishing in a boat with a party of women he must expect to divide his time between saying: "I assure you there isn't the slightest danger," and stringing worms.

SHEAR WIT

A French woman, proud of her limited knowledge of English, and an American woman, proud of her limited knowledge of French, were introduced at an uptown evening company. The French woman insisted on expressing herself in bad English and the American woman would talk nothing but bad French. When the guests began to depart they were still at it. At last they arose to go. Here is their watery farewell: "Reservoir!" said the fair American. "Tanks!" responded her new friend.—Philadelphia Times.

Applicant for Situation—I've come abaht that job wot was advertised. Employer—Well, can you do the work? Applicant (in great alarm)—Work! I thought it was a foreman you wanted!—Punch.

Mrs. Uppson—Pardon me, but where did you get the design for your servants' livery? Mrs. Newgelt—Oh, our ancestors used it. Mrs. Uppson—Indeed! And by whom were they employed?—Chicago News.

"Great times for the advertising men." "How now?" "Every 'ad.' guaranteed a place next to pure Roosevelt matter."—Washington Herald.

"When I was in Europe this summer," said Gayman, trying to entertain the minister, "I got quite interested in some of them old churches." "Indeed?" replied Rev. Mr. Gassaway. "I suppose you know St. Paul's in London?" "No. You don't tell me? What hotel's he stopping at?"—Catholic Standard and Times.

"I wonder what the teacher meant about the singing of my two daughters?" "What did he say?" "He said that Mamie's voice was good, but Maud's was better still."—Cleveland Leader.

He may have meant to be polite, but there can be no question that he actually did a very rude thing, says the Youth's Companion. He was a Frenchman, riding in a street car. Two women entered, and, seeing no seats, stood. The gentleman who sat near them, rose, removed his hat, and said: "I give my seat to the elder of these two ladies." Neither made a move to take the seat, but each glanced at the other in a haughty manner, as much as to say: "Sit down, madam" "Is neither madam," said the Frenchman, bowing to one lady, "nor madam," bowing to the other, "the elder? Then I shall have to resume my seat."

Everybody will recall the story, says the Brooklyn Eagle: A city young woman went out to teach a country school. The class in arithmetic was before her. She said: "Now, children, if there are ten sheep on one side of a wall, and one sheep jumps over, how many sheep will be left?" Then up piped the little tow-headed daughter of a farmer: "No sheep, teacher; no sheep." "Oh, oh," cried the city young woman, reproachfully, "you are not so stupid as that; think again. If there were ten sheep on one side of the wall, and one sheep jumped over, nine sheep would be left, don't you see that?" "No, no, no," persisted the child. "If one sheep jumped over all the others would jump after. My father raises sheep." Then seeing the puzzled look on the teacher's face, the little tow-head explained apologetically: "You know mathematics, teacher, but you see, I know sheep."

"You've heard the recipe for cooking a hare?" "Yes. First catch your hare." "No. First catch your cook."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Admiral Bob Evans, walking down Broadway, came to one of his quartermasters. The sailor straightened up and saluted. Admiral Evans looked down and there lay another quartermaster, asleep in the gutter. "Drunk, eh?" said Evans. "Oh, no, sir," said the erect quartermaster deprecatingly. "Oh, I wouldn't call him drunk, sir. I just seen him move his fingers a little."

One of the last times that Bishop Burgess of Long Island dined out was at the Press club, where the waiters are all negroes. The head waiter bowed Bishop Burgess and his host profusely to their places. "This way, adm'ral," said he. "Tek this table. You get a bettah view of the harbor heah, adm'ral." "I am not an admiral," said Bishop Burgess, smiling. "My mistek, suh," said the head waiter. "Ah mout er known all the time I was er talkin' to a military man. You like dis table, colonel?" "I am not a colonel," said Bishop Burgess, smiling more broadly, "I am a bishop." "To be suah, suh," said the head waiter. "To-o be suah! Ve'y sorry for mah mistek, suh. I got dem titles of adm'ral and colonel wrong. Ah knowed soon as Ah saw you dat you was one of the face cards of you profession, suh."—Cincinnati Times-Star.

Few persons in Smoke Ridge had ever seen an automobile, so when one of those "red devils" stopped for a few minutes in the isolated village the curious inhabitants gazed at the snorting demon with a mixture of fear and awe. The owner, who had entered the store to make a purchase, heard one rustic remark: "I'll bet it is a man-killer." "Of course it is," assured the other, "look at that number on the back of the car. That shows how many persons it's run over. That's accordin' to law. Now, if that feller was to run over anybody here in Smoke Ridge it would be our duty to telegraph that number—1284—to the next town ahead." "And what would they do?" asked the auditors. "Why, the perlice would stop him and change his number to 1285."

Little Myra Lee had been in school but a few days when her mother had occasion to write a note to the teacher, and signed herself Mrs. Kent. Thinking she might have misunderstood the child's name, the teacher asked an explanation. "Oh," said Myra, with a charmingly confidential air, "you see, my mamma got married again, but I didn't."—Lippincott's.

"Waiter," called the irate diner, "there seems to be a dollar on this bill I can't account for." "Oh, that's just a joke, sir," apologized the waiter, "just a bet the cashier and I have. I'll have it fixed right away, sir." "What do you mean about a bet?" asked the diner, detaining him. "Well, sir, I bet the cashier fifty cents you would see the mistake, and he bet you wouldn't, so I win, sir." "Suppose I hadn't noticed it?" "He'd have gotten the dollar, sir." "Oh, I see. Give me your pencil," and he wrote a few lines on the back of the bill, folded it up, and handed it to the waiter. "Take that to the cashier." The waiter leaned over the cashier's shoulder as he unfolded the paper. It read: "I'll bet you five dollars that when you send this back you don't find me." And they didn't.—Lippincott's.

A certain Boston gentleman, wishing to take his family to the country last summer, visited a small farm with a view of renting it, says an exchange. Everything was to his liking and negotiations were about to be completed when the question of renting also the farmer's cow came up. She was an excellent animal, the farmer declared, and even after feeding her calf she would give eight quarts of milk a day. "Eight quarts a day!" exclaimed the Boston gentleman. "That is more than my whole family could possibly use." Then suddenly observing the calf following its mother about the yard, he added: "I'll tell you what I'll do—I'll hire the small cow. She looks just about the right size."

Mr. James Bryce, the British ambassador at Washington, had as his dinner companion, one evening recently, the wife of a western senator, says the Popular Magazine. She was not at all talkative, and the ambassador had put out several leads in the line of conversation without producing any appreciable results. In a pause in the general conversation he heard some one two or three seats from him mention "the Oranges," that section of New Jersey which is patronized by millionaires and automobiles. Turning to his silent companion, Mr. Bryce said: "I have heard so much about the Oranges. Do you like them?" The reply put an end to the ambassador's efforts for the evening. The lady said: "I never eat 'em."

PERSONALIA

Louis Ganne, the composer of "Hans the Flute Player," is writing the score of an operetta based on the legend of the Sleeping Beauty. It will be entitled "Marie Flore." The libretto is by Francois de Ninon.

Bailey Millard, the San Francisco author, has just published his new novel, "The Sea Hawk." The Yankee schooner master is dominated by his wife, the "Sea Hawk" and the quaint character of the woman captain is a novel feature of the story. The scene is a corner of the continent—the Western Mexican coast.

Demetra Vaka, who has already shown surprising literary versatility in following her study of Turkish life, "Haremlik," with her Franco-American novel, "The Duke's Price," written in collaboration with her husband, Kenneth Brown, has now turned to the juvenile field.

Caruso recently gave to an interviewer in Munich his advance impressions of Puccini's new opera, "The Girl of the Golden West," in which he will create the leading role at the first performance of the piece in New York in December. Caruso prophesies for the new opera Puccini's greatest success, as the score, in every respect, he says, is a distinct advance over anything that the creator of "La Boheme" and "Madame Butterfly" has ever done. The composer, for the first time, has almost completely abandoned the leit-motif idea which is so conspicuous in all his other works. The one "motif" of the lover (Caruso's role), which occurs in every ensemble, consists simply of five notes, C, D, E, F and G, in rotation and in counter-rotation. Through the rhythmical blending of these simple tones in three-four time, Puccini, according to Caruso, has attained marvelous results. The entire score has caught the local American color admirably, and the rough atmosphere of the mining camp has not interfered in the slightest respect with the truly artistic scenario.

Mrs. Gilbert Jones, chairman of the National League for the Civic Education of Women, has announced that the new headquarters of the league, at 25 Madison avenue, N. Y., will henceforth be known as the headquarters of the anti-suffrage party. The league has an assembly district organization and therefore considers itself entitled to be called a party. During the winter the league will hold regular meetings each Monday afternoon at its headquarters.

Jules Claretie, on October 21, celebrated the completion of his twenty-fifth year as director of the Comedie Francaise. On the same day a gala performance was given at the Theatre Sarah Bernhardt in honor of the seventy-fifth birthday of Saint-Saens, the composer, and a gala performance at the National Opera to aid in raising funds for a monument to Victorien Sardou.

Miss Mildred Jones has announced herself as Republican candidate for superintendent of schools at Tulsa, Okla. Mrs. Kate Richards O'Hare has announced her candidacy for congress on the Socialist ticket from the second congressional district of Kansas. Miss B. Belle Chamberlain has announced that she will be a candidate for her third term as state superintendent of schools in Idaho. Miss Margaret Keenan is also running for the same office. Mrs. Carrie Vaughn Anderson has been nominated by the Republicans of Wright county, Ia., for the office of county recorder.

With two exceptions the queens of all the European countries are said to be taller than their husbands. Queen Helen is more than a head taller than the King of Italy, Queen Victoria is more than half a head taller than Alfonso of Spain. The Czar looks small beside the Czarina. The German Empress is a trifle taller than the Kaiser, and for that reason always sits when their photographs are taken together. King George of England is shorter than Queen Mary. The two exceptions are the Queen of Norway and the new Queen of the Belgians.

A remarkable addition has just been made to the imperial mausoleum in the Benedictine Abbey Church at Farnborough, which was built by the Empress Eugenie at a total cost of over $500,000. On either side of the high altar are the granite sarcophagi containing the remains of Emperor Napoleon III and the Prince Imperial. Behind the altar is a small door leading into the monastery, and over this an "arcosolium" has now been built into the wall. The word, which literally means an arched seat, was first used to denote an arched recess in the Roman catacombs. The arch, designed by a French architect, is of stone throughout. This new work forms the framework of a tomb which Eugenie designs for the reception of her body at her death.

ICH DIEN OR EICH DYN

Which is accurate as the motto of the Prince of Wales—Ich Dien or Eich Dyn? asks the Lady's Pictorial, of London. The one is German and the other Welsh. The one means "I serve," the other "Behold the man" or "Behold your man."

"Ich Dien" was the motto of John, King of Bohemia, whom the Black Prince slew at Crecy. "Eich Dyn" are the words supposed to have been used by Edward I when presenting his infant son to the Welsh assembly at Carnarvon.

Welsh tradition has adhered naturally to the Welsh form. The other has been more popularly accepted. The coming investiture lends peculiar interest to a revival of an old controversy. Settlement must be left to the student of such matters; but it may be news to some readers that there is an alternative to the battlefield story.

A Result of Experience

"She married Blufsoe because she considered him her ideal of all that is noble and manly."

"Yes?"

"Yes, and now she is nearly worried to death all of the time."

"What does she worry about?"

"She is afraid that their child will be like his father."

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

Department No. 3.

ERNEST H. CLARK CARY,

Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof.

Defendants.

ERNEST J. MOTT,

Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:

To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Ernest H. Clark Cary, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the northwesterly line of Brannan Street, distant thereon eighty-four (84) feet and nine and seven-eighths (75) inches southwesterly from the southwesterly line of Zoe Street; running thence southwesterly along said line of Brannan Street sixty (60) feet and two and one-eighth (2 1/8) inches; thence at a right angle northwesterly eighty (80) feet; thence at a right angle northeasterly sixty (60) feet and two and one-eighth (2 1/8) inches; thence at a right angle southeasterly eighty (80) feet to the northwesterly line of Brannan Street and the point of commencement; being a part of One Hundred Vara Lot Number 16.

Together with the appurtenances of each and every part thereof.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple as absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be met in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 28th day of October, A. D. 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By M. Krage, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM

The first publication of this summons was made in

The California Weekly newspaper on the 11th day of November, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

City and County of San Francisco, a municipal corporation, whose address is San Francisco, California.

The German Savings and Loan Society, a corporation, whose address is Number 526 California Street, San Francisco, California.

Nov. 11-10t

NOTICE OF STOCKHOLDERS' MEETING

Notice is hereby given that in pursuance of a resolution and order of the Board of Directors of the Buclimo Mining Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, unanimously adopted at the regular monthly meeting of said board, duly held on the thirtieth day of August, 1910, at the office of said corporation in San Francisco in said State, a meeting of the stockholders of said corporation is hereby called for, and will be held at the office of said corporation at Room 941 Monadnock Building, No. 681 Market St., San Francisco, California (said place of meeting being at the principal place of business of said corporation and at the building and place where the Board of Directors usually meet), on TUESDAY, THE TWENTY-NINTH DAY OF NOVEMBER, 1910, AT 8 O'CLOCK P. M. on said day, for the purpose of considering and acting upon the proposition to increase the capital stock of said corporation from One Hundred Thousand (100,000) Dollars, divided into One Hundred Thousand (100,000) shares of the par value of One Dollar each, to Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) Dollars, divided into Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) shares of the par value of One Dollar each. The amount to which it is proposed to increase the capital stock of said corporation is Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) Dollars.

By order of the Board of Directors.

Dated September 1, 1910.

THOMAS E. HAVEN,
Secretary Buclimo Mining Company.
9-23-10t

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, Department No. 4.

Action No. 22744.

JOHN CHARLSON,

Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof,

Defendants.

A. M. DE VALL, Attorney for Plaintiff.

667-9 Mills Building, Tel. Douglas 5990.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:

To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of John Charlson, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Chapultepec Street (now Winfield Avenue), distant thereon seventy-five (75) feet southerly from the southerly line of Esmeralda Street; thence running southerly along said easterly line of Chapultepec Street (now Winfield Avenue) twenty-five (25) feet; thence at a right angle easterly seventy (70) feet; thence at a right angle northerly twenty-five (25) feet; and thence at a right angle westerly seventy (70) feet to the point of beginning.

Being lot No. 393 of Gift Map No. 3, as per map on file and of record in the office of the Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be met in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 24th day of August, A. D. 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By J. J. McDONALD, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM.

The first publication of this Summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 9th day of September, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

NAMES.

ADDRESSES.

G. S. Crim,

2360 Howard Street,
San Francisco, Cal.

9-9-10t

TITLES RESTORED

TITLES RESTORED UNDER McENERNEY ACT, complete for $35.00. Burnt Records Title Co., 951-953 Monadnock Building, ninth floor. Market street, near Third.

JULIUS GALMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office,
38 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491

Residence,
1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4890

SAN FRANCISCO

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

State Board of Charities and Corrections

In many eastern states the State Board of Charities and Corrections has become a power for good government. In California the idea has not been fully developed, but progress is making. A beginning was made in 1903 when a statute was enacted providing for such a board.

This statute provided for a board of six persons, the Governor being ex-officio the seventh member when he attends, an arrangement that, unfortunately for the governor, and for accountability to the governor, runs through too many commissions and boards. The governor should be ex-officio member of nothing. It is quite enough for him to be governor and if he is not himself a part of any of these boards and commissions he can the better hold them accountable and, in truth, his ex-officio duties have to be neglected, almost abandoned, because his regular job of being governor, and his irregular job of being the chief attraction at functions all over the state, use up what is left of him.

The six members of the board, aside from the governor, are, by statute, divided into three lots, those who hold office for four years, those for eight and those for twelve, but inasmuch as the constitution fixes the terms of state officers at four years and no more the portion of the statute so dividing the board as to tenure of office is void and all hold at the pleasure of the governor. No more than three members of the board can be taken from the same political party.

The powers of the State Board of Charities and Corrections are, the right of entry into all public institutions, charitable or penal in their tendencies, except the veterans' home at Yountville and the Womans Relief Corps in Santa Clara county, to issue processes for the attendance of witnesses, administer oaths and hold such investigations into the conduct of public institutions as the public good may require or the governor may order. For the purpose of ascertaining the facts in relation to the conduct of the charitable and correctional side of public institutional life the board may prescribe forms for keeping accounts and making returns.

The duties of the State Board of Charities and Corrections mainly are, to maintain an office in San Francisco, to visit all charitable and correctional institutions of state and county, to examine and pass upon plans for public jails and prisons, to make such investigations as the governor may require or as they may be minded to make for the public good; three months before the meeting of each legislature to make to the governor a full report concerning all that institutional life which comes under their cognizance.

Practically, the function of a well ordered Board of Charities and Corrections is to stand between the citizenry of the state and state officialdom, critical and watchful of public affairs and affording such publicity regarding public institutions as will serve to keep them under public surveillance and answerable to and influenced by public sentiment.

The politicians of California have had no use for the State Board of Charities and Corrections, and the institutions themselves were, for a long time, resentful of their intrusions, but a better feeling toward the board has grown up with the added years and it is to be looked upon as promising better things in the future than it has been able to yield in the past, largely through timidity because of that official and institutional opposition. The biennial report to the governor is always valuable, but inadequate to keep the public informed. That board should be a mine of actual, not sensational, public information, not reported to the governor to be by him pigeonholed and squelched if the reports do not seem to him to be suitable to go out, but reported directly to the public without let or hindrance from the governor or anyone else.

The problem of the dependent child, and of the management of those quasi-public institutions that receive state aid, the orphanages, should also be placed under the supervision of this board. The child-placing service should be in that board's hands or at least supervised by it. Wherever the state's money or authority go in aid of dependent or delinquent persons the eye of this state board should follow.

The executive officer of the board is its secretary selected by the board. He receives a salary of $2,400 per year and traveling expenses. The members of the board serve without compensation, but receive actual and necessary traveling expenses. The sum total of expenses of the board for all purposes is limited to $6,000 a year, which is insufficient for as broad a utility as the needs of the state require. The board should be a constant educator of the public along sane lines of dealing with the delinquent and dependent problem.

The one thing without which the State Board of Charities and Corrections can be of little use is its freedom from partisan influence. The provision of the law that no more than half its membership shall be of one political party does not adequately protect its non-political quality when, as in the case of the present governor, changes in the personnel of the board are made merely to give political recognition to personal favorites. Partisanship is sometimes more intense within a party than between parties, and the members of a State Board of Charities and Corrections need to be above all partisan bias of whatever kind and as independent of executive influence as any other officer in the state. Perhaps a Commissioner of Charities and Corrections, elected by the legislature of the people with constitutional power and authority to organize a co-ordinate department of government might work out better than the present system, which nevertheless has proven of important public advantage.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE

A full line of Theosophical Literature from Point Loma, California, the headquarters of the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society, under the leadership of Katherine Tingley, is now on sale at A. M. Robertson's, 222 Stockton St., S. F., and at Smith Bros., 462 13th St., Oakland, California.

FOR RENT—Ten-roomed house on Kings-ton avenue, Piedmont (rear Linda); rent forty dollars per month. Real Estate Co., 4054 Piedmont avenue, rear Key Route Depot.
10-28-2t

Day School---Night School

Electrical, Mining, Civil
AND
Automobile Engineering

Architectural Drawing
Wireless and Morse Telegraphy
BOOKKEEPING : SHORTHAND

Our Graduates in Every Department Secure Good Positions

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
Invisible Bifocal Lenses
181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tels: Oakland 950 OAKLAND
Home A 3950 1236 Broadway

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY: NOVEMBER 18: '10

FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH-GOOD COURAGE-GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, In Advance. No. 52.

John Bull and His Troubles

THERE IS LITTLE NEED that we Americans should worry over the outcome of the strained relations now being maintained in England between the House of Lords and the House of Commons. There will be a revolution, but, aside from a few possible black eyes and cardinal noses, no damage will be done. Special privilege is to be rooted out of the world and when it shall have been rooted out of the House of Lords, as it will be, the royal family will go next. History is moving toward a free world and a fair chance, no man's liberty being limited save by the liberty of some other man as free as himself. It is great to be permitted to make a few individual tracks along that march of progress.

San Francisco Also Free

TUESDAY'S SPECIAL ELECTION may mean a new civic San Francisco, fit to keep company with the new structural San Francisco. Let us hope so. With the Australian ballot as it was, party designations gone and partyism driven out, if the Men of San Francisco do not elect to office the right sort of men it will be because the wrong sort are wanted. Remember that there are 26,000 men in San Francisco who will vote for Right Things every time and these, with the others they can bring to their way of thinking, will sweep the dangerous element off the boards at every election.

The University Ball Game

IF YOU DON'T LIKE A CROWD, don't go. If you do like a crowd, economize on the three dollar seats and take your chances with the dollar-a-head throng. You will get all the crowding you will ever want. It was a great game and the fervor running through the crowd was dynamic. It was not as partisan as tense, but every nerve was strung to concert pitch. Why? It is one thing to know that we like a thing, but it takes a philosopher to tell why. It is because combat appeals to primitive instincts, a survival of the age of tooth and claw and a crowd is always primitive. Perhaps so! Anyhow the fittest survived. The unfit was the crowd and hunted a place to sit down and rest its legs. Rugby is a great improvement on the American game, dangerous, but not deadly, and it is far more interesting to watch the varying fortunes of the ball than to witness the unintelligent tangling and untangling of wriggling, straining, grunting heaps of humanity which lent so much encouragement to the undertaker.

The Graft Cases Go Over

JUDGE W. P. LAWLOR HAS HELD on to the graft cases like grim death to a deceased African, and possibly not without results. They are now put over to January the sixteenth, by which time Governor-elect Hiram W. Johnson will be in office and it may occur to him to direct the Attorney General of the state to do what he long since should have done—take those cases in hand and see what he can make out of them. The law itself might be amended the better to subserve even handed justice. For instance, the state might be given the right to transfer the cases to an interior county.

A Gratifying Bigness

HELD BY THE SPELL of that unearned increment which every increase of population yields the holder of a square foot of earth, the Bay District of California is felicitating itself on the increased population which the United States census shows. Alameda, 23,383; Berkeley, 40,434; Oakland, 150,174; San Francisco, 416,912, a total of 630,903 for what is to all intents a single metropolitan district. This is a tithe of the population that will one day be resident here and for whose accommodations town lots have already been staked out. Heaven grant that this district grow in grace as rapidly as in population! It strains our faith to believe that our pious prayer will be vouchsafed a favoring answer.

What Is to Become of Curry?

THE POLITICAL MIND is much agitated over what is to become of Charley Curry when cut off from his present salary. It is taken for granted that he must have an office, for to take away that whereby one lives is to take his life and taking life is, at the very best, manslaughter, an offense which many think Governor Johnson will hesitate to commit. Why not pass him over to the administration at Washington, whose acts Mr. Curry has been at much pains to defend, with a recommendation that he be made consul general to some Central or South American Republic? Wherever he goes he will do politics, injuriously here, beneficially there, and he is too capable a man to be wholly lost to public life. He is your friend, President Taft, can't you take care of him?

Was It the Bumper Corn Crop?

WE ARE TOLD that it is the bumper corn crop of the Middle West that has started the prices of the butchers on the downward grade. Was it that or was it those indictments found against the big ones of the beef trust? Or did experience show that the price scale had proven higher than the traffic would bear? Anyhow, only the news of the drop in prices, and not the drop, has reached California. We are bystanders watching with watering mouths and curious eyes easterners eat meat.

Giving the News

TO THE MOST SIGNIFICANT EVENT of the week, the banquet of Francis J. Heney, the San Francisco Chronicle gave ten lines informing the public that the banquet had done gone and been had. The Examiner gave to it half a column, but affirmed that the enthusiasm manifested was mainly on account of the Fair and not for Mr. Heney. These manifestations of journalism were at once "nutty" and "peanutty," and serve to show how exceeding small our so-called "big papers" really are. The incident suggests editorial senility as well as superannuation.

Three Votes Apiece

THE UNITED LIQUOR INTERESTS of California were against A. J. Wallace for lieutenant governor and did all they could to defeat him. Nevertheless, his majority seems likely to press close to 20,000. In San Francisco there are 3,000 drinking places and through their influence San Francisco gave 9,000 majority against Wallace, averaging three votes apiece all down the line, just about the number of barkeeps employed. There you have the saloon strength in San Francisco stood up and counted! Isn't it fierce?

The Company That Misery Loves

SO FAR AS MR. HERRIN has been heard from, since the state election, the one crumb of comfort that has come his way is the consciousness that Theodore Roosevelt was also stung.

The Home-Coming of Heney

The reception tendered to Francis J. Heney at the Palace Hotel on Tuesday evening last was all that could be desired. The attendance was large and of the highest quality of manhood, the addresses were excellent, the enthusiasm great and stimulating. Mr. Heney's own address proved that he is himself again, rested, recuperated, in full possession of all his fine faculties. It was persuasive and restrained, the speaker being held under a splendid self control notwithstanding a fervor about him which would have swept a weaker man from his feet. Those who judged him as he was after three years of unremitting toil of the most nerve-racking character, not yet fully recovered from the shock of a wound that nearly cost him his life, judged him unrighteously. He was not and is not the kind of man that he then seemed to many to be. The event was a splendid tribute to a splendid manhood and the People of California, yes, of San Francisco, will yet come to reckon Francis J. Heney at his true worth, as one of the big, brainy, fearless, forceful men of the nation, a loyal servant of the commonwealth.

And the graft prosecution was worth all its cost, even though the convictions were few and even though the chief malefactor of them all escaped conviction. For the crimes with which they were charged were fastened upon them and not a man of them will go to his grave untainted. No man ever looks into the face of one of them, or ever will, without saying to himself: "He was one of them," and the attainer of that infamy will follow the family beyond the grave down to the second if not to the third and fourth generation. It is so written in the book of fate. And their most heinous offense was not the corruption of the public officials of San Francisco, nor yet the attempted wholesale assassinations, but the debauching of press and people until neither press nor people any more knew right from wrong. That was the unpardonable sin that is neither to be forgiven here nor hereafter.

Francis J. Heney returns to us triumphant. His work in the campaign for Johnson and Kent and the Republican ticket was the most vote-making work that was done. Wherever he went through the east he defended the name of San Francisco from aspersion. The strain had been greater than the popular mind could bear and, a year ago, there was a revulsion of feeling for the good cause for which Mr. Heney stood. Now that the people have calmed down and thought it over they know that they did the wrong thing a year ago in returning the retainers of the grafters and their associates to power and the way the late election went proves that the Men of San Francisco have returned to sobriety of mind.

It is true, as was many times stated Tuesday evening, that the late splendid victory of progressive Republicanism and progressive Democracy, for it was both of them that helped, would have been impossible but for the aroused state conscience following upon the splendid fight for decency made by Francis J. Heney and Rudolph Spreckels. They builded better and broader than even they knew.

Try Control First

There is not a shadow of doubt that the system whereby public service corporations have been financed, the investing public fleeced and the governments of men debauched, is intolerable and not to be endured. The extraordinary opportunities afforded big and adventurous men who, if they had been kept in glass cases away from temptation to become scoundrels might have lived blameless lives and died decent deaths, ought not to be offered another generation of money-hungry moral weaklings.

But does it follow, as Mr. Heney so confidently affirms, that public ownership of public

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage. Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Moir, 330 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

utilities is the only remedy? We think not. Public ownership has evils of its own, not commensurate with the evils of our American game of high finance, but none the less so serious as to be avoided if we can avoid them. We have not, in this country, so far solved the problem of municipal government as to undertake functions which may perhaps be as well performed otherwise. Public ownership should be looked upon as a dernier resort not to be embarked upon until all reasonable hopes of corporation control have to be abandoned as a result of failure.

A court house is a public utility and the county of San Mateo is near enough to a municipality to serve as an illustration, and yet that county is disgraced by as villainous an example of graft and corruption as one would wish to see, and it is an open secret that bribing supervisors of counties by commercial firms (unknown of course to the heads of such houses) is a recognized and accepted method by which such houses do business. The stakes are not large but they are large enough to tempt to their fall the mere money grubber whether big or little, and nothing but a glass case, or an iron prison, will keep such men from becoming grafters.

If government with us had not been imbecile, and imbecility of government is as fatal to public ownership as it is to public control of utilities, we would long since have strictly limited the stocks and bonds of public service corporations to the actual investment and would have given Patrick Calhoun and his fellow buccaneers no opportunity to issue and, by and by, market $92,000,000 of securities on a basis of $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 of actual physical property valuation. Had his stocks and bonds been limited by law to not exceeding ten per cent in excess of the actual and necessary investment there would have been little of bribing of political bosses and supervisors in San Francisco.

The ills we have suffered at the hands of Patrick Calhoun and his allies are well-earned penalties for having surrendered government into the hands of "the interests" to be managed for the benefit of "the interests." The prizes these interests hung up for themselves discounted the grand prizes of the Louisiana lottery in its palmiest days a thousand to one. We waste sympathy on them when we commiserate such men over their sore temptations. They created those temptations themselves, jumped at them with alacrity and made off with the wages of their sin jovous in the consolation that hell is a myth and that the melon cut is a full equivalent for the risk of damnation here and hereafter.

This paper desires to see public control earnestly tried before embarking upon a policy of public ownership more than in a tentative way, for example, in the instance of the Geary street road. When we have made the recent conquest of government by the people permanent and unassailable it will be time enough to venture farther toward public ownership than necessity meantime compels us to go. If the nation can control the capitalization and financing of its railroads, as it must, any city can, with right legislation, control the capitalization and financing of its car lines and light and power companies. Let us first try control. We have not tried it. We have only suffered in inactivity, anger and shame.

With a Broader Horizon

Considerable surprise was caused by the large Socialist vote polled at the late election. It was not significant. The vote that went to the Socialist party would have gone to the Union Labor party had there been such a ticket in the field. In San Francisco it was the McCarthy following that voted with the Socialists and, elsewhere, it was that labor vote that disliked Bell and had little liking for Johnson. The Socialists absorbed the slack and that is all there was to it.

But there is a broader and more interesting view to take of Socialism. We in America see, and shall see, only the most superficial reflex of the real battle ground, which is Europe. In America Socialism attracts the mentally curious and that froth on the human mug that manifests itself in the newest thing out.

Socialism would be kicked forty cubits high by any American community that should embark on an experiment of practical Socialism. We are an unregulated and unregulatable people. Milwaukee is a little speck of Europe or Socialism would not be rife there, but it was not the Socialists that gave Milwaukee into the hands of the Socialists. That was done by Democrats and Republicans who came to believe in the honesty of the Socialists and in the dishonesty of their own party manipulators. When the rascals have turned Socialists the Socialist party will be as bad as the others, and the rascals will turn Socialists whenever Socialism gives best promise of power and office. By the way nothing Socialistic is being attempted in Milwaukee. The only change is that individualistic government is being honestly instead of dishonestly administered.

Now Socialism is unjust in principle and would be intolerable in practice, and yet it seems likely to prove the most humanly beneficent movement of the twentieth century. It is breaking up the old order in Europe. Europe is medieval. It is humanly classified and stratified to the last degree. Democracy implies the tearing away and casting out of all artificial hindrances to the progress of the individual. It is the reverse of medievalism. The Socialists are breaking down all these barriers, casting them out and making way for Democracy, not Socialism. Socialism implies a social order regulated to the last degree, Democracy a free society and it is toward freedom and not regulation that civilization is advancing.

It is going to be a great and history-making struggle. The sympathies of America should be with the Socialists but against Socialism, for the Socialists are breaking up and casting out outworn lumber five to ten centuries old, all of which deserves to be cast out and burned up; but those who conceive that the big Socialist vote lately cast in California implies a marked growth of Socialism in California are void of understanding. McCarthy, or some other man of his ilk, will take three-fourths of that vote to himself again when the cities hold their elections a year hence. That is where it belongs.

It should be added that Socialism affords best promise of doing away with the back-breaking, bankrupting old man of the sea that is crushing Europe and putting America to wasteful expense. It is welding those who must do the fighting if it is to be done into a brotherhood that Christianity has hardly attained. And yet Socialism is at once unjust and would be intolerable.

The Case of Ellery

There are two sides to the case of Nathaniel Ellery, state engineer, about whom the lunacy commission quarterly conference has lately freed its mind. It cannot be denied that the architectural and engineering work has delayed construction seriously and it cannot be questioned that the cost of construction in almost every instance has exceeded the appropriations. The deficiencies have had to be made up out of institutional contingent funds much needed for other purposes. Also the engineering department has been less compliant than it might have been in meeting the views of the persons who are to use the buildings as to the arrangements of such buildings. If a housewife properly may be permitted to plan her own kitchen the superintendent of an institution may properly be permitted to prescribe the general arrangements of such buildings as he is to be required to use, committing them to the state architect to be worked out.

But to revert to the old system of construction would be intolerable. It was intolerable while it existed. The result of that system was insecurity and graft. The hundred eleven lives lost at Agnew Hospital, in the earthquake of 1906, were lost because the work of construction had been dishonestly done. If those buildings had been properly tied together, and good mortar had been used, they would doubtless nevertheless have been ruined, but the floors need not have fallen, tons and tons of useless cornices and copings need not have been there to shake down to crush those beneath.

All over the state money was wasted by architecture without engineering, and by felonious malconstruction by contractors. As for the good offices of local boards, they are inconsequential and may well be dispensed with. Under their guidance walls have been chopped to admit plumbing with no thought except for the plumbing and entire unconcern for the stability of the structure and the safety of its occupants.

If Mr. Ellery is not the man for the place it will be the duty of Governor Johnson to find a more able engineer head to that office, but the principle of state construction under a state engineering department of supervision is one that should never again be departed from. As for the local boards, they should all be abolished. They cumber the earth.

Who Should Go Out of Office

There are those who are concerned through fear that Governor Johnson will turn out of office every incumbent whom he can turn out merely because such men came into office under the old regime. Such fears are groundless. Hiram W. Johnson is in the full possession of all his faculties and, being a rational being, will do the rational thing. What will make this relatively easy for him is that he has not a horde of hungry office hunters behind him and that not an office in the whole list is under mortgage to any person or interest.

This paper has no authority to speak for him, but it is to be doubted if he will remove from office any person who has made good in office however he came to be in the office. Governor Gillett, as raw a partisan as we have had in the executive office, has retained in office some expert men who were in office when he became governor, and there are some in office who held positions under Governor Gage and have continued to hold them right through Pardee's administration and Gillett's.

But there are those who should go out of office as soon as they can be dusted out. These are they who were Southern Pacificans before they were Republicans and who have served the interests instead of the state. All such should go and should not be allowed to stand on the order of their going. There is also some dead timber in office and, in the institutions, quite a little that is inefficient. Governor Johnson will find his hands quite full enough cleaning out the rubbish without embarrassing his own administration of the ship of state by manning it all with raw recruits. The official who has made good should not worry, the one who has not should keep him self in light marching order.

Uses of Riches

One of the most serious consequences flowing from our present-day exaggerated inequalities of fortune is the tendency of the common man to pass up to the rich man those benevolences without which society cannot escape injury. It is true that persons should give according to their means, but "according to means" implies that everyone who has any means at all shall give something. The tendency is to pass the whole benevolence up to the man of large means, the man of small means contributing nothing. If this continues it will finally become easier for a rich man than for a poor one to enter the kingdom of heaven. He will be more fit to enter. Each should do what he can to help the cause that appeals to him, and not until he has done that may one rightfully pass the rest to the man of exceptional wealth. And yet it has ever been true that the pioneering work of practical benevolence has been carried on by the rich. Colleges have been founded, schools and hospitals established, institutions for the amelioration of human suffering financed, out of large fortunes, but when such benevolences have been gotten on their feet the public usually has sustained them. That is what fortunes are for—to put on their feet enterprises that the public will sustain when their worth has come to be appreciated, and, when that worth has come to be appreciated, plenty more such enterprises will not only be sustained but created by contributions from the common fund, each according to his ability.

Control of the Power Plants

There are problems that have been put off as long as they can be. They are up to us at last. One of these is "State Control of the Development of Hydro-Electric Energy." It will come before the legislature this winter. Legislation is more likely to follow than to lead the pressure of public sentiment, and it is important that a sound public sentiment on the subject be developed. To this end our "backbone" article for the week deals with "State Control of Power Plants." It should be read with care and, we trust, will serve to open the discussion.

There are three parties in interest: the promoter, the investor, the consumer of power. There must be a liberal margin of profit for the promoter or he will not, and cannot, promote power developing enterprises, but there is no need that he shall have "melons" to cut or that he shall deplete his sources of water supply in the superfluous watering of his capital stock.

Investors have been looked upon by promoters as legitimate plunder. The betrayal of the interests of shareholders by corporation managers has been a national infamy. The exact financial status, investment and earning power, of every corporation must at all times be made public property. In no other way can the investor be protected.

The interests of the consumer can only be conserved by regulation of rates and rate regulation has so far proven farcical. It can be left neither to producer, consumer nor free competition. There must be some tribunal to hear and determine administratively and, perhaps, summarily

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Unconcern for the welfare of others is selfishness and selfishness, not money, is the root of all evil. Money is merely the token by which one form of selfishness is made manifest. Unconcern is common and likewise exasperating.

If one look for the selfishness of unconcern he will find people bristling with it as desert things bristle with spines and thorns. We Americans are not a well behaved people. With us courtesy is no fine art and where it has become such it is as often an artifice as genuine. True courtesy is a demonstration of the spirit of good will in thoughtful regard for others. As a partial compensation for our lack of good behavior we may at least plead a sincerity to which polished peoples can scarcely lay claim.

In its origin courtesy is propitiatory. The kowtow is self abasement in the presence of one who is feared, while courtesy the world needs proceeds from good will, not from a slavish submissiveness.

Our immigrants from Europe are mainly from the lower social levels and, at home, they were obsequious to their superiors. Here they recognize no superiors, no need for courtesy, often even for respectful behavior. Notice them when they ride to their work in the morning on the street car! They climb aboard like cattle and no more think of moving along to give room to others than would so many steers off the range think of moving along in a stock car to make room for another steer. It takes a hook and shove to make room. This is characteristic of the undeveloped. In a reformatory not once a week will a hand be lent, however much it may be needed, except in obedience to a command from one in authority.

Riding to and fro in the Key route trains it is only now and again that a man gets up to give a woman a seat. Often the aisles are filled with women standing and the seats with men sitting. Sometimes there is justification for this in the fact that the men have been hard at work on their feet all day while the women, mainly stenographers, have been sitting. There is also a similar justification on the street cars at night for the returning laborers, all very tired.

But there is a more tangible reason, if not justification, for the growing masculine disregard for the comfort of femininity. It is the outrageous disregard of women for the comfort of others whether male or female. Of course this has to do with the big hats. The hobble skirt is woman's own affair. At that men only laugh. At the hats they swear and against them they vow vengeance, not impotently either. They take their revenge in train and trolley and in cherishing a spirit of bitterness toward the sex that God gave into their keeping to love and cherish. The sin of unconcern for the comfort of others is not less to be laid at the door of women than of men and if some man on the car blows tobacco smoke into the face of a woman with a big hat she will not need go far to learn the reason why. At the ball game there was not less of internal swearing at hats than there was of yelling over the sensational plays on the field. Whoever wore a big hat to that event was guilty of the selfishness of unconcern and was in a measure responsible for the bitterness and bad words that filled the heart and fell from the lips of her brother.

The selfishness of unconcern is a national sin. It is the thing that prompts our French friends to look upon us as a nation of pigs, dogs, hogs, the Chinese to regard us as foreign devils, the Japanese to look upon us as semi-civilized, the Spanish Americans to look down upon us as mere dollar worshippers. The nations of South America decline to open trade relations with us largely for this reason. We have good traits, but not until this national sin has been overlooked and thrust aside are our good traits discoverable to the more courteous peoples of the earth.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Some Improvement in Judicial Methods

We may not have gotten very far along in the important matter of securing justice by means of courts. In fact, it must be admitted that we are a long way wide of the mark when a self-confessed criminal Ruef and a convicted criminal Schmitz are at large, and a Calhoun, without even troubling to deny his recognized guilt, sets all law at defiance by virtue of his wealth. Nevertheless, although we have far to go in quest of justice, we have come a very considerable way since the "good old times" of which the poets rapturously sing. Wherefore let us look back a way and note the condition whence we have traveled. Only ninety years ago, in Merrie England, when a defendant was charged with a capital crime he was not permitted to address the jury, either in person or by an attorney. The king's counsel might address the jury at will, but not so the attorney for the defendant; he must make no plea for his client's life. And the tragical absurdity of it is that in a civil action, with property alone involved, the defendant might be heard. It must be admitted that we have come a long way from that time to this, when a defendant—if he have plenty of money or "pull"—may all but hold the court in defiance. Another unjust condition from which we have progressed is that under which an acquitted defendant might be held in prison until he had paid all fees pertaining to the case. We have made a long step since that day, and yet while men notoriously guilty may walk the streets as freely as the guiltless it is evident that our judicial arrows still hit a tremendous distance from the bullseye of justice.

The Prizes of Aviation

The expenses of the aviator are great, but so are the prizes he wins if he is successful. Within the last thirteen months, for example, 25 "birdmen" have won prizes aggregating $596,818, an average of $23,873 for each one of them. Paulhan heads them with $82,052.40, and you must go half way down the list before you find an American, viz., Glenn Curtiss, whose prizes amount to $16,600. Besides these most successful aviators there are 40 others who have won prizes averaging about $2,000 apiece, making a sum total of prizes amounting to approximately $675,000, an average of $10,385 for each one of the 65 aviators. This looks like making money fast, but, on the contrary, it should be remembered that aviation expenses are tremendous, that at any time an aeroplane may be demolished or so badly injured as to involve great outlay. On the whole, although the aviator's prizes may be many, it is doubtful if they average enough to keep the ledger account even. Aviation still is the rich man's, rather than the speculator's, pastime, and it is likely to remain so for some time to come.

Our Rich Farmers

The Louisville Herald has figured out that the farmers, as a class, are the richest people in this country. This conclusion may not be indorsed by all farmers, but the Kentucky paper presents some statistics in support of it which are interesting, if nothing more. For instance, it calls attention to the alleged fact that the value of all crops in the United States this year will be $9,500,000,000, and that the farmers' profits will be $2,000,000,000. The crops as they come from the farms, without deducting expenses, would give more than $100 apiece to every man, woman and child in this country, and the net profits would give considerably more than that sum to each head of a family of five persons. Within the past ten years the farmers have paid off $6,000,000,000 in mortgages and the total valuation of the farms is $3,500,000,000 more than that of all the steam and electric railways and all the factories in this country. These statistics do not give agriculturists much opportunity to complain.

Wagner Again Will Be Heard

Poor Wagner! To specify more definitely, poor Richard Wagner! He who not only wrote compositions which impelled an agitated world to question whether or not they were music, but also wrote poems, essays, stories, etc. It appears that Wagner, like most people in the literary and musical worlds, produced various works which he rejected and decided not to publish, considering them unworthy of his name and fame. Among these were six poems, eighteen short stories and eleven essays. Now these are to be collected, by someone, perhaps, who is less careful of Wagner's fame than was Wagner, and published under the comprehensive title, "The Young Wagner." This may prove a kindness to the world of men, but isn't it probable that Wagner's ghost, if it happens to hear about it, will squirm? What reason is there to suppose his literary taste has degenerated simply because he been elsewhere than here for some decades?

Roman Boat Found in England

Aeons have joined the innumerable yesterdays since Roman galleys sailed everywhere upon the Mediterranean or, venturing upon the Atlantic, crept along the eastern shores of Europe and Africa. Since then nations have been born, have done their work and have passed away, and most of the recorded history of mankind has been written. Sixty generations of men have had their brief day and have moved on into the mists since "the grandeur that was Rome" passed away, yet but the other day one of the ancient Roman galleys was found in our modern world and beneath its most modern city of London. Twenty feet below the surface of the ground, on sand which evidently once was the bed of a stream, this memento of an old, old time was found. Of course the galley, after some sixteen hundred years of disuse, was badly decomposed, but its shape still was preserved and there was no possibility of mistake concerning what the workmen had found. The boat was 60 or 70 feet long, and about one-half of it still is preserved. In it was found a coin of the year 292 A. D., issued by the Emperor Carausius, and also another coin of the year 80. This is the first Roman galley ever found within the confines of England.

Backset for Antique-Worshippers

Perhaps a species of subdued satisfaction may be derived from learning that those who affect for antiques an admiration which is unaccompanied by knowledge whether they are manufactured in Grand Rapids, Michigan; or elsewhere, are not confined to Uncle Samuel's America. The other day an expert lecturer in London, first inviting all who possessed samples of antique English or Chinese porcelain to bring it to the lecture for inspection. Much was brought, and the result was painful, inasmuch as a large proportion of the "antiques" were determined to be disgracefully modern. The cases of demolished pride were many and melancholy, but doubtless the most lugubrious was connected with a dinner service. This was announced to have been in one family 300 years, but a brief inspection revealed, and unfortunately advertised, the fact that the factory in which it was made was not opened until 1850. Thus it is made clear that the antique-worshippers who know nothing about antiques are not confined to this side of the great waters, and this leads to a hope that art-worshippers of similar proficiency also may be found at times on the other side of the pond.

Something About New York's Growth

Although New York is surpassed in population by London, in some notable respects it ranks ahead of the English metropolis. The American city is first in wealth and also in the volume and variety of its business industries. Moreover, at the rate recently maintained by the two cities, New York will exceed London in population within the next 25 years. During the ten years from 1900 to 1910 New York's population increased 1,329,681, and this was an increase greater than that of Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Boston, Detroit and Cleveland combined. It is a percentage of increase (38.7) which probably never was equaled by that of any other vast city. New York has more telephones, more automobiles, sends more letters and telegrams; in short, generally beats London in all those matters which pertain to what Americans term "a rushing business." Whether the American city has the more or less of crime and penury may be questionable; but that is a matter which is quite likely to be overlooked in boastful statistics.

The Growth of Russia

We of America flatter ourselves that we are doing a rather neat stunt in the growing line, and we are. An increase of something like fifteen millions in ten years is not a thing to be lightly passed by with a smirk. Nevertheless, when it comes to the little matter of growing in a hurry, watch Russia; set your eye on her population figures. Two years ago Russia's population, according to a census, numbered 155,000,000; now, by a census just taken, it numbers 160,000,000, an increase of 5,000,000 in two years. Certainly we are growing some, but Russia is beating us almost two to one. And as there still are vast areas of cultivable and unoccupied land in the Czar's domain it is probable that this rapid rate of increase will be continued for some time to come. Democratic America and tyrannized Russia, the people rush to both; which might lead to an inference that it is rather lands than forms of government which settlers seek.

SHEAR WIT

Officer (to recruit, who had missed every shot)—Good heavens, man, where are your shots going? Recruit (nervously)—I don't know, sir; they left here all right—Ideas.

"What's Maude crying about?" asked the father home from work. "She's crying over the play she saw at the matinee." "And what's Maymie crying about?" "She's crying because she couldn't go."—Washington Star.

Scene: A crowded railway carriage. Bald-headed, Pompous Old Man (addressing passengers)—Talk about the poor of England; it's their own fault. Now, just look at me. I am a self-made man, and proud to say so. I started with nothing but brains, and look at me now. Stuttering Man in Corner (who is seen endeavoring to speak)—What d-d-do you call yourself—a sel-sel-self-made man? Pompous Old Man—Yes, sir—a self-made man. Can you contradict me? Stuttering Man—Oh, n-n-no. Only I thought that if you were a sel-sel-self-made man, why the d-d-dickens didn't you-you-you put some hair on your head? Collapse of baldheaded, pompous old man.—Tit-Bits.

Inspector Dew, of Crippen renown, told a Buffalo reporter that he was most impressed in America by the grandeur of the Niagara Falls and the sobriety of the American people. "We have no such sobriety across the water," said the Scotland Yard detective. "Our slums of a Saturday night are horrible. It's beer, you see. British beer is as strong almost as American whiskey. They tell a story about two British beer drinkers. One said to the other: 'I've been very sick, George. For two days little pink snakes and frogs and lizards were crawling all over me.' 'Been sick?' said George. 'Why, man, you're sick still. Pink swarms of 'em are crawling all over you now.'"—Buffalo Courier.

The California Weekly
IS PRINTED BY
Donaldson & Moir
PRINTERS
330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

OF BOOKS THAT ARE SIMPLE

We mean simple as opposed to profound. It is not mere paradox to say that simple things are the profound things. "Look, Nerissa, how far that candle throws its beams. So shines a good deed in a naughty world." Simple, is it not? And yet, observe two things about those simple words: how they have rung down the ages on many people's lips; and how, when you read them, the waves of imagination circle and spread out from that simple thought as water circles and spreads to vast distances from a mere pebble's fall. Simple things, when they are true, are profound because they are profoundly suggestive, because they illuminate the core of a great train of experiences and thoughts and emotions, and send the mind and the spirit speeding out from that centre of suggestion into wide areas of human feeling and ideas.

Looked at conversely, it requires greatness of mind, breadth of experience, and genius for expression to concentrate these wide ranges of thought and experience into a simple and winning phrase, suggestive of all that goes into its making. Little minds take little ideas, torture language into glittering gems and cast them forth as jewels. The undiscerning applaud, but the judicious grieve, because mere cleverness of execution is not essential to greatness of expression. As Coleridge pointed out—or was it De Quincey?—one of the mightiest pieces of profound dramatic felicity is in Shakespeare's "Macbeth," and it is not even a line of the play, but only a stage direction. It is at the end of the sleep walking scene, where Lady Macbeth has given her terrible picture of conscience-haunted dreams. The poet adds, in parenthesis, "A knocking at the gate." A simple idea, expressed in the simplest possible direction, and yet how profound! To crash the reader back to earth from that awful land of phantasy by one simple, crudely human note, and thereby tremendously to enhance the effect of terror in the scene from which it lifts us. Profundity lay back of that simple stage direction, profound knowledge of the human heart, a true genius for understanding of human emotions.

In another style of writing, look at the simplicity of Bacon's essays. Eliminating the Latin quotations, which were intelligible enough to any educated person of his day, and considering only the English, see how smoothly it flows, how simply it expresses great ideas, how plainly it lays bare a matured and profound philosophy. Why simply? Because Bacon had contemplated his subjects with the powerful lens of his extraordinary mind, had reduced his subjects to an analysis that made them plain to him, and then had the greatness and the felicity of style to reassemble these ideas so that he presented of them only those parts that were necessary to suggest the whole, in all their orderly connection.

It is here that modern realism fails to attain the effect for achieving which the method was especially designed. The realist wishes to present his subject vividly, and he believes that he can do so by microscopic accuracy of detail. But in his eagerness to achieve that accuracy, he loses sight of the necessity for selection, he forgets that there is a scale of relative values in detail, and the result is that his work is blurred and indistinct in effect because every detail is of equal emphasis in his picture, because there is no centre of his composition around which all the minor detail falls into place without changing the centre of vision. On the contrary the mind is attracted from detail to detail, and nowhere gets a complete picture. The man who sees the Parthenon from a distance of a hundred yards has a better idea of it, even if he never approaches nearer, than the idea of it obtained by a fly that has crawled over every stone of it and knows its every seam.

It is this faculty of seeing things whole that distinguishes the profound mind, and things seen whole form simple pictures. You gain a better idea of the appearance of New York City from the foreigner's phrase, "It looks like a row of cracker boxes set on end," than you would gain from years of study of architectural books that describe its buildings in detail.

The impressionist goes to the other, and equally fallacious, extreme from the realist. He sketches emotions vaguely, he sees no sharp outlines, he draws pictures that suggest rather by their color than by their drawing, to borrow the language of painting. Now a work of literary art must bear an intimate relation to life, it must suggest life sharply, no matter even if it exaggerates the truth to do it. But the impressionistic school of writers do not suggest anything but the shadow of emotions. They do not come in touch with life at all.

Selection is the kernel of the secret. Take the one detail that suggests all the rest, and state that detail as simply and as sharply as you can. The rest of the story is told by the reader himself. His own mind leaps to it without effort, because his experience corresponds to the writer's experience. "To suggest is to create; to define is to destroy." The great, profound geniuses suggest, and that is most suggestive which is simplest.

THE STORY OF RAB

The immortal story of "Rab and His Friends" was written "on the quick," to use one of Dr. John Brown's favorite expressions. His uncle, the Rev. Dr. Smith of Biggar, asked him to give a lecture in his native village. He had never lectured before, but was anxious to say something to the "strong brained primitive people of my youth."

In a rare moment of inspiration he decided to tell them Ailie's story, the memory of which had never left him since his days in the Minto House Hospital. Ever he saw the beautiful face of the suffering woman, heard the voice of the heart broken carrier entreating him to tell all the world what his Ailie was, and listened to Rab whining at the hospital door.

At 12 o'clock one midsummer night, says Mrs. Sarah Tooley in the Cornhill Magazine, he sat down to tell the tale, and by 4 o'clock he had finished it. He called the lecture "The Howgate Carrier, His Wife and His Dog Rab"; but his uncle in introducing the subject to the Biggar audience omitted the last word, at which Dr. John complained that his friend Rab had been grievously insulted.

"There is no doubt he was a dog," he explained, "but he was a great deal more—he was Rab."

Perhaps it was to make amends to the faithful creature that, when the story appeared in print, the author entitled it "Rab and His Friends."

Californian Poets' Corner

A FANCY

By Charles Warren Stoddard

What would you call the Sun, as he falls
Out of the heavens, while shadows dim
And rosy are draping the broad sky-walls—
What would you call the Sun, as he falls
Far down to the ocean's rim?

All of the sky is gathering webs
Of shadow about it, and the tide—
The lazy tide—as it flows and ebbs,
Is quite entangled with crimson webs,
And with crimson bloom is dyed.

Perhaps the Sun is an egg of gold
In a nest of cloud, and Night must be
A fidgety hen—for look! she has rolled
Out of the nest the egg of gold,
And spilled the yolk in the sea!

OF NEW BOOKS

The praises of old friends, old wine and old books have been sung in every key and measure. But the praises of new friends and new books, if not of new wine, deserve some passing attention. Who has not felt a glorious thrill of satisfaction when, in the dreary wilderness of current literature, he has mounted a rising bit of ground and seen, with Balboa, a "new ocean swim into his ken," a new book by a new writer with the immortal and unpurchaseable gift?

This element of adventure is not to be despised by the habitual reader. The old books are known lands, beautiful to be sure, familiar landscapes, friendly towers, green fields and blue skies. But the new books are the unknown places over the rim of the hills. If we go over we may find much of desert, much of dreary plain, but here and there we are sure to come on pleasant valleys and cool brooks, a field of flowers or a stately tree. And, mayhap, God will be extra kind to us and we may stand suddenly, unexpectedly upon the brink of some Yosemite of letters, some Grand Canyon of song, some Niagara of passion, and feel ourselves discoverers of genius. We know one man, of some distinction in the field of letters, whose dearest pride is the fact that, years ago, in an obscure newspaper article signed "R. L. S." he detected a vein of pure literary gold and prophesied that the man we all now know as Robert Louis Stevenson would one day rank among the first of contemporary writers.

There is another sound argument for the reading of a considerable amount of contemporaneous writings. There is always, in much reading, just a little tendency to lose touch with reality, to destroy that nice balance between the imaginative life which idealizes everything and the workaday life which faces the facts of existence with an equable spirit. There is the danger, in too many books, that we will look up from their pages and find the world sadly awry after the easily contrived operations of Fate in the narrative we have read. Great bookworms are apt to be pessimists in real life, because of this kind of disappointment with reality, often suffered.

But the man who mixes his reading of the classics with a fair reading of the contemporaneous writers finds in this modern literature a double antidote. In the first place, so many of the books themselves are disappointments that the ratio of bad books to good books bears a fair relation to the ratio of perfection in earthly experiences to imperfections in earthly experiences. In this way the reader learns to expect disappointments in books and is not surprised when he encounters disappointments in life, and he discounts the one as he discounts the other.

And in the second place, contemporaneous reading is an antidote just because it is contemporaneous, "of the moment," to translate the adjective. Such reading necessarily reflects the intellectual status of the day, just as it reflects the intellectual attitude of the day, and just as it reflects the manners, customs, style of speech, slang, idiosyncrasies of thought, morals and opinions of the day. These things are valuable. They help to keep a studious man in touch with the world about him, to make him feel familiar with that world when he goes out into it. And they keep within him a realization that the world moves, that life is a current, not a stagnant pool, that things suffer change—he among other things—and that activity and progress are as essential in the intellectual life as they are essential in the physical or commercial or political life.

Finally, it should be remembered that all books were new once, that we enjoy the blessings of the classics because their authors' contemporaries recognized their merit and encouraged them with praise and gold, or else the authors paid for our pleasure in sorrows and life's blood.

ABOUT UNCONVENTIONAL PEOPLE

By E. FRENCH STROTHER

In the first place, let us admit that everybody who has ever amounted to shucks has been unconventional. The reason for that is simple: conventions are the habits of the mass, and hence it is the conventional thing to be stupid, lacking in originality and boldness, to be commonplace. Extraordinary achievements require extraordinary energy, and to be extraordinarily energetic is not popular, because it sets a pace the rest of us have to follow, and we don't like that.

But just because we may admit that everybody who has ever amounted to anything has been unconventional, it does not follow that we may admit that everybody who has been unconventional has amounted to something. As Artemas Ward would say, that would be "2 mutch." All that we may safely assume from a man's unconventionality, unsupported by other evidence, is that he has used his mind at least once, that he has thought about at least the matter in which he has defied convention. Even here we may not assume that his thought was worth anything, it may have been a crazy thought, or an underdone thought. But let us give him the credit for one idea: even that is strikingly unusual.

Now the conventions have a sound basis in human experience and in common sense. That is exactly the reason why geniuses, idiots and light-headed folk are not bound by them. Geniuses have uncommon sense, idiots have no sense, and light-headed people have nonsense. Obviously, habits that originate in common sense either ought not or cannot be applied to people who do not form their habits by the light of common sense.

For conventionality is, as we have said, simply the habits of the mass of mankind. Like all habits, it is formed by the process of confronting a problem, solving it somehow, and then forever after applying the same solution to the same problem, simply to save ourselves the trouble of finding another solution. Another solution might be better, but we feel that the effort to find it would be worse, or would take too much time. So we prefer accepting any solution and forming a habit of it, to seeking another.

This finality of habit is its virtue. We all remember how intricate and difficult we found the problem of putting on a pair of trousers by ourselves the first time we ever had to do it alone. When mother used to hold the knickerbockers for us and braced our back against her knee, it was perfectly simple to step in and let her button them up. But when, one day, she firmly refused to help us any longer, and we had to decide how to get into them so that the seat of them would be behind, and when we had to balance ourselves on one leg, without support, while slipping the other leg in, we realized suddenly that putting on knickerbockers was a grave feat calling for skillful manipulation. But does it bother us now? Not at all. We solved those difficulties once, and unconsciously adopted that solution for permanent use. Now, there may be a better way of putting on trousers than the way we do it, but that is relatively unimportant. The important thing is that, for us, the method of putting on trousers is settled, that we don't have to think about trousers at all when we put them on. As in many other and more weighty things, it is relatively unimportant that the thing be settled right; the important point is that it shall be settled—right or wrong.

That example illustrates the history of the formation of personal habits. The history of the habits of society as a mass is much the same. A nation, a race, or an epoch faces a problem—the marriage relation, for example—grapples with that problem, wrestles with it, finally gouges its eyes out, or breaks its back, anything so long as it gets a decision. That decision may not be right, but it is final, and finality is what is wanted, because finality produces peace. The Chinaman settles the problem by deciding that a man may have as many wives as he wants, but a woman only one husband. The Thibetan settles it by deciding that a woman may have as many husbands as she wants, but a man only one wife. Christendom votes for one husband one wife apiece.

Now, that decision having been made, it becomes conventional in China to have several wives, and the man who has only one is a most unconventional creature. In Thibet, a lady brands herself "strongminded," to say the least, who depends for support upon only one husband. And in Christendom, we speak of the "unconventional morality" of either man or woman who looks at more than one woman or man.

Viewed abstractly, from a broadly philosophical point of view, all three of these decisions are wrong. Viewed concretely, from an intensely practical point of view, each decision is right. Let me explain.

In order to explain, it is first necessary to get two views of morality, so that we may dismiss it as one of the factors in our discussion. From the philosophical point of view, morals are merely an expedient standard of right living. From the practical point of view they are an inexorable standard of right living. As the practical point of view is the point of view that prevails, it is conventional that the moral code of a people shall be inexorable. We admit this necessity. To aid in making it inexorable, all the forces of society are summoned to bolster it up: society makes laws to enforce it, society uses social ostracism to enforce it, and religion is called in to lend the august sanction of divinity to its "Thou shalt nots."

But from the philosophical point of view we observe that the moral code of China is not the same as the moral code of Thibet, and that the gods of China are called upon to sanction a different code from that which the gods of Thibet are called to sanction. We decline to say whether the Chinese code is better or worse, philosophically, than the Thibetan code; we do not hesitate to say, practically, that one is just as good as the other, so long as the Chinese code is applied only in China, and the Thibetan code in Thibet. Each nation settled upon its code as the best solution, from its experience, that it could devise, and each code is useful merely because it is a solution, not because it is right.

So we see that morals have no relation to right or religion. Morals were determined largely by accident, and religious sanction was an afterthought, brought in to aid the process of crystallization into national or racial habit. We may now omit the moral element from our discussion of the differing national conventions regarding marriage, and point out why those conventions are both right and wrong.

The Chinese, the Thibetan and the Christian conventions of marriage are all three right, merely because they settled a question to the general satisfaction of the people concerned. Think of the chaos that would beset any nation that did not settle this question somehow. The sad state of the man who married his step-mother would be nothing to the tangled network of the social structure under such a regime. Consider what Europe since the Reformation would have been, if men had had to settle the question of marriage as well as the question of salvation at the same time. Add the conjugal wars to the religious wars and the political wars, and Europe would have been divided into ten million camps instead of ten hundred.

But the Chinese, the Thibetan and the Christian conventions of marriage are all three wrong. We will qualify that statement: if any one of the three is right, the other two are necessarily wrong; and probably none of them is right. We base the last phrase upon considerations of health and natural inclination: biologically, it is probably certain that limitless wives (the Chinese convention) are too many; biologically, it is probable that limitless husbands (the Thibetan convention) are too many; biologically, it is probable that one wife (the Christian convention) is too few. We are treading on dangerous ground here, but in support of the last contention I will quote the words of an American woman, who is an honored missionary of the Presbyterian church to the Chinese, who told me personally that she considered the Chinese men "the most moral in the world. I have never heard of one of them who was unfaithful to his wives." No Buddhist missionary to benighted Christendom could conscientiously carry a similar report back to China.

But let us get back to our original subject, which was not what conventions are, nor why, but observations about unconventional people.

Roughly, there are two classes of unconventional people: those who make a business of being unconventional and then do what little they have time to do as a sort of avocation; and those who are so profoundly engrossed in some business that they have no time left to consider whether they are conventional or not. The first are the light-heads; the second are the geniuses.

Let us consider the second class first. These are the people who do the world's thinking and the world's work. The rest of us—the conventional herd—people the world, sow and reap, and die. The geniuses study out how we should do these things, tell us and are crucified for their pains and then, after they are dead, we glorify them and try to follow their advice. We, with our common sense, try our hands at everything and do nothing well and create nothing new. They, with their uncommon sense, pursue one purpose relentlessly, ruthlessly, chase Truth to its lair and bind it and lead it forth to be seen of all men for all time.

Now that kind of concentrated effort must not be disturbed by trifling things. You will find, generally speaking, that true geniuses are as much simply out of date as they are rudely unconventional. They realize the folly of wasting time in deciding the cut of their clothes, the cut of their hair, the number of meals they shall eat, the number of wives they shall have, and so they eagerly accept the conventions of the time in order to save themselves the trouble of figuring out these things. But conventions change. The genius, busy at his absorbing task, cannot be watching the fashions in dress and in morals, and so he keeps right on with the fashion he began with, and the public soon finds him old-fashioned. He may, if customs change fast enough, soon be so old fashioned that everybody has forgotten the styles of dress and morals in vogue in his youth, and then they say that he is perversely unconventional.

Ah, you say, that argument does very well for his clothes, but not at all for his morals. Very well, I have another argument about his morals. Understand, I don't undertake to justify his morals, only to explain them. That explanation is this: the man who gives all his thought to one object forms the habit of refusing to use either much reason or much will power upon any other subject; he needs all his mental force to solve his problem and all his moral force to hold himself to his labor. You must freely admit that reason is necessary to understand the canons of morality, and that great will power is necessary to withstand the natural inclinations. The genius considers his work the one important thing; everything else is unimportant and unimportant to the same degree. He does not hesitate to eat when he

(Concluded on Page 831)

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

From That to This

In the jungle depths that were darkly grim
He skulked as he sought his prey,
And the wolf and the cave-bear fought with him.

Who scarcely was better than they.
In a deep-hid den of a rocky glen
Was his home that was void of cheer,
And over them all was Nature's scrawl.
And the word that she wrote was, "Fear!"

There was never a haunt that he did not note,
For there he had sought his prize,
While Terror clutched at his scrawny throat.
The Terror that never dies;
And his skin-clad mate in their cave did wait
His coming with bated breath,
Till they munched their bones on the cold,
gray stones,
While the Thing outside was—Death.

Oh, the world whirls on, and the world whirls round,
And the cave-man is no more,
And Madam today is Paris-gowned,
Forgotten the skins she wore.
Lo, the waters and earth are his from birth,
And e'en with the gods he vies,
For he spans the land that his might has spanned.
Look out, and look up, for—he flies!

From that unto this! From the man who skulked
To him who has gained the skies!
From the creature who gibbered and mouthed and sulked
To him who with angels vies!
Oh, man, the mite, and man whose sight
Pierces mists of a world awry,
Be there room for thee o'er the heights we see,
For nature is conquered—you fly!

* * *

Bullion at the Gate

After considerable effort Saint Peter succeeded in locating the soul which was tapping at the gate.

"You are from the earth?" he said.

"I am," the soul replied.

"Your name is—?"

"Bullion, P. Q."

"What do you know of science, as men teach it?"

"I was right up on the science of money-getting, but—"

"Exactly. Did you pay much attention to art?"

"Only indirectly. My wife was devoted to it."

"Literature; the great and good thoughts of the master-minds of all times—did you devote much time to it?"

"Well, not exactly, but my wife was fond of good reading."

"The poor and the needy who were your brothers and sisters, did you aid and comfort them often?"

"You see, I didn't have time, but my wife was almost ceaseless in her attentions to such rabble."

"That will do," said Saint Peter. "I now will make out a pass," and accordingly he proceeded to do so. After he had ceased writing there was silence for some time, and then the soul of P. Q. Bullion said:

"Well, why don't you hand me the pass and let me go in?"

"You are mistaken," Saint Peter firmly replied, "the pass is for your wife, but, if you like, you may stay here long enough to see her enter the narrow gate before you go down stairs."

But, being in a rage, the soul of P. Q. Bullion did not wait, and it is reported that it now is endeavoring to organize a brimstone combine in the cellar.

The Opinions of Rufus

We all admit that "never put off till tomorrow what you can do today" is a maxim that ought to be heeded—by our neighbors.

Seems to me that the next great invention that's reely needed is something to persuade hens to lay when eggs are sixty cents a dozen.

Es somebody said, women's work is never done, but I've seen them on the street when it didn't seem to be pressin' 'em very much.

The more I know 'bout men, the more I can't help wonderin' where I'll break out next.

It's said that men an' women never know each other, but I don't s'pose anybody could tell how much pain the fact spares them.

I don't b'lieve faith without works is dead; my notion is it wan't ever reely born.

Good poetry's beautiful, but the longer I live the more I realize that you can't inoculate the head of a cabbage with much idee of it.

I said, "I s'pose nacher has some use fer a skunk or it wouldn't be alive," but Josh Bings said I hadn't ought to drag the San Francisco Evenin' Post into polite conversashun, an' so I didn't say any more.

The saddest thing 'bout the courtships of some girls I've known is the fact that they finally married him; an' it's also true contrariwise.

Money don't make the mare go any longer; it makes the automobile honk.

Jedgin' by how some movin' pictures look, I can't help feelin' that when Edison gits them to talkin' the audience is goin' to feel mighty mortified.

Jest to show how liberal I am, I want to say that I b'lieve a woman could wear a reel hobble skirt an' yet go to Heaven; but what's the use of temptin' the Recordin' Angel in that way?

The diff'rence 'tween Macarthur an' Kahn is that if Kahn had been defeated there would have been nothin' left, while, with Macarthur defeated, there's a man left.

* * *

A Popular Attitude

Hear that the angels keep watch and ward
Over us folks below;

Hear that the books they keep record
The curious ways we go;

And so I pray, as you do, I guess,
A kind of a doubtful plea:

"Look on my actions to kindly bless,
But don't keep cases on me."

Know a feller that's sinful, quite,
Betrayin' a carnal mind;
Keepin' his record would serve him right—
My case is a different kind.

For though I admit that I often grope
In style that's a shame to see,

And the angels know, yet I feel a hope
They won't keep cases on me.

Feller I know in sin would dwell
For love of the vile and low,

But I've been tempted each time I fell,
As the angels ought to know.

He is a sinner, but I'm misled—
A fact that I hope you see—

And so I am trusting the angels o'erhead
Will fail to keep cases on me.

* * *

Let Eligible Young Men Beware

Six young women of San Francisco have formed an anti-matrimonial association, and have solemnly vowed that they will never, never, NEVER—no, don't attempt to qualify it by a "hardly ever"—permit the matrimonial yoke to encircle their swan-like necks.

A word to the wise is sufficient, and we stop the press long enough merely to call the attention of eligible young men to the fact that when they see one of these young women coming the time will be ripe for them to shy over to the other side of the street. In some way these insidious attacks upon the sanctity of the bachelor circle must be headed off.

Man and House-Cleaning

Now that house-cleaning time again has come and I go home at night to find Eleanor a melancholy wreck in pinned-up skirts, the deep, pervading mystery of it once more impresses me. Why is it that man, with his keen, penetrating intellect, cannot understand the necessity of cleaning house?

Man harnesses the lightning, and his message is whisked about the earth almost as fast as thought could traverse its surface; he makes a machine of aluminum-ribbed gauze, and in the domain of the air he surpasses in flight the swiftest bird; he projects his puny voice into a microbe-infested tube, and his friend a thousand miles away hears that voice and responds through another tubular haunt of microbes. Viewing these and a thousand other wonders, sometimes it seems that there is nothing to which man may not attain—except understanding about house-cleaning.

I believe—in my heart of hearts I believe—that it must be necessary to take up the carpets and rugs and reverse their ends after beating them (and what have the poor things done to deserve such a beating?), but my masculine intellect gropes in the presence of the problem why it is necessary to do this thing. To be sure, our feminine guides, philosophers and friends get some dust out of the carpets, but what difference does that make when nobody could recognize that it was there? Then why move all the furniture and put it back just where it was, unless it is to make man feel that his life is gloom-haunted and in vain? Why move the trunks out of the closets and put them in the front hall, so that a man falls over them and employs words of bitterness when he comes home in the evening? These, and a thousand other questions will occur to any man, and they all lead to the direful conclusion that we cannot understand about house-cleaning.

However, let us admit one thing: House-cleaning is beneficial inasmuch as it either cultivates man's patience or drives him to drink, thus demonstrating his worth or unworth. To be sure, it is too apt to demonstrate unworth, but the exceptions glitter and are beautiful.

* * *

For Those With Immaterial Bodies

Concerning a recently issued book, "The Qualities of Men," of which Joseph Jastrow is the author, the Christian Science Monitor says:

"The author is professor of psychology in the University of Wisconsin, and the book deals with a material mind resident in a material body."

That is all the Monitor says, but the warning should be sufficient. Ghosts, spooks, hobgoblins, Christian Scientists and others who do not possess material bodies to harbor their minds, whether material or otherwise, must realize that the book can contain no information for them. Moreover, it might injure them by imparting to them the evil thought that they do possess material bodies. "A word to the wise is sufficient;" only persons who are so gross as to be alloyed by non-existent matter will pay any attention to Dr. Jastrow's book.

* * *

A Brief Primer Lesson

Do you see the man, Wil-lie?

Who is the man?

He is a San Fran-cis-can, Wil-lie

Does the man hold a hand-ker-chief to his nose?

You may bet your taw al-ley he does, Wil-lie!

Is the man sick, Wil-lie?

Yes, he is very sick.

Do you know what ails the man, Wil-lie?

Now smell, Wil-lie, and you can guess. The man has caught one whiff of the hon-or-a-ble bunch that will rep-re-sent San Fran-cis-co in the leg-is-lat-ure.

Is it a wonder the man is not dead?

Yes, in-deed, it is a ve-ry great won-der. Wil-lie.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Old Order So Changed As Hardly to Know It

After the election in 1896 Chairman Frank McLaughlin removed the offices of the Republican state committee to Sacramento and there went into winter quarters the better to control legislation in the name of the Republican party, but in the interests of the Southern Pacific company and its allies. From that year until this year the organization of the Republican party in this state has been at the beck and nod of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company.

What a difference! On Wednesday of this week the Republican state executive committee arranged to be represented at Sacramento for the purpose of seeing to it that the platform pledges made to the people are honestly and squarely redeemed.

Of course the purpose is not to assume the function of legislating. The ultimate responsibility must be with governor and legislature, but what the executive committee and its friends can do to aid the legislature and governor in redeeming the pledges of the newer Republicanism (which, by the way, is not so essentially different from the newer Democracy) will be done. What a difference! See how far we have come since 1896, since a good deal later than that, too, for instance since the early spring of 1910!

Where The Watchman Had Another Guess Coming

During the last twelvemonth The Watchman more than once expressed the opinion that party platforms adopted after the primaries would never be heard of after, that they would prove wholly perfunctory proceedings devoid of influence, inasmuch as the candidates would have all been nominated before the adoption of the platform. No doubt candidates avowed fealty to the platforms of their parties with mental reservations inasmuch as they had themselves been their own platforms, but the meeting of the Republican state committee on Wednesday shows that a party platform, however made, may be taken seriously if a political party be managed by serious minded men. The Johnson administration seems likely to accept the party platform as obligatory and binding, not in a narrow sense in that nothing not written into the platform shall be written into the laws, but that what is written into the platform shall be written into the laws. This again shows upon what new times we have entered. It should also impress men in politics with the seriousness of platform making. Another significant feature of the policy of the present Republican management toward legislation was manifest when it was resolved to invite Democratic as well as Republican legislators to the next conference to be held for receiving the reports of the committees on legislation. Party is not to be permitted to keep apart men who think alike, another manifestation of a liberal spirit large with promise for good legislation. An elemental principle of sound political strategy is: Don't let the devil divide the forces of right.

A Pardonable Pride In The Party's Finances

The new order of things was again splendidly illustrated by the report of Party Treasurer Adolph Uhl. The total receipts of the committee for the campaign were $48,332.13, and the total expenditures $48,322.98, leaving a balance in the treasury of $9.15. And not a dollar of it all was either obtained or expended illegitimately. That is, not a man was hired to do the thing that an honest citizen should not do, and not a dollar was accepted that was suspected of being given with the implication that the donor would be remembered by the victors when the distribution of patronage came or that interests were to be protected against adverse legislation. When some representative of the old order courteously suggested that he would be pleased to contribute to the campaign fund, as in former years, if he could have the customary assurances that his interests would be treated fairly, he was plainly told that there was no connection between the conduct of the campaign and the conduct of the administration. In fact, Chairman Lissner went so far as to give public notice that he will make no recommendations to Governor Johnson as to whom he should or should not appoint to office. This also is a breaking away from the old order which tied up our present governor for two years so that he had virtually no patronage that was not under mortgage to the powers that made him governor. Governor Johnson will go into office owing no man anything save good will. Verily, things political are about as they should be in this year of Our Lord.

To Lend a Helping Hand Rather Than to Direct

It should be understood that the efforts to be made by the Republican state executive committee, and its sub-committees, to prepare legislation and follow it to its consummation are to be helpful and not dominating. The people of the state have elected a governor, a lieutenant governor and a legislature, and the final responsibility for legislation rests with them and not with the state executive committee of the Republican party, but the governor, lieutenant governor and legislature will come together new to most of the business in hand, nearly swamped by its volume, and if preparatory work can be done, and expert opinion can be had, on the measures they will be of great value. The Commonwealth Club will do exactly the same kind of work with almost equal warrant for doing it, although the principle of party responsibility will give the Republican committee a sanction that no other organization will quite have.

One of the weaknesses of our form of government has been that there has not been any responsible source from which legislation could emanate, as there is in the government of England, for instance, and one of the best things that President Taft did was to have measures prepared frankly as administration measures. Also one of the worst things he did was to insist that his bills should become laws as they were drawn by his associates and proceed to read out of the party those who dared to propose amendments thereto. That is a danger, but it is better to assume that risk than to take the other risk of having all legislation prepared by special interests for their own benefit. The hope is that the committees constituted Wednesday will do their work so well that Governor Johnson will see his way clear to make their measures administration measures with the weight of the Republican party supporting him and them.

Conservation To the Front

It is in the air that the absorbing issue in the coming legislature is going to be the conservation of the resources of California, which will include the regulation of the use of the state's waters for power production and transmission. If there be anything in the doctrine of state control it must come through a state control that is adequate to protect the public interest. An effort will be made to evolve a system of state control that will be a model for other states, not a system of control that does not control, but merely seeks to deprive the national government of control while leaving the exploiters in control. Great things are to be anticipated from this movement and the importance of it evidently suggested itself to the mind of Chairman Lissner of the Republican state committee in that he headed the committee on conservation with former Governor George C. Pardee and added to it Francis J. Heney, Chester H. Rowell, William Kent, S. C. Graham, Marshall Black, W. C. Clark, L. L. Dennett, Harold T. Power, Ralph Bull.

Important work is ahead for this committee and for the legislature that will take up the work where this committee lets go of it—if it does let go of it, for, be it understood, there will be power grabbers represented at the legislature by men who will not cease to follow the measures they are interested in step by step from their introduction to their being enrolled, signed by the governor and receipted for by the secretary of state. If the committee be less vigilant than the power interests the legislation may prove less satisfactory than the platform of the party contemplates.

Railroad Commission

The Republican party pledged itself to, "Such additional legislation or constitutional amendments as may be necessary to make the State Railroad Commission fully effective," etc. The committee appointed by Chairman Lissner to take this subject in hand, including, besides platform pledges, the prohibition of free passes, is composed of John W. Stetson, Oakland, chairman, who had charge in the senate of real reform railroad legislation at the last session; John M. Eshleman, Harvey D. Loveland and Alexander Gordon, railroad commissioners-elect; William R. Wheeler, manager of the Traffic Bureau of the San Francisco Merchants Exchange, and E. P. Gregson, who occupies a similar position at Los Angeles; Assemblyman P. F. Cogswell representing the sixty-eighth district. It is hard to see how that committee could be improved. If it does nothing else it can at least take the few good features out of the Wright bill, which was enacted into law at the last session of the legislature because it was the wrong bill, add them to the rejected Webb bill and enact the latter in place of the present law. That will do much.

The Politics Of Reapportionment

The taking of the new census will make it obligatory upon the new legislature to reconstruct all the congressional and legislative districts of the state as soon as congress determines the number of representatives the state is to have. This is where a good deal of small partisan politics is not unlikely to be done to the discredit of the party that does it. There is nothing that people generally like quite so well as fair play, of which the gerrymander is the negation. The committee which is to have this in charge is composed of State Senator N. W. Thompson of Los Angeles, a clear headed and conscientious man, chairman; Senator John W. Stetson of Oakland, Senator A. E. Boynton, Oroville, Assemblyman E. C. Hinkle of San Diego, E. A. Dickson, Los Angeles; Assemblyman W. F. Chandler, Fresno; Assemblyman W. R. Flint, San Benito; J. O. Hayes, San Jose; Ralph Hathorn, San Francisco. There are one or two men on that committee who might wish to seek party advantage in the reapportionment, but an overwhelming majority will stand for the square deal in redistricting the state, and it is to be hoped that they will be instrumental in keeping the legislature from doing small politics to the exasperation of communities that wish to be together. Mischief can be done both ways.

Reform of the Election Laws

It is fondly to be hoped that the American people may some time learn exactly how, mechanically, to take the votes of the people and have those votes counted, but it is exactly 250 years since the pioneers of the Mayflower got their traps together under the shelter of the oaks and elms of Massachusetts and took a vote on who should be boss and we haven't hit the right idea yet. The committee having the reform of our election laws in charge is a good one and is composed, and its duties are outlined, as follows: Including restoration of Australian ballot, non-partisan judiciary, short ballot, simplification of direct primary law generally and providing for state-wide advisory vote on United States senators, publicity of campaign expenses, regulation of lobbyists: Senator A. E. Boynton, Oroville; Senator Miguel Estudillo, Riverside; Senator George S. Walker, San Jose; Clinton White, Sacramento;

POLITICAL TABLE TALK---Continued

Thomas E. Haven, San Francisco; Prof. William Cary Jones, Berkeley; Judge N. P. Conrey, Los Angeles; Assemblyman C. C. Young, Berkeley; Marshall Stimson, Los Angeles; Paul Bancroft, San Francisco.

City, County Government Including constitutional amendment No. 1, general act for commission plan of government for cities, the fee system, county home rule, uniform accounting and improved business methods: State Controller A. B. Nye, Sacramento, chairman; Attorney-General U. S. Webb, Sacramento; Senator-elect Leslie R. Hewitt, Los Angeles; Guy C. Earl, Oakland; Assemblyman L. D. Bohnett, Santa Clara; Frank Devlin, Vallejo; Prof. R. L. Green, Stanford university.

No committee appointed by Chairman Lissner will have harder work in hand than this one. The satisfactory adjustment of the state's finances to amendment number one, lately adopted, will not be easy, and if we are to inaugurate a system of county home rule instead of county government logrolling by and through county legislative delegations and court-house crowds, that also will require effort. The committee is able and will no doubt have a beginning made, if nothing more, by the time the legislature meets.

Civil Service Merit System Here is a subject that is practically new to the politics of California. Heretofore we have had the spoils-of-office system undefined. It is not a good system. It furnishes the boss with his stock in trade and reduces politics to a merchandizing basis. This is not saying that the thing to do is to abolish that system merely to install in its place an immovable office-holding class, which finally comes to be, what the bureaucracy of Russia is, the most unprogressive and tyrannical government on earth, full of dead wood, bourbonistic to the marrow of its bones. Between this Scylla and that Charybdis this committee must steer and it is not going to be easy. Joy to it! Its personnel is: Senator L. H. Roseberry, of Santa Barbara, chairman; Assemblyman H. S. Benedict of Los Angeles, Dr. F. B. Kellogg of Los Angeles, who has given the subject much study; E. F. Adams, president of the Commonwealth Club, San Francisco; William A. Spalding, Los Angeles. It is a good committee.

On Direct Legislation Away down deep at the bottom-most bottom of things political and civic the point of division into the two main political divisions is that one side has faith in the power of the American people to govern themselves while the other side distrusts the intelligence, the honesty and the capacity of the people for government and feels that its own class can govern the people better than the people can do it. And it wants the job. Mr. Barnes of New York lately expressed the class distrust of government admirably when he declared, at Saratoga, that, "The people already have about all that is coming to them." The contrary opinion is that the people should have all the instruments of government in their hands that they will use whenever they wish to use them. That line of division will manifest itself in the coming legislature and the committee having the above subject in hand for preparatory legislation is composed of Senator-elect Lee C. Gates of Los Angeles, chairman; Dr. John H. Haynes, also of Los Angeles, who has made the subject a close study and has just returned from Switzerland, where he studied direct legislation in its native habitat; Judge John D. Works, Assemblyman W. C. Clark of Oakland, who helped to draft the new charter; Milton T. U'Ren of the Direct Legislation League and Councilman A. H. Elliot, of Oakland. Next to conservation the issues raised by this committee are likely to be productive of the hardest fighting.

Public Service Commissioners That our public service corporations are prime producers of rascality, of which more is elsewhere expressed editorially, has become generally accepted. Something must be done to mitigate that evil. What is to be determined by a committee consisting of Percy V. Long, San Francisco, chairman; Senator-elect Leslie R. Hewitt, Los Angeles; W. R. Davis, Oakland; Charles S. Wheeler, San Francisco; Assemblyman C. C. Young, Berkeley. It is a big subject, but the committee having it in hand is composed of men of exceptionable calibre and we may look to it with confidence for the preparation of thoroughly good measures.

Employers' Liability And Injunction Acts Here again is a big subject with some good, strong men, in charge of it. Harris Weinstock, who has gone around the world studying the subject, is chairman and a better selection could not have been made. With him are Senator E. K. Strobbridge, Assemblyman A. H. Hewitt, Judge Frank Devlin, A. A. deLigne, J. W. Wiley, code commissioner; Will J. French, editor of The Clarion, a labor paper published in San Francisco. Notwithstanding his Democratic affiliations The Watchman would like to see Walter Macarthur added to that committee. He is clear headed and sane and knows a lot about the subject.

Revision of Criminal Laws and Procedures This is another most important committee with some strong men on it to take charge of the work. Big criminals go through our system of apprehending and convicting of crime as a raging bull might go through a rabbit fence, and if some way is not found for stopping them our civilization must be written down a failure. The committee having this in charge is composed of: W. J. Hunsaker, Los Angeles; Curtis H. Lindley, San Francisco; Senator Charles P. Cutten, Eureka; Attorney-General U. S. Webb, Sacramento; Assemblyman William Kehoe, Humboldt; District Attorney W. H. Donohue, Oakland; Justice M. C. Sloss, San Francisco; William Denman, San Francisco.

Reformatory For First Offenders The prison system of California has been a disgrace to the state and is yet. The whole thing needs to be remodeled, co-ordinated and simplified all the way from the reform schools to a prison for hardened criminals permanently sequestered from society for the protection of society. All boards should be abolished and the whole subject put into the hands of a Department of Penalization and Reformation, and this committee should co-operate with the one on revision of the criminal laws. The personnel of the committee is made up as follows: Judge Curtis D. Wilbur, Los Angeles; Charles M. Belshaw, Antioch; Assemblyman-elect H. W. Brown, San Mateo; Assemblyman W. F. Chandler, Fresno; E. A. Walcott, San Francisco; Albert Bonnheim, Sacramento; Judge Everett Brown, Oakland; James M. Oliver, Oakland; A. J. Pillsbury, Piedmont.

Votes for The Women This is an issue not so difficult to down occasionally, when all the iniquities arouse themselves to down it, but it is one that will not stay down no matter how often it is downed, and for the reason that there is no sense in making suffrage solely a question of sex. The Republican party stands pledged to submit a woman suffrage amendment to the people to be voted on and the redemption of this pledge has been entrusted by the Republican state committee to gentlemen named below, all of them strong men and not unlikely to be favorable to giving the franchise to women. There will be no dull times at Sacramento until this issue is disposed of. That Washington has gone for a suffrage amendment is going to stimulate courage in the breasts of the suffragettes of California and make them busy as bees: Senator Charles W. Bell, Pasadena; Senator E. A. Birdsall, Placer; Senator-elect Lee C. Gates, Los Angeles; J. H. Braly, Pasadena; Assemblyman H. G. Cattell, Pasadena; Assemblyman-elect W. A. Lamb, Los Angeles; A. S. Ormsby, Walnut Creek.

The National View Of Congressional Duty Among the pleasant incidents of the Republican conference held at the St. Francis Hotel Tuesday was a little address by Representative-elect W. D. Stephens of Los Angeles. After expressing his willingness to serve the people of his district, and of California, in any way he could to the extent of his abilities, he said, with deepest sincerity, "Don't ask me to do or stand for anything that I may not with entire good faith toward our common country, for that I cannot and will not do." Representative-elect William Kent took the same ground before his constituents and it begins to look as though California is to send to congress some broad gauged, real statesmen, men who can see over the rims of their respective districts and understand that we are a nation and not merely states in a nation or districts in a state. Of course each representative will do what he can to advance the interests of his district, but this he must do, if he be a real patriot, only when he can do it for the common good of his country. The paramount good is the common good.

Next Legislature Strongly Republican The next legislature will be overwhelmingly Republican. The Republicans will have 31 senators against 9 for the Democrats, and 68 assemblymen against 12 for the Democrats. But the question of attitude toward progressive reforms is infinitely more important than the question of party labels. In their platforms both Democrats and Republicans are pledged to progressive reforms, and to practically the same reforms. But experience has shown that neither platforms nor party labels figure much when test votes are taken on reform measures. What counts then is the character of the legislator and the influence that put him in office. The Watchman has, therefore, made a careful analysis of the next legislature, man by man, by means of records and reputations, and the result of that analysis is shown in the tables below. The test applied in each case was the legislator's probable attitude toward reform measures. Of course the tables are not absolute, but they are as near to an absolute poll as they can be made with the information at hand. Where a man's attitude was either unknown or very uncertain he was included in the "unknown" list.

Senate		Rep.	Dem.	Total
For Reform:
Holdover	9	2	11
Incumbents Re-elected	3	4	7
New Members	5	2	7—25
Against Reform:
Holdover	8	1	9
Incumbents Re-elected	2	0	2
New Members	4	0	4—15
	31	9	40
Assembly		Rep.	Dem.	Total
For Reform:
Incumbents Re-elected	13	4	17
New Members	15	1	16—33
Against Reform:
Incumbents Re-elected	6	0	6
New Members	13	1	14—20
Doubtful:
New Members	2	2	4—4
Unknown:
New Members	19	4	23—23
	68	12	80 80

A Pro-Reform Legislature These figures are encouraging. The senate figures are almost certainly correct, as the attitude of every man is practically assured. The assembly figures are probably accurate as far as they go, but 23 men, of a total of 80, are unknown quantities. The tables show a reform majority of 10 in the senate. In the assembly, if half of the "doubtful" and "unknown" members be allotted to the reform column, there will be a reform majority of six or seven. As the ratio of reformers to anti-reformers, among the known members, is about as 3 to 2, the above estimate of a reform majority is probably conservative.

Members of The Senate will be composed of the following men, the figures preceding their names indicating the senatorial district which they represent: Holdover Republicans: 1. Charles P. Cutten, 3. E. S. Birdsall, 5. Benj. F. Rush, 7. Charles B. Bills, 9. E. B. Martinelli, 11. John T. Lewis, 13. Ed. K. Strobridge, 15. John W. Stetson, 17. Thos. F. Finn (and Union Labor), 19. Richard J. Welch (and U. L.), 21. Edward I. Wolfe (and U. L.), 25. Lester G. Burnett, 27. Geo. S. Walker, 33. L. H. Roseberry, 35. N. W. Thompson, 37. H. M. Hurd, 39. M. Estudillo; Holdover Democrats: 23. John P. Hare (and U. L.), 29. James B. Holohan, 31. A. E. Campbell; Newly Elected Republicans: 6. A. E. Boynton (incumbent), 14. George J. Hans, 16. Edward J. Tyrrell, 18. Daniel P. Regan, 20. E. F. Bryant, 22. John J. Cassidy, 24. D. J. Beban (incumbent), 28. Marshall Black (incumbent), 30. John L. Avey, 32. E. O. Larkins, 34. Lee C. Gates, 36. Charles W. Bell (incumbent), 38. Leslie R. Hewitt, 40. Leroy A. Wright (incumbent); Newly Elected Democrats: 2. T. W. H. Shanahan, 4. J. B. Sanford (incumbent), 8. Louis W. Juilliard, 10. A. Caminetti (incumbent), 12. J. B. Curtin (incumbent), 26. G. W. Cartwright (incumbent).

Membership of The Assembly will be composed of the following: Republicans: 2. William Kehoe (incumbent), 3. Gustavus A. Jasper, 4. James H. Tibbitts, 6. W. D. L. Held, 8. Arthur H. Hewitt (and Democrat, incumbent), 9. Frank M. Rutherford (and Democrat, incumbent), 10. Edwin C. Gaylord, 11. Ferdinand G. Stevenot, 12. J. L. Mendenhall (and Democrat, incumbent), 13. James W. Hamilton, 15. W. B. Griffiths (incumbent), 17. Charles A. Bliss, 18. John C. March, 19. Edward J. Lynch, 20. John R. Cronin (incumbent), 21. George H. Harlan, 22. M. R. Jones, 23. E. H. McGowen, 27. G. W. Wyllie (incumbent), 28. Andrew Cunningham, 29. Daniel Rimlinger, 30. J. E. Mullally, 31. W. A. McDonald, 32. Wm. T. Kennedy, 33. James J. Ryan, 34. Thos. J. Feeley, 35. Fred C. Gerdes (incumbent), 36. Henry N. Beatty (incumbent), 38. E. J. D. Nolan, 40. Milton L. Schmitt (incumbent), 41. N. C. Coghlan (incumbent), 42. Arthur Joel, 43. Frank N. Rodgers, 44. Victor A. Sbragia, 45. D. M. Denegri, 46. A. A. Rogers, 47. Sumner Crosby, 48. Robt. J. Callaghan, 49. Geo. Fitzgerald, 50. Wm. C. Clark, 51. Frank M. Smith, 52. C. C. Young, 53. H. W. Brown, 55. Robt. L. Telfer (incumbent), 56. L. D. Bohnett (incumbent), 57. Daniel R. Hayes (incumbent), 58. Wm. R. Flint (incumbent), 59. Charles B. Rosendale, 60. W. F. Chandler, 61. W. A. Sutherland, 62. Frank J. Walker, 63. John F. Beckett, 64. C. L. Preisker, 65. D. W. Mott, 67. H. G. Cattell (incumbent), 68. Prescott F. Cogswell (incumbent), 69. Wm. E. Hinshaw, 70. Edwin M. Butler, 71. Lyman Farwell, 72. H. S. Benedict, 73. Henry H. Lyon, 74. Charles H. Randall, 75. Wm. A. Lamb, 76. C. G. H. Bennink, 77. Clyde Bishop, 78. Geo. R. Freeman, 79. E. C. Hinkle (incumbent), 80. Fred H. Judson; Democrats: 1. H. B. Ream, 5. Harry Polsley (incumbent), 7. John H. Guill Jr., 14. H. W. Slater, 16. L. H. Wilson, 24. J. W. Stuckenbruck (incumbent), 25. Thos. F. Griffin, 26. John C. Davis, 37. Ed P. Walsh, 39. Walter T. Lyon, 54. John B. Maher (incumbent), 66. Fred H. Hall.

Nevada's Progressive Governor-Elect Oddie has just elected a governor upon much the same issues and after much the same kind of a spectacular fight as California's election of Hiram Johnson. In a state nearly always Democratic, Tasker L. Oddie has just been elected governor of Nevada on the Republican ticket. Practically every other member of the state government will be a Democrat. Oddie made his fight on the issue of emancipation from Southern Pacific political control, and on a progressive reform platform. His proposal to give the state a government by and for the people only met with a response which would equal, in a state of California's population, to an overturn of 70,000 votes from the opposition to himself. Governor-elect Oddie has already arranged with Governor-elect Johnson for a constant interchange of ideas and policies, so that each may have the benefit of the experience of the other and that, so far as their interests are mutual, California and Nevada may work in harmony. Oddie is one of the founders of Tonopah, and has had a remarkable career. After making and losing a large fortune, he has made a campaign for governor single-handed against a Democratic majority, traveling 8,000 miles by automobile in his speaking trips, and running his own machine.

City Charter Amendments The special election for amendments to the charter of San Francisco was held last Tuesday and brought out a vote of 45,388, a record for such elections. The large vote was due to the popular interest in the Panama exposition bonds, but just as noteworthy as the size of the vote was the discrimination generally shown by the people, considering the large number of amendments and the intricate technical character of some of them. A striking example of this discrimination was shown by the decisive defeat of a series of unnecessary salary raising amendments, while of two other amendments, almost identical in wording and effect with these, but necessary because of conditions, one was carried by 2,900 majority and the other was defeated by the narrow margin of 513 votes.

The public decision on these 38 amendments coincided with the recommendations made by The Watchman last week in all but 7 cases. No. 5, making the Municipal Record the official newspaper of the city, was favored by The Watchman as a means of uprooting the city advertising graft, and was probably defeated by reason of the special activities of the beneficiaries of that graft. No. 16, establishing a free municipal employment bureau, was favored because it added to the powers of the city and seemed unobjectionable. Probably its defeat was due to the class feeling between labor and capital. No. 20, imposing stricter regulations on the grant of public utility franchises, was a good amendment, defeated probably by the activities of the United Railroads. No. 21, providing funds for playgrounds, was a vitally good amendment, and only combined ignorance and stupidity can account for its defeat. No. 24, taking the Civil Service Commission out of the mayor's control, was a good amendment which will undoubtedly become law later on. No. 36, increasing the office force of the assessor's office, was probably defeated merely because the necessity of such action was not generally understood. No. 38, fixing $3 a day as the minimum wages for laborers employed by the city, was opposed by The Watchman because of a conviction that such matters should be left to the time of employment for settlement. Union labor probably carried this amendment.

But, altogether, The Watchman is surprised and gratified at the result of the election. The people passed the fair bonds, defeated the effort to throw the public library into politics, defeated the attempt to lift the roof off the tax limit, enlarged the powers of the supervisors and the public in the regulation and acquisition of public utilities, improved the initiative and referendum and recall, provided for majority rule instead of plurality rule, restored the Australian ballot without party designations, made a step toward the short ballot, authorized the city to build tunnels and provided a rational method of defraying their cost, improved the laws governing street work, protected their parks, and defeated various pieces of special legislation that should have been defeated. On the whole, the people made an excellent showing in the matter of interest in the election, study of the amendments, and sound judgment in decision.

The answers to the circular letters sent out by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe just before her death inquiring the results of woman suffrage in Wyoming, Colorado, Utah and Idaho give 624 in favor and 62 opposed, with 49 in doubt. These letters were sent to ministers, Sunday school superintendents and editors. The Episcopal clergymen were more than two to one in favor; the Baptists, seven to one; the Congregationalists, eight to one, and the Presbyterians more than eleven to one. Of the Sunday school superintendents one was opposed, one in doubt, and all the rest favorable. Among the editors some were in doubt, none was against, with a proportion of those positively in favor of eight to one.

THE Bell Telephone keeps the traveler in touch with all the resources of civilization.

The Bell Sign becomes an old and tried friend.

He can order his dinner, explain his delay, summon relief in an emergency, or say the word forgotten in the hurry of starting. He can do this from almost any point on the road, because the Bell System has stretched out its lines to meet his unexpected needs.

The Bell Telephone not only furnishes neighborhood communication but gives Long Distance Service throughout the whole system.

THE PACIFIC TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO.

Every Bell Telephone is the Center of the System

STATE CONTROL OF POWER PLANTS

SUGGESTING THE FORMATION OF A CALIFORNIA STATE PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION

By F. M. RAY

Since the exciting days of '49, our Golden State of California has enjoyed a world-wide reputation of being a land where they "do something." To be sure, occasionally that reputation and notoriety has been somewhat tarnished by the acts of a few of our irresponsible citizens, but, as a whole, we are known as a great state, populated with an energetic, conservative and generous people.

In 1849 we were astonishing the world by our great placer gold output.

In the 60's and 70's our golden grain was a great factor in supplying the world's markets with foodstuffs. In the 70's and 80's, the California and Nevada deep gold mining excitement turned all eyes toward us and brought millions of wealth from the depths of the earth. In the 80's and 90's was the commencement of our raisin, wine and fruit industry, and while at the present time our agricultural development and our fruit output astonishes the world by its magnitude, yet as the miner of old says regarding our state, "The surface is only scratched," and the future agricultural possibilities are beyond the imagination of the most optimistic. During the last ten years, our oil development has added one more great industry to a land blessed with an abundance of natural advantages, as it furnishes us an almost unlimited supply for operating our railroads, steamers and gas plants, which, before the discovery, were operated by wood or by coal brought at high cost from a great distance.

Development of Hydro-Electric Power

In 1892 began the development of our hydro-electric power plants, and for several years California boasted of the longest distance power transmission lines, the largest single power units, the highest operating voltage, and the highest hydraulic pressure power development in the world. Today, in proportion to our population and the miles of territory covered, we have more hydro-electric power plants and horsepower of energy transmitted than any other state of the union.

As you all know, the Japanese stream, or current, produces peculiar climatic conditions on the Pacific Coast. During our winter or rainy season of from four to six months, intermittent rain storms fall extending over the largest portion of the state from the coast eastward for a distance of approximately 200 miles. These rains rejuvenate the parched surface soil, soak into the ground to great depths, and replenish in our great valleys the great subterranean reservoirs. The moisture laden clouds, on reaching the foothills and high peaks of the Sierras, precipitate their burden of moisture in the shape of a mantle of snow and ice, making another storehouse of life-giving water for the summer season use.

Wide Utility of Power

On account of the topography of the state, and her snow covered Sierras, the opportunity for development of hydro-electric power is very great, although the most easily developed power sites near to the larger centers of population have been taken, there are many more of great value which must be utilized as our population increases to develop our lands, our natural resources and our cities. As the foundation of most of our wealth is the soil, all energy spent in improving our lands and agricultural possibilities conduces to the growth, prosperity, and contentment of our people. As mentioned before, our agricultural possibilities are in their infancy. Late reports mention approximately 2,000,000 acres of irrigated or partially irrigated land in California, with 14,000,000 yet of valley land capable of irrigation, or at least improvement by means of water brought from the rivers by ditches or conduits or by water pumped from the rivers in the valleys, or from the subterranean reservoirs by means of electric power generated by the water power in the mountains.

Now, in speaking upon the subject, "How shall we manage the power plants of California," I wish to start with the firm foundation, that we, the people of the state, have the right to say what the power plants shall do, how they shall do it, and what price they shall exact for their service. You may now ask, "Why meddle with the power plants?" I reply promptly, "For the good of California." Our future depends more than many people suppose upon the power plants, their development, extension and continual and satisfactory operation.

If the public sees the necessity of legislation, it should originate legislation in its own behalf, and legislative enactments should not always bear the earmarks of the corporations, working for their more or less selfish ends and for the further fastening of themselves upon the opportunities of furnishing service to the people.

A State Public Service Commission

To properly manage our power plants, and by power plants I mean broadly all so called public service corporations, I suggest the State Public Service Commission. This is not new. It has been in existence partially in Massachusetts for nearly fifteen years with far reaching effect. In the state of New York, for four years, a commission with very great powers is furnishing excellent results to both the public and the corporations themselves. The state commission of Wisconsin, of two years existence, is working on most model lines. When I propose a commission of this character, I do so on this premise, that from this year on the people of this state expect, insist upon, and will have honest officers, faithful to the trust bestowed upon them, and that the day of corporation control of public officers has been driven into oblivion, and not even the ghost of our old octopus, or the head of any new one will dare to raise itself in sight of an enlightened, an enraged and determined public.

Right of State to Regulate

A public service commission must be given very broad powers in order to accomplish results. Some will argue against the right of the state to control private property. From the days of the Pilgrim Fathers till about fifty years ago, our people lived and our institutions existed under the theory that this was a free country, a land of liberty. Man was free to worship and have opinion in accord with the dictates of his own conscience, provided only that in so doing he did not wrong his neighbors, was permitted to do almost anything with his property, subject to certain rights of the state or nation regarding taxation, which was considered just and necessary for the support and continuance of the government. Property could not be taken from him, or prices established, or value assigned for it, except for taxation purposes, and except where in the case of lands needed for establishing roads, public works, or buildings, and in the case of crops and food supplies, needed for the support of the army in time of war, or for the sick and hungry in time of famine or pestilence. The establishing of the common carrier, and the construction of railroads, promulgated the fundamental principles that individual property ownership could not be maintained against the public welfare. The rebellion destroyed the property value of the human slave and much property created by the slave's labor due to the preponderance of the idea that this action was necessary for the public welfare.

Tendency Toward Monopoly

The law of supply and demand and the principle of competition in accord with the prevailing economic theory of the times have always been considered efficacious means to guarantee the public a supply of food commodities at reasonable values. With the advent of large cities and the great growth of individual enterprises, came associations, or corporations, which established water supply systems, gas systems, telephone systems and later, electric light, heat and power transmission systems, for the purpose of furnishing these commodities or services. The very nature of this service of necessity developed along monopolistic lines and with it established the doctrine that the public has an absolute interest in the use and control of every public utility in a public service. It is now an obsolete theory that individuals or corporations, in furnishing public service commodities, are not completely under public control in regard to price, character, and quality of service furnished. The English courts and our own courts, as late as 1860, rendered some very interesting decisions on this point. One court even decided that the vendor of gas and water could not be subjected to greater duties or liabilities than the vendors of other commodities are subjected to by the rules of law. In 1858, the courts of Wisconsin threw to the winds the previous English and United States decisions, and decided that, "When any business of general public concern is in its nature a virtual monopoly, it ceases to be private, and is subject to all laws regarding public enterprises." The Supreme Court of the United States, in the celebrated Granger case, Munn vs. Illinois, laid the foundation for all our existing regulatory means respecting common carriers, and from this somewhat meager decision has grown our "Interstate Commerce Commission, our various state railroad commissions, and last, but not least in importance to the commonwealth, in several states, our Public Service Commission."

Two Reasons For Regulation

A public service commission should exist for two important reasons. First, for the ultimate protection of the consumer, in guaranteeing good service, and equitable rates for service rendered. High rates are caused by over capitalization and avaricious owners, whose greed for wealth, no matter how acquired, is more predominant than their regard for justice and the public welfare. No sympathy should exist for the financial hog, who insists upon extorting more than he can possibly use, and who thoroughly masticates the financial apple till there is not even a core left for the public.

The second reason is for the protection of existing capital. The corporation must be protected from unwarranted competition and a fair rate guaranteed on its existing capital.

Capitalists, unless stricken with speculative fever, are coy and shy to invest in enterprises subject to the attack of the demagogue and agitator. Rates and regulations in most cities are made by inexperienced politicians, devoid of technical intelligence germane to the subject to be regulated. These men are often elected on political platforms or pre-election promises that the rates for gas, light, or water will be lowered. They act as ignorant, bigoted judges in a court which should be one of equity, not persecution, and attempt trial of the case with predetermined, prejudiced opinions.

Evils of Unwarranted Competition

Unwarranted competition causes as much evil as over-capitalization, as it is the initial cause of most over-capitalization. There is not a large city in the land that has not furnished one or more illustrations of the fact that competition in the service of public utility corporations has not been a guarantor of good service, or a regulator of rates. The absolute failure of competition to accomplish these results has cost the commonwealth of our various states untold millions of dollars in duplicate properties and investments upon which, when the period of consolidation comes, and with it the necessary "day of judgment," the people are forced to pay interest upon systems and properties which should never have been established. Generally speaking, public service corporations are no better or no worse than the public seem to want. It often appears as though the public want to be bilked. If an opposition company is instituted, the public support it, help it to flourish for a time until more capital is needed. Capital does not sally forth to be wasted, and once more it means a complete case of a survival of the fittest and higher rates, due to consolidation, and once more the death knell is sounded over the corpse of a competitor, which had the partial encouragement of the public by our patronage in its futile infantile struggle.

Examples of Bad Competition

Our own city illustrates this point fully. A wealthy man of firm determination and stubborn disposition, in a spirit of pique, smarting from what he considered a personal insult from the manager of our great gas and electric company, hastily decided to install a competing company. He knew all the time it was a sell-out game, and that he would get handsome returns on his money. He invested in this city $4,500,000, and sold out for approximately $6,500,000, and the public will have to pay for not only the duplicate mains, services, etc., but also for the unjust tribute representing his profit on an illegitimate business venture, which should never have been allowed to start.

Since 1890, to my personal knowledge, ten different companies, representing actual cash investments from $50,000 to over $4,000,000, have started to furnish light and power in San Francisco. They have never made money from operation, have always been failures from an honest dividend paying standpoint, but the owners have generally achieved financial success on the "sell out," much to the detriment of low rates for future generations, who must pay interest on capital invested in duplicate systems, which eventually lie idle and rust or rot.

Investment Must Be Encouraged

Our state now has three companies, which furnish hydro-electric and gas service to over 90 per cent of the population of the state, but even with this seeming monopoly, new capital is hard to enlist for extensions, unless on a promise of high returns, due to the constant menace of attack from public officers unfitted to regulate. The securities of public service corporations in Massachusetts, have stable values and are sought almost as much as municipal bonds on account of the protection afforded by the laws of the state.

The investor holds the key of the future of the state. Without his dollar we cannot expand, extend, or improve, no matter how great the needs of the country may be.

The high cost of living, the increased demand for food stuffs, the increased consumption over production call for development. This development must come by such changes in laws and methods as will define and make stable all existing rights as far as human agencies can accomplish the result and guarantee stability of future investment. The pulse of the public is erratic. At the present time the people seem to have a regular palsy of conservation, and seem to be inoculated with the virus of conservation and control of all public utilities and sources of their production. We must not go too far and take radical steps, must only so control and manage as to preserve for ourselves and unborn generations the greatest possible peace, health and happiness in the possession and operation of all public utilities. Every sensible, sober-minded man realizes that our action must not be erratic or spasmodic, but in order to change a condition of years of existence, requires careful thought and diligence in order not to develop and perpetrate a train of evils in the cure which causes as much pain as the disease itself. Ability and success in material development are often counteracted by a failure of legislation in protecting the result.

An awakened public spirit demands the development of the state's resources, demands better social and industrial conditions, and I fully believe that a public service commission will do more than any other agency to harmonize the combined interests of public, of capital, and of labor, so if you believe it is right, let all work together and have peace and accomplish a happy result.

"JOHNNY" POE, ORIGINAL

One would naturally expect originality from a member of the family that gave Edgar Allen Poe to the world, and those expectations were realized to the great joy of Princeton College when the Poe boys "made" the Tiger football team and for several seasons gave an exhibition of football ability that has never been equalled in the history of the game. The name Poe is still a synonym, wherever football is played in America, for genius of the first class.

But "Johnny" Poe, one of these stars, has developed other striking evidences of originality. After he left college he accepted an excellent position at sedentary work with a firm in Baltimore. He soon left it to accept a job as stevedore on Baltimore's waterfront at a great deal less pay. His employers liked Poe, but Poe did not like his "position"; the hardened muscles and fighting football spirit developed in college days cried aloud for the open air and hard work. He liked stevedoring not only because it gave his muscles play, but because it threw him with men who would fight. Poe loves to fight, likes nothing better.

When the gold excitement sprung up in Nevada, Poe hit the trail. He landed in Tonopah. He did not want an easy job nor the money that was to be had by such easy means as prospecting for gold or fleecing investors. He wanted work—hard work. He had an ambition to be the best "mucker" in Tonopah. In other words, he wanted the reputation of being the best man with a long-handled shovel in the whole camp. He achieved his ambition, and for three mortal years worked as a mucker, without the slightest desire to do anything else or to make more than his wages.

But he finally exhausted Tonopah's resources for his other pet amusement, that is, fighting. He read in the papers that a war had broken out between two Central American countries. He yearned to get in that fight, so pulled up stakes and went to San Francisco to sail for Latin America. But he could not decide which country he wanted to fight for. He finally settled the question in a characteristic way: he found that the fare to one country was $2.50 less than the fare to the other country. Poe chose the country that cost less to reach, and joined its army.

But the war petered out a few weeks after he got there, and Poe was left with no battles to fight. He returned to San Francisco, just in time for a gorgeous bit of excitement. The street car strike was on, with rifles against brickbats for arguments. Poe elected to go where he could get the most danger for his trouble, so became a strike breaker. This was more fun than Greaser petty wars. His enjoyment was complete when a strike sympathizer spit in his eye and gave Poe the opportunity to thrash him.

After the strike was over, war broke out between the same two Central American states. Poe hurried back, and just to vary the excitement, enlisted on the other side. His former comrades captured him, recognized him, charged him with being a spy, and gave him twenty-four hours to leave the isthmus.

Coming back to San Francisco after further wanderings, Poe decided to go to New York. He arranged to ship with a vessel sailing around the Horn. When he concluded his arrangements with the captain he added:

"But I have an awful lot of baggage. Can you take it too?"

"How many pieces have you?" asked the captain.

"Fifty-four," was Poe's reply.

"Fifty-four pieces of baggage! Of course I can't take all that."

After reflecting a moment, the captain asked:

"What is that baggage of yours?"

And Poe replied,

"A deck of cards and a pair of socks."

The captain took him

Miss Mildred Jones is the Republican candidate for superintendent of schools in Tulsa county, Oklahoma. So far the only argument advanced against Miss Jones is that she is too young and pretty for the office.

Paintings were not her specialty, but as she gazed at a beautiful copy of Millet's "Gleaners," her admiration of the work called forth enthusiastic comment. "What a wonderful picture!" she exclaimed. "And how natural it looks!" "But what are those people doing?" she inquired, as she bent nearer to read the title. "Oh, yes, I see, gleaners millet! How perfectly fascinating!"—Youth's Companion.

Missouri traveler: This is a famous section for feuds, I understand? Native: No more peaceful parts anywhere than right here. No feuds here. Everything's as pleasant as pie. "But how about the Billington-Wellington feud?" "Over long ago. I'm Billington." "Indeed! I haven't met any of the Wellingtons." "No, nor you won't. The feud is over."—New York Weekly.

HONOLULU

And the Volcano

THE TRIP MOST COMPELLING and worth while, excelling all others for grandeur, beauty and pleasure. And this splendid trip can be made in two weeks and a day by sailing on S. S. SIERRA (10,000 tons displacement). The Volcano of Kilauea, the largest in the world, is tremendously active just now, and a few quick dispatch trips have been arranged. Never before has it been possible to make this desirable trip with such speed and comfort, and the price is low, $110, first class, to Honolulu and back, and $41 for side trip from Honolulu to volcano, including rail and auto to Kilauea; hotel at Hilo, also Volcano House. No other trip compares with this. Be sure to visit the islands, and DO IT NOW, while the volcano is active. S. S. SIERRA sails Dec. 3, Dec. 24, Jan. 14, Feb. 4.

OCEANIC S. S. CO.
673 Market Street, San Francisco.

John O'Donnell D. E. Alexander ALEXANDER & O'DONNELL ATTORNEYS AT LAW

Tels.: Sunset Douglas 1538; Home J 1508
845 Pacific Bldg., Market and Fourth Sts.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD

The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed	$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital	300,000.00
Surplus	400,000.00
Profits	45,000.00

DIRECTORS—James D. Phelan, President; John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt, Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R. D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.

Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy. Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)
526 CALIFORNIA ST., San Francisco, Cal.

Guaranteed Capital	$ 1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash....	1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds....	1,555,093.05
Deposits June 30th, 1910.....	40,384,727.21
Total Assets	43,108,907.82

Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co's. Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President and Manager, George Tourny; Third Vice-President, J. W. Van Bergen; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, A. H. Muller; Assistant Secretaries, G. J. O. Folte and Wm. D. Newhouse; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, George Tourny, J. W. Van Bergen, Ign. Steinhart, I. N. Walter, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Streets. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Heyer, Manager.

WHILE Jed ate at the family table, as long as there was a family table, his father was otherwise put to small cost because of him after he was fourteen and, even before that, he had borne a good share of the cost of his own keep. At the conclusion of "that bad summer," and the almost equally reprehensible previous year or more, during which Jed replenished his own exchequer by levying upon the portable properties of persons who were not looking, Jed found more legitimate means of adding to his monetary stores than he had supposed possible.

He took the neighbor's cows to pasture on the prairie and brought them in at night, ransacked the immediate vicinity for wild grapes and plums, all marketable in a nearly fruitless country for jellies and preserves, did janitor work, ran errands and by hook and by crook got together enough of the little "shinplasters" of those days at least to buy his own boots for winter, and the stuff for his clothing, except for an overcoat, which he disdained, for if it was cold he ran, and who ever froze on the run? The old tortoise-shell clock that always stopped when the mercury ran below zero, thereby waking the household through its failure to tick, was Jed's safe-deposit bank. He knew to a five-cent certainty just how much he had on clock deposit and, despite the hard conditions of the family purse, Jed's hoardings were seldom "borrowed" on any pretext. What he had was his own, and he early learned the value of money through learning what, in effort, it cost to get it.

He grew to hate poverty with a determination equal to that with which his father had enured himself to endure it, and he early began to yearn for his "time" that he might do business on his own account and speedily grow rich. He looked about among the successful business men of York and not one among them all had more than a common school education. If they wanted land surveyed or stacks of hay measured they came to Jed's father to do it, but they could make ordinary computations of arithmetic, and so could Jed; they could figure interest to a cent, and had not Jed ciphered again and again nearly through Ray's arithmetic? If any of these men wanted to know anything that they did not know they either consulted an attorney or came to Jed's father, the only living cyclopedia of general information in town, to find out; but they were always prosperous, while Jed's father never had a hundred dollars ahead of present necessities. He seldom got his taxes paid without the added penalty for delinquency, and what others owed to him in little he owed to others in bulk and was eternally scratching to raise the interest.

Jed's father "went on" other people's notes and had to pay them, "chipped in" on every begging paper that went around, entertained at the family home any derelict that had no other place to go, never had a vacation from his work in all his life, except when he was ill in bed, and the pressure of necessities kept him slaving nights and Sundays as well as all through the week. As for Jed, he would do none of these things, no, not one. Yearning for his "time," which his father would not give, he nevertheless strove with feverish zeal to make money, with what success this chapter will undertake to show.

There was a little college hard by where Jed might have learned Greek and Latin, surveying and civil engineering, civil government and English, but not for Jed, his father sorrowfully protesting to the contrary notwithstanding. That there was no money in that Jed could plainly see. When his savings were big enough he bought a little, pot-bellied, churn-dash branded calf in town and led it out into the country and placed it with a farmer to be reared on shares. In the course of months and years he bought others and placed them out likewise until he had a hundred dollars' worth so placed and, in the vision of his mind, he saw a thousand hills dotted over with his lowing herds. The blackleg took some, some just naturally "gin out" betwixt the time when the farmers' cattle had eaten out through the hay roofs of the sheds under which they were sheltered, so that they could see the unob-

RECOLLECTIONS OF JED

HE RESOLVES TO BE RICH

BY

A. JUDSON

structed stars in their courses, and the time when the new grass would afford them a living. Some proved "rough" when marketing time came and, to cut a long and harrowing story as short as possible, when Jed retired from the cattle business and had paid the farmers their share in the decreased increase, he had just his original hundred dollars left.

Jed tried hogs. The Chester Whites were then the favorites and Jed bought two little sows pedigreed to high degree. They were nurselings, or should have been, but, like Jed himself, had been brought up mainly on a bottle and, also like Jed himself, were somewhat undersized in consequence, but Jed was assured that they would come out all right if he fed them enough. He tried faithfully, but there was not enough provender produced in three counties to keep those two pigs content. When not eating they were squealing at the tops of their voices to the vast discomfort of the entire neighborhood. It was said that Jed deserved to be prosecuted for cruelty to animals in that he did not feed those pigs, but he did. He gathered the swill from the kitchen doors all about the neighborhood as well as from that of his father's home, gave them milk, pulled weeds for them, bought corn and cooked it for them, scrubbed them lily-white, instead of Chester, kept the pen as clean as some folk's parlors, but, week by week and month by month, he saw his prospects of selling pedigreed Chester Whites by the hundred at fabulous prices, vanish into thin air. To his dying day he never knew what ailed those pigs that nothing grew about them except their appetites and their stomachs. He traded one of them for an old shotgun and sold the other for four dollars and a half and went out of the pig business.

A country chum of Jed's worked for a minister in town and went to school. The minister had a family carriage mare of good appearance and action and the mare had a colt. This school chum loved the colt and made a pet of it, but he was too poor to buy it, and, when Jed went out of the cattle business, this chum persuaded Jed to buy that colt with his hundred dollars. Its sire was the fastest horse in the county and the mare, this chum believed, was as fast as the horse, or would have been if she had been trained. Now the colt was faster than both of them, just naturally a goer. This chum had chased it all around the pasture on the back of its fast mother and could not make it break a trot. Take his word for it there was a fortune in that colt. The beauty of it was that the minister was so blind to the colt's possibilities that they had never entered his innocent head and, if they had, he would sooner have hamstrung that colt with his own hands than to have it develop racing tendencies and so fall into the hands of the fast horse fraternity. Jed and his school chum lay out half of one night in an empty wagon looking up at the stars and building air castles on the possibilities of throwing dust in the eyes of Rattler, Goldsmith Maid, and even Old Dexter, when Persimmon should be four years old. He was then a yearling. Jed's hundred dollars went for that colt, which the minister was loth to sell, because he wanted to keep him for a family carriage horse when the mare should have grown too old.

Jed bought a trotting bit, rigged up a bit

ting harness and went at that colt, long-legged and gawky, but full of good blood and good spirits and, driving him about the streets, he made a fine show as a yearling. Jed saw himself sitting humped up on a sulky with cap drawn over his eyes unmoved by the plaudits of the grandstand, although happy in the assurance of victory at the fair; even the very next year, with Persimmon only a two-year-old, he saw himself taking the purse away from both the "Spotted Colt" and "Old Reynold," the sire of Persimmon, these two having competed for the purse with varying fortunes year by year ever since county fairs came into vogue.

But Jed noticed that when Persimmon got up, after lying down for a nap, he sat on his haunches like a dog and rose to his feet with much difficulty. Jed said little but thought a good deal and worried much. He brought a lightning-rod-man down to the stable to look at the colt, thinking that he was the professional fast horse trainer then in town, but it was a case of mistaken identity. The lightning-rod-man knew no more about horses than Jed, but the latter was much reassured when told that it was just a little weakness across the loins that the colt would outgrow if Jed would turn him out in a pasture for the summer, which Jed did.

But the older Persimmon grew the worse his malady became. He dragged his toes and, no matter what any other colt in the pasture did to him in the way of provocation he could only hump himself as if to kick but could not get both hind feet off the ground at once. He was a beauty, carried his head high and looked every inch a horse, but he was a congenital cripple and Jed sold him on long time without interest, to a poor man who had one blind horse and wanted to make up a team of some sort to peddle with around the country. Eventually Jed got back for him half that he had paid the minister. One day, years after, Jed's father kicked the trotting bit out of some rubbish near the barn door and, holding it up, said: "Well, son, you can thank your fortunate stars that you passed through your fast horse malady as cheaply as you did. Many a man has been ruined for life by it whereas you have only lost a little money, a good deal of time and a trotting bit which I have found. Throw it into the scrap box."

Jed's father never relinquished the idea of getting onto a small farm where he could grow small fruits, keep a few cows and so pass his aging days beneath his own vine if not fig tree, for fig trees did not flourish in that climate. Consequently he bought twenty acres down in the Sandy bottom with a cabin on it. A span of colts had grown up and Jed was eager to start on the improvement of that farm. Little daunted by his failures to get rich with cattle, hogs and fast horses among numerous other enterprises, Jed saw in a corn crop on that twenty acres the nucleus of landownership and affluence. He was doing no good in town, had no notion of going to school after spring should open, and so his father helped him to fit out a team and undertake a corn crop. He backed with a neighbor claim-owner in the little shell of a cabin.

Now this twenty acres, with another forty or two, were little plowed oases in the midst of a vast cattle-covered wilderness of grassland and watery swamp. Jed first put up a smooth wire fence with posts every two rods and four wires, just to keep the cattle off the plowed ground while he was fixing it for the crop. The curiosity of the cattle was aroused and they came around to see what was doing, never in all their lives having seen a fence of wire. The old cows came up and, thrusting their heads through between the wires, lunched against it back and forth and their calves swung on the wire as children swing on a gate. The cattle of the Sandy bottom had great joy of that fence.

But it did not stop them, so Jed planted another post in between each two, and, when the cattle got so that they could get through the fence thus strengthened, and they did, Jed put slats on between the posts, and when this did not stop them, as it did not, Jed put on another wire, and then another, nailed on more slats and set more posts. The upshot of it all was that half a thousand cattle, theretofore docile, became so breachy that the only fence fashioned by the hand of man that would turn them was a stone wall five feet high that cost five dollars a rod to build. Their education was complete. It was freely declared by the neighboring farmers that Jed's one summer farming in the valley of the Sandy had cost the unoffending neighbor farmers fifty thousand dollars, and Jed's father was threatened with suits for damages if he did not take Jed away.

Just here Jed came near to both making a fortune and losing his own soul, a dual accomplishment not as rare as it should be. With malice aforethought he deliberately tried to invent barbed wire. First he thought of a sharpened wire that would cut the cattle in two when they lurched against it, then he resorted to barbs. With pliers and a broken piece of buggy spring with a hole in it Jed fitted on a few barbs, but the hand process was slow and he could not conceive of a machine that could be made to do so much twisting and crimping of the wire, so he abandoned the idea. At any rate he was not haunted to his grave with the consciousness of having inflicted that atrocity upon an irresponsible brute creation.

Butchers complained that there was no money to be made that year off hides taken from the cattle of Sandy Bottom, the hides were so eaten through by grubs. Stretched upon the fence to dry, the hides from that district looked as though they had been riddled with buckshot, but it was neither buckshot nor grubs that impaired the value of those hides. Jed knew, although he kept the information to himself, his relations with the neighboring farmers and cattle owners being sufficiently strained at the best, but Jed made those holes in those hides with a pitchfork while driving those cattle out of his corn.

Jed's team was young and fractious, and so was he. When he marked off his ground for the corn he lost his patience with the colts and jerked and yelled at them and they plunged and ran with the result that, it was confidently believed, if the rows of corn on that twenty acres could have been straightened out they would have extended across the Sandy itself and well over into the jurisdiction of the next county. When Jed got to plowing in his corn, and had penetrated three or four rods from the exterior boundary, he could not for the life of him tell which row he was in, but the corn grew, and so did his watermelons, and Jed would have been content if he could have kept the vagrant cattle out of his field. This required all of his time after the grass had lost its freshness and the corn was in the milk.

One day Jed first drove the cattle over into the valley of the Serpentine and then hurried to town for a new supply of provisions, intending to be back before the cattle, but the river was up, the big ferryboat had been swept down-stream and Jed had to picket his horse and cross in a skiff. Somebody rowed away with the skiff and Jed could not get back to his corn field until the next morning. Meantime 500 head of cattle had spent the night in Jed's corn field. They had made of it a wreck of bare stalks and trampled ears. But Jed had his revenge. It consisted in the fact that half a hundred of the most greedy of them, as a result of their over-bounteous feed, were lying along the margin next the fence, skintight with bloat and bellyache.

Nor had his watermelon patch escaped. A passing wagonload of revelers from a down-the-valley town, having first overloaded with prohibited bitters, paid Jed's cabin a visit, feasted to their fill on his melons and filled his well with what they could neither eat nor carry away.

Jed quit. The team was sold, the land was rented and Jed returned home at the end of the summer weighed down by the conviction that, being the son of his father, he was foredoomed to be a financial failure. It was ten years before he discovered, to his surprise and gratification, that he could, in truth, make a dollar and lay by at least a part of it.

Now there was in York a girl.

Burdening her with his misfortunes, which weighed upon the soul of Jed more heavily than the woes of Ulysses weighed upon that much suffering hero, Jed happened to say, "Now I ought to have went,—"

"Have went?" she repeated after him with elevated eyebrows.

"Well, what's the matter with 'have went'?" he demanded in return.

"Oh, nothing except that it sounds peculiar coming from a person who affects good breeding," was the cutting reply, given with a toss of a pretty head.

Jed blushed scarlet to the quick. He turned upon his heel, stammered a good evening and, feeling that his legs were changed into wooden timbers, he stilted away for a miserable hour alone in the woods to have it out with himself. "Confound her! Who is she to lord it over me?" exclaimed he as he strode along under the shadows of the elms and cottonwoods thoroughly angry, vowing that he would never speak to that girl again as long as he lived.

"Affects good breeding!" Was he therefore not well-bred, and only a scrub, "affecting" what he did not possess? He would leave that town and go where he would be respected. That's what he would do. But where would that be? Was there anywhere that an "affected" good breeding would serve the purpose of the real thing? Jed walked on and on, conjecturing, threatening, angry with the girl he thought far the nicest in York, and so rounded up at home by bed-time thoroughly tired and thoroughly discouraged. His father was sitting alone on the stoop. Jed sprawled on the steps at his feet.

"Well, son, what are you going to do next?"

"I don't know. I reckon I ought to have went to school instead of trying to make money."

"Have went?"

"Well, what's the matter with 'have went'?"

"Did you ever hear me say 'have went'?"

"I don't know, I never noticed. What's the matter with 'have went' anyhow? That's the second time it has been thrown up to me today?"

"Yes, who did it before?"

"Helen."

"And what did Helen say?"

"Said that it sounded peculiar coming from one who 'affects' good breeding."

"I quite agree with her," returned Jed's father.

"And do I 'affect' good breeding?"

"Well, as long as you have asked the question yourself, I'll answer you," said Jed's father. "You have lately been assuming the airs of young manhood and talking learnedly of things about which you know only the merest hearsay, using ungrammatical language and cutting a not very attractive figure. Your associates, for the last two or three years have smacked of horse and hog, you have read little or nothing, your education is elementary and you have come to the point where you must soon make choice whether you will be a man of intelligence or a common teamster, it would seem, to whom the world of literature, of art, of science and of public affairs will be as though it did not exist. You have given me great pain, but I have not dared to insist on a wiser policy lest you run away again and I lose my hold on you altogether. If now Helen has mortified you so that you can see yourself as the rest of us see you, a raw, untrained, self-willed young man who has good stuff in him, if he will only have the sense to use it, the incident may prove your salvation. I shall feel like thanking the young lady from the bottom of my heart the next time I see her. Being educated, as she is, she is not for such as you, I can tell you. But there is that little college still up there on the hill. With a little brushing up you could, I think, enter the preparatory department when the term opens. With your developed experience outside you will learn much faster than when you quit the grammar school and you will understand better what you learn. With what you have saved out of your latest financial wreck and what you can earn in vacation helping me in the office between times, I think we can make shift to send you, anyhow the coming year. Think it over. Good night."

Jed thought it over half the night, finally going to sleep on the resolution that he would "brush up" and go to the little college on the hill.

The next day, while busy with his old school books trying to find where he left off, and where the lowest class in the college started in, Helen ran in, of course, to see one of Jed's sisters. Sister happened not to be at home but Helen came in anyhow just for a minute.

"I'm sorry, Jed," she said, "if I hurt your feelings yesterday."

"I'm not."

"Why?"

"Because you and Dad made me see myself for the ass I am, and I'm going to college if there's any place where I can get in."

"Oh, goody, goody!" Helen cried, clapping Jed on the shoulder and shaking him hard as she could. "That will be great and I'll help you if you need any help. I always felt you'd come to some time and that if you did there isn't one among all the boys that can get the better of you. Of course you can't keep up with us girls, none of the boys can do that. But you haven't had any sense, Jed, just any good, common sense, sense enough, don't you know, to know what you need most. If I've helped to bring you to your better senses, oh! goody, goody! it's just great!"

Reaching over for a little volume that Jed had gotten out with his school books, one that had been his mother's, Helen opened it and, standing on one foot with one knee on the sofa at her side, she read with that sweet, inspiring voice of hers:

"Go wing thy flight from star to star,
From world to luminous world as far
As the universe spreads its flaming wall;
Take all the pleasures of all the spheres,
And multiply each through endless years,
One minute of heaven is worth them all."

She dropped the book, reached over and kissed Jed on his upturned forehead and darted, dancing out of the door. Turning at the gate, just to toss her head and laugh irritatingly as she had done the day before, she ran away leaving Jed as near to Heaven's gate as he probably ever got.

Jed picked up the little volume of Lallah Rookh where Helen had dropped it, searched its pages until he found the lines Helen had read, and committed them to memory before he laid the book down. For the first time in his life he had discovered that poetry is something more than printed matter, every line of which begins with a capital letter.

Two years later, when Jed had attained his majority and must now go to work for his living, his father slipped into his hand a ten-dollar gold piece, a rare sight in those days. It had been coined in the year of Jed's birth and had paid the marriage fee for one of his favorite teachers in the little college on the hill. And that was every cent Jed had when twenty-one, and not even that was the result of Jed's "Resolve to Be Rich."

A suburban chemist had been advertising his patent insect powder far and wide. One day a man rushed into his shop and said excitedly: "Give me another half pound of your powder quick, please." "Oh," remarked the chemist as he proceeded to fill the order, "I'm glad you like the powder. Good, isn't it?" "Yes," replied the customer. "I have one cockroach every ill; if I give him another half pound he'll die."—Suburban Life.

A sociologist in conversation with a practical person from the middle west, concerning the labor problem in her part of the country, thereby learned the lesson of the situation. "Are there many men out of work?" he asked. The lady admitted that there were quite a number. "What," said he then, "do the unemployed do?" "Nothing," said the lady. "That's the trouble."—Youth's Companion.

("Unconventional People"—Concluded)

notices that he is hungry, and he eats the nearest thing at hand. In the same way, he does not hesitate to satisfy other appetites when they become so insistent that they interfere with his labor, and he is just as careless how he satisfies them. Here he bumps into our moral code, and we are shocked to see that he does not revere it. He is equally shocked to find that we consider the matter important. As I said above, I don't justify the genius; I am trying to explain him. Not all geniuses have the time or the power to impress their private moral code upon a whole people with the sanction of religion. Mohammed and Brigham Young did, but morals were their special business. Byron tried it, but made a fizzle of it.

But we must pass on. Somehow we seem constantly to get tangled up in the subject of morals. We had better stick to something we know more about.

Now for the other class of unconventional people. The cities are full of them; musicians with long hair who never met a note in their lives, but who pose and pirouette through life to the great edification of their admirers but to the little profit of music or the public; artists who have talked "technique" to death but cannot paint a signboard right; writers who are perfect devils in "Bohemia" and zeroes in "Who's Who;" dilettante scientists who know everything that everybody else ever discovered and nothing that they have discovered for themselves. Some of them affect long hair, some baggy trousers, some a learned air.

The trouble with these people is that they put the cart before the horse. Edison is unconventional because he has been so busy being a scientist that he has had no time to eat or dress according to the mode. But he made his inventions by hard work, not by wearing frowzy clothes. Burns wrote his poems in spite of his immoralities, not because of them. Michael Angelo made his statues in spite of his erratic "temperament," not because of it. But our light-headed unconventionalists seem to feel that there is some mysterious bond between unconvention and achievement, and so they assume the one to attain the other, by some process of contagion, we presume.

This article must end somewhere, and this looks like a good place to stop. Let us do so with a concluding fable:

An Ox, an Ass and a Lion started out on a journey. The Ox was for going the beaten road, and nothing could swerve him from it. He found the Lion useful, because he was bold, and frightened obstacles away from the road. But the Ox became angry at the Lion because the Lion would not stay in the road, but insisted on foraging off on either side wherever he pleased. So the Ox caught the Lion when he was thinking about something else, and gored him to death. Further along the road the Ox was halted by a frightful Obstacle, which he dared not try to fight. Also, he was afraid to go around the Obstacle, because then he would have to get off the beaten road. Then the Ass, seeing the Ox's perplexity, had a brilliant idea. He ran back to where the dead Lion lay, removed his skin, and put it on his own back. When he returned, he found that another Lion had cleared the road for the Ox. But after the Ox had passed the Obstacle again barred the road. And the Ass made out to roar at the Obstacle, but all he could do was bray. Whereupon the Obstacle laughed aloud, and said, "It is not worth the trouble to kill. It is only an Ass." So the Ass ran by, unharmed, and caught up with the Ox. And he found the Ox goring the second Lion. Moral: There isn't any.

Teacher—Now, Tommy, suppose you had two apples and you gave another boy his choice of them. You would tell him to take the bigger one, wouldn't you? Tommy—No, mum. Teacher—Why? Tommy—Cos 't wouldn't be necessary.—Suburban Life.

Owing to the overcrowded condition of our columns a number of births and deaths are unavoidably postponed this week.—Cicero News.

Ad in "L" train—"A royal treat for guests. Roast them in a hot oven—ready in a jiffy—eat 'em hot."—Chicago Tribune.

PERSONALIA

Mrs. Mabel Craft Deering of San Francisco has been added to the list of contributing editors for the Woman's Journal to fill the place made vacant by the death of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe.

Mrs. Thomas J. Vivian, the president of the National California Club, recently gave a "presidents' tea" in New York. Among the presidents entertained were Miss Mary Garrett Hay of the Daughters of Indiana, Mrs. Elliott Langstaff of the Imperial Order of the Daughters of the Empire, Mrs. Philip Carpenter of Sorosis, Mrs. de Rivera of the New York City Federation of Women's Clubs, Mrs. Gerard Banker, Society of the New York State Women; Miss Helen Varick Boswell, Woman's Forum, and Mrs. Heron Crosman of the National Society of Patriotic Women.

Mrs. Annie Wakeman Lathrop is making a tour of this country to study the conditions of American women for a group of London newspapers. She is now in California and after finishing her observations in the west she will go south and then go east. Mrs. Lathrop is an American woman who twenty-seven years ago went to London as a newspaper correspondent. Her husband is in the American consular service at Bristol.

No sketch, however short, of Lord Alverstone would be complete unless it contained some reference to his singing. As athletics is his passion out of doors music is his love in less strenuous moments. The rich, mellow voice, so impressive on the bench, is turned to account elsewhere in various ways. In the surplined choir of St. Mary Abbott's Church, Kensington, the athletic figure of Lord Alverstone is to be seen every Sunday when he is in London. At other times no amateur can troll out with better effect the good old English songs.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of SARA JACOBS, deceased.
Notice is hereby given by the undersigned executor of the last will of Sara Jacobs, deceased, to the creditors of, and to all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers with 10 months after the first publication of this notice to the said executor at his office, Room 909 Kohl Building, Corner Montgomery and California Streets, San Francisco, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of Sara Jacobs, deceased.
LESTER H. JACOBS,
Executor of the last will of Sara Jacobs, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, November 18, 1910.
ISAAC FROHMAN, Attorney for the Executor.
11-18-10

NOTICE OF SALE OF DELINQUENT SHARES OF STOCK

LUXOR OIL COMPANY, A CORPORATION
Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.
Location of works, southeast corner of Section 22, Township 32, Range 24, County of Kern, California.

NOTICE
There is delinquent upon the following described stock on account of assessment (No. 1) levied on the 4th day of October, A. D. 1910, the several amounts set opposite the names of the respective share holders, as follows:

Names.	Number of Certificate	No. of shares	Amount
Bunger, F. C.	111	250	5.00
Callaghan, R. L.	36	6500	130.00
Callaghan, R. L.	90	4500	90.00
Cormack, C. F.	60	1000	20.00
Donovan, Wm.	153	1000	10.00
Ford, Mrs.	151	1000	20.00
Grogan, W. R.	156	18183	363.66
Gyles, Edw.	76	400	8.00
Grogan, Mrs. W. R.	152	3000	60.00
Hoadley, G. O.	67	17200	344.00
Harrower, Robert	77	1000	20.00
Hammond, Wm.	83	100	2.00
Hazelton, Mrs. R. H.	87	500	10.00
Hazelton, Mrs. R. H.	127	500	10.00
Hazelton, Mrs. R. H.	128	250	5.00
Kinzwel, Jno.	110	500	10.00
Love, Robert	81	1000	20.00
McCarthy, T. D.	101	1000	20.00
McCarthy, Jos. P.	169	1000	20.00
Nee, Mrs. M. E.	94	100	2.00
O'Brien, T.	63	100	2.00
Pisnin, H. A.	19	333	6.66
Pisnin, H. A.	52	1000	20.00
Pisnin, H. A.	53	1000	20.00
Pisnin, H. A.	54	500	10.00
Pisnin, H. A., Trustee	107	10000	200.00
Pisnin, H. A., Trustee	103	9000	180.00
Risoin, Annette A.	162	100	2.00
A. T. Saunders	145	350	7.00
Saunders, Mrs. A. L.	144	250	5.00
Thompson, Mrs. Anna	128	200	4.00
Whitaker, C. T.	70	1000	20.00
Wohlsch, Mrs. Chas.	149	200	4.00

And in accordance with the provisions of the Act of March 22, 1907, Chapter 109, Laws of California, the undersigned will sell at the office of the said corporation, at 110, S. Street, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on Wednesday, the 7th day of December, A. D. 1910, at 10 o'clock A. M. of the said day, to pay delinquent assessments thereon, together with costs of advertising and expenses of the sale.

H. F. GORDON,

Secretary of Luxor Oil Company, a corporation.
Location of office, 219 Sansome Street, San Francisco, California.
11-18-10

NOTICE OF STOCKHOLDERS' MEETING

Notice is hereby given that in pursuance of a resolution and order of the Board of Directors of the Buclimo Mining Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, unanimously adopted at the regular monthly meeting of said board, duly held on the thirtieth day of August, 1910, at the office of said corporation in San Francisco in said State, a meeting of the stockholders of said corporation is hereby called for, and will be held at the office of said corporation at Room 941 Monadnock Building, No. 681 Market St., San Francisco, California (said place of meeting being at the principal place of business of said corporation and at the building and place where the Board of Directors usually meet), on TUESDAY, THE TWENTY-NINTH DAY OF NOVEMBER, 1910, AT 8 O'CLOCK P. M. on said day, for the purpose of considering and acting upon the proposition to increase the capital stock of said corporation from One Hundred Thousand (100,000) Dollars, divided into One Hundred Thousand (100,000) shares of the par value of One Dollar each, to Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) Dollars divided into Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) shares of the par value of One Dollar each. The amount to which it is proposed to increase the capital stock of said corporation is Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) Dollars.

By order of the Board of Directors.

Dated September 1, 1910.

THOMAS E. HAVEN,

Secretary Buclimo Mining Company.
9-23-10t

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.
Department No. 3.

ERNEST H. CLARK CARY,

Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof.

Defendants.

ERNEST J. MOTT,

Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Ernest H. Clark Cary, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the northwesterly line of Brannan Street, distant thereon eighty-four (84) feet and nine and seven-eighths (9 7/8) inches southwesterly from the southwesterly line of Zoe Street; running thence southwesterly along said line of Brannan Street sixty (60) feet and two and one-eighth (2 1/8) inches; thence at a right angle northwesterly eighty (80) feet; thence at a right angle northwesterly sixty (60) feet and two and one-eighth (2 1/8) inches; thence at a right angle southeasterly eighty (80) feet to the northwesterly line of Brannan Street and the point of commencement; being a part of One Hundred Vara Lot Number 16.

Together with the appurtenances of each and every part thereof.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple as absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 28th day of October, A. D. 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By M. Kragen, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 11th day of November, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

City and County of San Francisco, a municipal corporation, whose address is San Francisco, California.

The German Savings and Loan Society, a corporation, whose address is Number 526 California Street, San Francisco, California.

Nov. 11-10t

TITLES RESTORED

TITLES RESTORED UNDER McENERNEY ACT complete for $35.00. Burnt Records Title Co., 951-953 Monadnock Building, ninth floor, Market street, near Third.

JULIUS CALMANN
NOTARY PUBLIC

Office,
30 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491

Residence,
1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4590

SAN FRANCISCO

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

State Department of Banking

Whoever undertakes to take care of other people's money must himself be under some degree of other people's surveillance. The bankers are the bookkeepers of the business of the people of the state. They are near the nerve center of our commercial and industrial life. With a capital of their own invested in the business of banking of less than a hundred fifty millions the banks of California have assets totaling nearly a thousand million dollars. In other words, something like seventeen-twentieths of the money our banks are doing business with is other people's money entrusted to them, for safe-keeping and for putting out to use that it may earn something for its owners. These figures serve to show how necessary it is to the public safety to have our banks above suspicion and to see to it that banking in California is done by prudent men and along prudent lines.

Supervisory control over banking in California is being attempted through a State Department of Banking, entirely remodeled by the legislature of 1909, by an act known as "The California Bank Act." This act embraces about forty pages in an ordinary sized pamphlet and is made up of scores, perhaps hundreds, of regulations which banks are required to follow in the conduct of their business. These regulations are intricate and searching and it is the duty of the department of banking to see to it that they are obeyed. As this is not an article on banking, but on the efforts of the state to control banking, an analysis of the bank act will not at this time be attempted.

The head of the State Department of Banking is the Superintendent of Banks, appointed by the governor to hold his office for four years, and he must have had an active banking experience either as executive officer or director of some bank or trust company. This does not amount to having been a trained banker, for there are numberless bank directors who have had precious little to do with directing any bank and whose incumbency of the office of director would no better fit them for being Superintendent of Banks than being a trustee of a church would qualify one to occupy the pulpit. After all the governor is responsible to the people for the kind of man appointed and it is to be doubted if any restrictions placed in the law could be relied on to secure the appointment of a man fit to fill the place. That may as well rest in the hands of the governor without limitation as with limitations of any kind.

The Superintendent of Banks receives a salary of $10,000 a year and he is empowered to select and employ a chief deputy and such clerks and examiners as his office requires and to fix their salaries, except that the salary of the chief deputy is fixed at $4,000 a year, and with the further exception that the total expense of the department must not exceed $75,000 a year.

The present personnel of the department of banking requires the services, beside the superintendent and his chief deputy, of nine bank examiners drawing salaries of $1800 to $3300 each.

Then there is an attorney receiving a salary of $4,500, five clerks at from $900 to $1,800, five stenographers, a telephone operator and a messenger. All told the salary list foots up to $52,640, including the salary of the superintendent, besides traveling and office expenses. It is unlikely that there is much left at the end of the year out of the $75,000 limit.

This is not a burden upon the taxpayer. The state banking fund is made up by assessing the whole cost to the certificated banks in the ratio of the deposits of each of the banks to the total deposits of all the banks, and it is made the duty of the superintendent to collect these assessments and cover them into the state treasury. The expenses are paid only through warrants upon the state treasurer drawn by the state controller after the state board of examiners have certified the correctness of the claims. The salaries are paid directly on the warrants of the controller.

It is the duty of the bank examiners to examine all commercial banks at least twice a year and all savings banks at least once a year and to report to the superintendent. All the securities held by banks must be valued and, if found of questionable character, the bank holding them must strengthen its capital or otherwise safeguard the depositors. If banks fail of complying with the requirements of the Department of Banking their doors may be closed and their business liquidated, the superintendent or his appointee taking charge and handling the business in such way as shall best preserve the interests of stockholders and depositors, the interests of the depositors coming first.

There is no question that the new State Banking Act is a great improvement over the old one, but no law can safeguard the public interests in banks unless the administration of that law is in competent and loyal hands. Until within the past two years bank examining in California has been to a degree farcical because mainly political. The present law gives us promise of better things but has not yet borne the test of time, and time must tell. The responsibility devolving upon the State Superintendent of Banks is both grave and great.

It is a curious fact that Sardou's dramas, "Dante" and "Robespierre," although seen both in England and America, were never played in France. There happens to be at present a movement on foot to erect a statue to Robespierre, whom his admirers still style "the incorruptible," and it is suggested that Sardou's drama be performed in Paris in aid of the necessary funds.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE

A full line of Theosophical Literature from Point Loma, California, the headquarters of the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society, under the leadership of Katherine Tingley, is now on sale at A. M. Robertson's, 222 Stockton St., S. F., and at Smith Bros., 462 13th St., Oakland, California.

FOR RENT—Ten-roomed house on Kings-ton avenue, Piedmont (rear Linda); rent forty dollars per month. Real Estate Co., 4054 Piedmont avenue, rear Key Route Depot.
10-28-2t

Day School---Night School

Electrical, Mining, Civil
AND
Automobile Engineering

Architectural Drawing
Wireless and Morse Telegraphy
BOOKKEEPING : SHORTHAND

Our Graduates in Every Department Secure Good Positions

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
Invisible Bifocal Lenses
181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tels. Oakland 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

This Week: "The Achievement of Popular Government"

By Milton T. U'Ren

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY

NOVEMBER 25: '10
FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. II Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street : San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH · GOOD COURAGE · GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, In Advance. No. 53.

Men of Sacramento Stand Together

FOR THE SECOND TIME within a year, besides other times, the men of Sacramento have voted down a proposal to filter the water taken from the Sacramento river for domestic use. Not if they know themselves will Sacramentans vote themselves away from a valid excuse for not drinking water.

Unfit

HAWLEY W. CRIPPEN on Wednesday morning paid without grace the debt he owed the majesty of British law and paid it with his life. He was unfit either to live or to die, and there should have been room, even in crowded England, for that man to toil in silence, usefully to the state, until nature herself cancelled the obligation. The efficiency of British law has been edifyingly exemplified, but not its wisdom. The rule of a life for a life belongs to the old dispensation, not the new, and capital punishment, except in the case of congenital degenerates with homicidal mania, should be abolished the world around.

Food For Bacteria

JOY TO THAT MISCROSCOPIC LIFE whose function is to reduce flesh to dust! There will be business for such life in Mexico. The retribution that Diaz will exact of the revolutionists will be terrible. Disaffection is sporadic and widely distributed throughout Mexico, but doubtless so incoherent as to be unable to withstand the telling blows that the government's disciplined soldiery will deal. The rigors of the Diaz despotism could the better be excused if its purpose had been justice rather than spoliation.

The Furies

HAVE THE WOMEN OF ENGLAND gone mad or have they demonstrated the truth that every mob, male or female, high or low, civilized or uncivilized, is only a mob and nothing more? That may be the way, in England, to get votes for women, but let not the women of California take it into their heads that similar methods will work well here. The Men of California may grant votes to women, and this paper hopes that they will, but never to furies.

Dollar For Dollar

GOVERNOR-ELECT DIX of New York has announced a dollar-for-dollar platform for the conduct of his administration, by which he means to secure for the public dollar the same purchasing power that the privately owned dollar has. Good idea! There is only one other that is better and that is to secure for the dollar of the poor the same, or nearly the same, purchasing power that is everywhere accorded the dollar of the well-to-do. Of all dollars the one that costs most, and buys least, is the dollar that has to be expended a dime at a time. Often it is robbed of half its value.

First Fruits of Victory

THE CASE OF THE PEOPLE against Abraham Ruef, in which a conviction was secured directly after the shooting of Francis J. Heney, through the voluntary services of Hiram Johnson and Matt I. Sullivan, has been decided by the appellate court in favor of the state. The verdict of conviction rendered by the jury in the case tried before Judge Lawlor has been affirmed.

Abe Ruef stands convicted, with a penitentiary sentence of fourteen years ahead of him. Great news! But it is not in accordance with the eternal fitness of things that Ruef shall be the scapegoat for all the other grafters. Now that his conviction is made sure there can be no good reason for his shielding his co-conspirators. He should furnish the missing link of testimony for the conviction of Calhoun and the others, and Attorney General Webb should take the graft cases out of the hands of the unworthy Fickert and proceed to business. The decision was written by Justice Cooper and is concurred in by Hall and Kerrigan. Again, great news! That graft prosecution was no failure and like Shasta, the farther we get away from it the more stupendous it will bulk.

Metal Trades' Agreement

THE AGREEMENT entered into last week by the San Francisco Metal Trades' Association and Iron Trades' Council, has at least this to commend it: It recognizes that as goes one of the coast cities in relation to the eight-hour day, sooner or later, so must they all. It is impossible that in San Francisco wages shall continue high and the working day short while in Los Angeles, Portland, Seattle, Tacoma, wages shall rule low and the working day long. If the mountain will not come to Mohammed that august individual will have to go to the mountain, and it was wise to defer the issue until the 9th of November, 1911, to see which. Meantime let us hope that the mountain may get a move on it, always keeping in mind what Pittsburg is doing.

Time To Cool

ALL OVER THE NATION newly elected congressmen are crying out against the hard luck that keeps them out of action for thirteen unlucky months after election. Wise old Uncle Sam! He is merely giving his boys-elect a chance to cool off. There is no knowing what they might undertake to do if inducted into office in the first flush of victory. The American congress is no Pente-cost.

The Concrete Tie

IF IT BE TRUE, as claimed, that George Gates of San Jose has invented a flexible, dependable, practicable and inexpensive concrete tie fit for railroading then is the said Gates a greater conservator of our forests than either Theodore Roosevelt or Gifford Pinchot. But beware of newspaper heroes! For absolute information regarding that tie ask any section boss years hence.

Keep An Eye on Nelse

THERE ARE WHISPERINGS in the eastern winds to the effect that Senator Nelson A. Aldrich has his central bank and currency reform ideas whipped into legislative shape ready to crack through congress while that body is still in the hands of the stand-patters. His ambition is so to round out his career. Common opinion is that the lamentable tariff rounded that career out as far as it will stand and, while a not too grateful people would like to be accommodating, they can hardly take the risk of having their finances irretrievably juggled even for the sake of writing "fnis" to the Aldrich career. At least two years of public education and discussion should antedate the much needed reform of our monetary and banking systems.

Tolstoy

Aged and infirm, heartbroken by the hardships, ignorance, poverty and degradation of those by whom he was surrounded, in a peasant's hut, there lately died one of the world's great men. He was great rather than wise, abounding in genius rather than in common sense, a towering mentality with sympathies to match his intellectual stature. Hardly since the Son of Man has the world had another such masterful personality who took upon himself so unsparringly the sorrows of the world. He painted civic life as Verestchagin painted war scenes, so abominably and terribly true that one can scarcely look upon the picture, and yet so like life as to rank with the eternal verities. His books were no more for the young to read than holocausts are for encephalic women to see. They are as unmoral as nature itself, but no more immoral than nature is. How great Tolstoy was we can begin to understand when we reflect that he was the only Russian insurgent to whom the Russian autocracy did not dare grant martyrdom. His punishment would have convulsed the Russian nation if not the world. A man of sorrows, a long-living protest to the existing order in his own country and all countries, he had finished his work and his death in a hovel by the roadside was hardly less fitting to the need of what he stood for than the perishing of The Christ on the cross was fitted to the necessities of the great work that he was to do. It, too, will touch the heart of the world. To paraphrase, "for ages beyond our ken the light he left behind him will lie along the paths of men."

The Advisory Vote Issue

Notwithstanding that "The Watchman," in the department of "Political Table Talk," has given no little consideration to the advisory vote issue the importance of that issue justifies editorial attention, for seldom has there been greater need for sobriety of judgment and dispassionateness of feeling. Much depends upon the outcome.

In common with the people of the United States the people of California desire to elect United States senators by direct vote. This cannot be directly done without an amendment to the constitution of the United States, a document difficult of amendment. As the nearest approximation to election by direct vote, without amending the constitution of the United States, resort has been had in several states to the advisory vote whereby legislators may be informed as to whom the people prefer to represent them in the upper house of congress.

The crux of the question is: What is the validity to be accorded that advisory vote by the legislators? Is it to be in fact, as in theory, advisory or is it to be regarded as mandatory, as in the case of presidential electors, who have surrendered to the popular will all save the mere mechanics of their office? If advisory, shall the advice of the people be lightly considered and tossed to one side as of small consequence? If so, what is to become of the advisory system as a substitute for, and near approximation to, direct election of senators?

If the advisory vote is to be accepted as mandatory, leaving the legislator no opportunity for independent judgment, what are we to say of the constitutionality of a state law that would thus nullify a provision of the constitution of the United States? These problems are all up for public and legislative consideration and the precedents established by our legislature in January may prove to have far reaching consequences.

Fortunately for us we are not wholly without judicial guidance. In the case of Wisconsin vs. Frear, lately decided, the supreme court of that state goes into the advisory vote issue thoroughly, for that state has an advisory vote provision in its direct primary

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage. Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

The California Weekly is printed by Donaldson & Moir, 330 Jackson Street, San Francisco.

law, although not botched as in our own. Among other propositions laid down in this very lengthy and exhaustive decision are the following:

"Legislators are agents of the people and the known wishes of the people are to be given grave consideration.

"Performing the empty ceremony of recording the wish of the people is vitally different from expressing and recording independent thought and judgment.

"The law imposes no duty nor does it direct the choice to some person who was voted for at the advisory vote.

"It is not apparent how any primary law can be held to be so coercive as to destroy judgment and discretion on the part of the membership of any legislature when it comes to perform the duty of electing a United States Senator.

"When the popular majority for any senatorial candidate is large great deference should, and no doubt will be, accorded to its voice, but when sentiment does not radically preponderate in favor of a single candidate the advisory vote may have a comparatively slight influence.

"The advisory vote is equivalent to the right of petition.

"If the primary act were construed as imposing upon the members of the legislature either a legal duty or a moral obligation to abide by the advisory verdict rendered at the primary election it would require judicial condemnation.

"It is not only the right but the sworn duty of the members of the legislature to exercise their respective official judgments.

"The United States constitution cannot be changed by an act of a state legislature.

"But construing the law as imposing no legal obligation on the part of any legislator to vote for his (advisory) party nominee at the primary we must assume that the legislators will vote according to their consciences and convictions, giving due weight to the advisory vote of the people, and that, therefore, neither the letter nor the spirit of the constitution has been transgressed by the advisory provision of the Wisconsin direct primary law."

These declarations apply as certainly to our own primary law as to the primary law in Wisconsin. The compromise provisions in our bungled statute telling how the legislator shall reckon the advice, whether by districts or otherwise, are impertinent, illegal, illogical and an affront to common sense, for the reason that the whole advisory provision is intended to aid the legislator in acquainting him with the sentiments of the people and would be unconstitutional and void if it attempted to do more than to advise. How that advice is to be construed is for the legislator, not the law, to say.

Applying these principles to the state of facts confronting us what do we find: Judge

Works received 64,961 votes, Spalding received 63,461, Meserve 52,553. There is and was no unanimity of public sentiment for anyone of the three candidates for senatorial honors, and the legislators, if personally free from having made pledges, are not "advised" as to popular preference and may elect a United States senator precisely as though no advisory vote had been taken.

But each legislator has a right, if he chooses to exercise it, to be governed by the preference expressed by the people of his own district. If that preference was fairly and predominately expressed it should, and will, have great weight with him, but cannot be made legally or even morally obligatory. There is nothing in it that obliges a legislator to abdicate his constitutional prerogative to exercise his own wisest discretion in casting his vote. If there were the whole advisory provision of law would be unconstitutional and void.

If ever the courts get a chance at the district provision of the advisory paragraph they will annihilate it at a single stroke. The only possible use for that paragraph is to advise the legislator as to what public sentiment is. Having done that single thing it has done all it ever can do and it is up to the legislator to determine what he will do about it. His day of reckoning will come when he comes up for re-election.

Restriction of Output

This paper has not found many occasions which would permit it to say a good word for Mayor P. H. McCarthy of San Francisco and now that a chance offers we jump at it. One of the sins charged against unionism is that it has tended to permit the slow workman to set the pace for the more rapid and to hold the more capable back from rendering as good service as he might. This is even more unjust than the practice of employers of permitting the fast workman to set the pace and to base wages on what he can accomplish. When the fast workman sets the pace it inspires to efficiency, whereas, when the pace is set by the slow man the inspiration is to become less proficient and to "soldier" on the job, a most demoralizing tendency.

But Mayor McCarthy, as arbiter between the Upholsterer's Union and the Furniture Trades Association, has stated the case with great plainness and force and this paper takes pleasure in approving his outspoken language unequivocally.

"Any restriction," declares Mr. McCarthy, "regarding the output cannot be too severely dealt with. No matter what may be assigned as the reason for restricting the output of any factory, the crime against union labor and the union movement, and the principles for which the union and industrial movement stands, have, in the premises, been so severely dealt with that every loyal trades unionist must turn against the policy of restricting the output with all the energy, grit and determination of his soul. A minimum wage being set, below which no employer or employe may go, and above which the employer and employe collectively may rise as high as appears fair and honest from the standpoint of the ability of the employe to satisfy the desire of the employer, is all that can be looked forward to within the boundary lines of honesty, equity and fair play. The holding down or the keeping back of an expert workman to the possible output of the minimum rated mechanic or workman is an injustice to the workman, an injustice to the employer, an injustice to the industry generally, and, above and beyond all, a most severe blow to the cause of trades unionism. What one workman may do with a great deal of ease and comfort another workman may find it a very difficult task to even remotely approach. This condition of things is to be found in every walk of life; found in the ranks of the professional, business and working man alike. Hence the union movement, no more than the Bar Association, the Merchants' Association, the medical societies or other kindred institutions, has no legal or moral right to in any way curb the ability of the member or members of the said union regarding the discharge of the duties of their offices in connection with their employer and in accordance with their ability to proceed with their particular line of work above and beyond their minimum rated brother."

Rates For Lights

In a letter published over his own signature Mr. John A. Britton, general manager of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company, states that the maximum charge for electric current in the bay cities is 9 cents per kilowatt hour, but that the average charge is between five and six cents. Who pays the maximum and who pays the minimum?

Unquestionably the small consumer, the family home, and especially the small home, pays the 9 cent rate. If the average be between 5 and 6 cents, and the maximum 9, then the minimum is probably somewhere about 4½ cents per kilowatt hour paid by the large consumers, or about half what the common people pay.

If furnishing electric energy for lighting were a private business wholesale and retail rates might properly be charged, even then a retail rate that doubled the wholesale would be extortionate.

But the Pacific Gas and Electric Company is a public service corporation. It occupies the streets of the people and mars their landscape with unsightly and dangerous poles. Railroads are permitted to make a rate per hundred pounds and a rate per car, but not a rate per trainload. It is to be doubted if there be such a justification for discriminating against the small consumer of electric light, and in favor of the large, as there is between the shipper of a hundred weight and the shipper of a full carload by freight. Furnishing electric energy for lights would seem to be more like furnishing postal facilities by the national government, wherein each person pays 2 cents for sending each ounce first class whether one or a thousand ounces be sent, or 16 cents per pound for merchandise whether one pound package be sent or ten thousand such packages. Some slight difference, based on the cost of accounting and collecting small bills compared with large, may reasonably be made between small consumers and large, but where the average charge is between 5 cents and 6, and the maximum is 9, it is fairly evident that either the minimum rate is too low or the maximum is much too high, the presumption being in favor of the maximum rate being too great.

This is something to which our municipal rate-fixers should give thoughtful and painstaking attention. Lighting is a material item in the cost of living.

Just a Jubilee!

There was nothing spectacular about the jubilee service held by the First Congregational Church of Oakland Sunday last, only just a fitting remembrance of fifty years of service to the public by an institution that is not public, for, be it remembered, a church is a private organization constituted, constructed, supported by a voluntary association of like feeling if not like believing persons. Whoever, not being a member, enters the door does so as the guest of the owners. He has no rights there that the owners are bound to respect except the right to hospitality. And yet a church is a wonderful servant of the public! The First Congregational Church of Oakland is. It began with seventeen members fifty years ago and now has many more than a hundred times as many and its pastor preaches to the largest Congregational congregation, with one exception, west of the Hudson river. What is its history? No quarrels within, no heresy trials, only three pastors in all those years, more than one and a quarter millions of dollars contributed and given in charity and more than five times that sum given to benevolent enterprises by its members, more helping hands and words of admonition and cheer than dollars many times over and over again. Yet there are those who look upon a church as a personal affront, too often with the abundant reason that it condemns everything they do or stand for. But this is only one church among many, although an exceptional church in purity and power.

Where to Hold the Exposition

It is now almost inconceivable that San Francisco should not be selected as the place for holding the Panama-Pacific exposition. The state and the city have done so much that the nation, and congress, cannot have the face to ask more, and what has been done is unapproachable by New Orleans. Therefore it is time to consider where the grounds shall be located.

That Golden Gate Park will be a good place no one can deny. Apart from the advantage that would accrue to contiguous lands, which must accrue to some lands or holdings wherever the site for the exposition may be located, and which cannot be looked upon as an illegitimate gain, no private advantage is likely to be gained from a park location, certainly none comparable with the location of the exposition upon private grounds to be improved at public expense. The park location must, therefore, be pronounced good.

But is there not a chance that the waterfront location may be pronounced better. It would be unique in the history of world's fairs, and this fair must be different from all other world's fairs or it will pall on the world. The world is tired of expositions and will not travel half way around it to see one unless it is decidedly something different.

The issue is not to be settled in a newspaper office or in a committee of uninformed persons. It deserves to be taken in hand by men competent to plan an exposition of world dimensions before being abandoned.

Living Issues

From now until the end of the calendar year it will be the purpose of The California Weekly to have discussed each week, in its "backbone" article, the discussion to be conducted by some one whose special knowledge of each subject gives him a right to be heard, such issues as must come before the state legislature for action.

One of these issues is direct legislation, and to Mr. U'Ren's article on that subject the thoughtful attention of the reader is sincerely invited.

We ought not to have to resort to direct legislative methods in order to secure legislation that is wise, honest and vital to human progress. Representative legislation should be sufficient to all such ends, but it has not proven so. Too much of it has proven misrepresentative and misrepresentative legislation is always bad and always makes for special advantage.

Therefore the people must have all the facilities for legislating directly that they can want to use. If they are not required to use it in order to get what they want no harm will result from having the right. If they cannot secure the legislation they need without direct methods then their deprivation of such methods must prove of great harm.

As with public ownership so, with direct legislation. Neither is to be resorted to except that justice is to be had no other way, but lest there be no other way that way must be made available. Why not the coming winter?

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

"We boys all strive to get the runs that give us the hours most favorable for taking our rest," explained a car conductor, "for eating and sleeping and working is all there is to life to any of us carmen and we naturally wish to work days and sleep nights, like other folks, if we can."

"Eating and sleeping and working all there is to life!" It is hard bondage where such is the fact. Eat we must and sleep we must or we cannot live, and most of humanity has to work that it may eat, but it is only where employers are slave drivers, as in the sweat shops and the great steel mills, that eating, and working takes all the time there is.

It has been said that whoever gives more than one-third of his time to work is a slave, but that is putting it a little strong. Whoever gives more than one-third of his time to earning the right to eat and sleep gives more than he ought, but one is not a slave unless he give it all and, outside of the sweatshops and the great steel mills, there are not many who do that. The carmen certainly do not.

There are twenty-four hours in the day, no more and no less, no matter when the day begins or ends. One-third of that ordinarily must be had for sleep to "knit up the ravell'd sleeve of care." Suppose that the day's work be ten hours, that the going and coming to and from work uses up another hour, and the eating an hour and a half, the dressing and undressing and shaving half an hour. There are still three hours left out of each twenty-four. Give one of these to tinkering around the home and romping with the children, another hour to wife and friends. There is still an hour left which one may have all for himself if he will with a good book, magazine or paper in his hand, an hour each day to literature, science, philosophy, religion, to music or garden. Besides, there are three whole days in the month allowed for entire rest or recreation. But that hour, that precious hour, what cannot one do in a lifetime with an hour all his own out of each twenty-four! Whoever can have that is no slave.

Figure on it. It is the equivalent of forty eight-hour days in a year or, in an active life of thirty years, to almost four years made up of eight-hour days; time enough to gain a college education, time enough to have become proficient as a scholar in any one branch of science or economics, or any single department of literature; time enough to become proficient in any one branch of music; if one have a natural aptitude for it, time enough to become proficient as an artist in oil or water colors, wood carving, cabinet making; time enough to pursue any one of a score of fads to the point of expertness, time enough to make any citizen intelligent, to qualify any voter to take a man's part in government, to fit him to become a leader of his group by reason of having learned what is to be known touching the welfare of that group.

"Eating and sleeping and working all of life!" If so it is because one has not learned how to live or what to live for. Whoever out of the twenty-four-hour day can have to himself one hour can find that sufficient to give spice and zest and joy to one's whole life. One should have more than a single hour. Two hours would not be too much, but is more time to self than most persons get. Not many take the hour they could have. The fault is theirs and not that of their occupation. Merely to eat and sleep and work—that is the plane of life on which the mule lives and whoever allows himself so to live comes much too near being brother to the mule. The fault is his. The God who made man gave him a chance to have a fad. If he let that chance slip he has suffered beyond what was destined. If not a fad then something having the relaxing effect of a fad, adding zest to life and lifting it above that plane of mere physical existence that denies man to be a living soul, a thing he must be if he would be a man.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

"Nobody Loves a Fat Man"

Is a man (or a woman) to blame if Nature insists that he accumulate adipose tissue too rapidly for comfort and convenience? Evidently the answer is, Not at all. The poor wretch cannot help it, and yet he must pay the price. Witness an instance which came to pass in Russia not long ago. A man who was taller lying down than standing up, and not a short man either way, purchased a first-class railway ticket. When the train came it was discovered that he could not get through the door of the car. Brakemen pushed him from behind and pulled him from in front, but notwithstanding their efforts he stuck. In the very crisis of the dilemma one of the railwaymen had an inspiration. It chanced that there was a governmental hospital car on the train, used for carrying cholera suspects to a hospital, and this had a double door through which a bed might be carried. The difficulty was solved, the super-portly passenger entered this car, and all went well until an official inspector came along. He was shocked and outraged to find a well man in a car sacred to cholera patients, and immediately demanded that the fat man should pay twelve fares for the use of the car. This the adipose one refused to do, and as there was no derrick within convenient distance, they could not move him. Thereupon the inspector reported the case to the government, which sent a bill for twelve fares to the portly hero. Being a hero, he refused to pay, and the government sent a bill to the railway company. The company responded by politely inquiring whether a fat man had a right to travel, and, if so, where and how he should be carried. With this question confronting it, the government paused to consider, and it still is considering. Let the decision not be long delayed. A mighty host of fatty-degenerated but heroic mortals yearn to know whether or not they always can be sure of a ride on a railway train.

Deafness Cured by X Rays

Among other marvelous powers of the X ray the discovery appears to have been made that it will cure certain forms of otherwise ineradicable deafness. The discovery was made by a London specialist in ear, nose and throat diseases. In treating a patient, who chanced to be quite deaf, for ulcer on the tongue, he not only removed the ulcer, but, greatly to his surprise, the deafness disappeared; disappeared so completely that the patient was much disturbed by the long unheard noises of the street. It was natural to presume that the X ray was responsible for this change, and the physician acted on this presumption. He began to treat other cases with the ray, and with frequent success. It appears that the rays break down the fibrous tissues that grow in the ear and at the same time stimulate the ends of dying nerves, causing them to grow again. Of course the treatment is successful only in connection with certain forms of diseases; there are other forms which are, without remedy.

"On Whom Fortune Smiles"

Recently a Marseilles stockbroker named Perrin, being in the mood to woo Fortune even more enthusiastically than he did in his ordinary line of business, purchased four lottery tickets. The result of his purchase must have astounded the stockbroker, unless, as perhaps is not possible, he had a tip of a particularly rich kind, for it is probable that never was such drawing in a lottery before that time. One of his tickets drew the principal prize of $100,000, another drew a prize of $10,000, yet another one of $6,000, and the fourth gave him a luxurious automobile. Who was it that said there is no such thing as luck? And yet one cannot help wondering whether Monsieur Perrin, on intimate acquaintance with the lottery officials, probably he did not, but the whisper will make itself heard.

About That Night and Morning Cold

Probably the reader has noticed that the cold from which he suffers is decidedly worse in the morning and at night than it is in the middle of the day. If it were no worse at any time than it is at midday one might get along very well, but as it is—please pass that handkerchief. Well, Londoners, too, have noticed this peculiarity about many colds, and consequently they call them "night and morning colds." Now comes Dr. Forbes Winslow, a well known English physician, and explains the phenomenon in the following language, to wit, viz., that is to say, as our legal friends might remark: "If I went out without an overcoat by mistake I should say to myself, 'Now I'm in for a bad cold.' And sure enough in a short time I should begin to sneeze and cough violently. But if I did not have time to think of my missing overcoat there would be no danger at all of the sneezing and coughing fits I had brought on by worrying about myself. It is just the same with the people who suffer from heavy colds in the morning and evening and feel perfectly well during the rest of the day. It is only the effect of mind on matter. Men and women are too busy to think of themselves in the daytime and in consequence their cold vanishes; but directly their mind is unoccupied and they begin to consider themselves again, they remember the cold and by the mental suggestion bring it on once more." Which is all very well and mind-curatively clear, but the writer still demands to be "shown" that he doesn't need a handkerchief worse at 7 a. m. than he does at 1 p. m. In other words, his mind is willing to accept the doctrine, but his nose is not.

The Cockney Accent Purest English

Look not upon the Cockney dialect with scorn, or, at least, before doing so consider the facts. One MacKenzie MacBride (whose name, by the way, does not suggest the London cockney) is out with a book in which he contends that the Cockney dialect is "the tongue of the first written English, of the first English church, of the first English scholars and of the first English schools." Moreover, by comparison, he makes out a pretty good case for his claim. Three or four words will illustrate. He shows that "that" was spelled "thet" in Kent as long ago as 825 A. D., and "cab" and "bank" then were spelled "keb" and "benk." He shows that "i" for "a," as in "pile" for "pale," was in use in Queen Elizabeth's time. In 1580 John Stow wrote "bylyffe," which is the way the Cockney pronounces the word, "bailiff." So Mr. MacBride goes through a considerable list of words, and demonstrates that the Cockney is all right in his pronunciation and the rest of us are all wrong; that is, if English "as she was spoke" originally is to be considered. However, there need be no wild rush for Cockney lexicons; English, like some other things, changes with the advancing years, and the language of past centuries would sound but strangely on the lips of today.

Rich People of Germany

Germany has no Rockefellers who approach the billionaire class while they joy in their religion, but that she has citizens who need not fear poverty is indicated by figures given by the income-tax statistician of the Fatherland. First among these wealthy people is Frau Bertha Krupp von Bohlen Halbach, who pays taxes on $46,700,000. Next to her is Prince Henckel von Donnersmarck, whose fortune has increased from $12,400,000 to $44,250,000 during the last fifteen years. The third is the Duke of Uiest, whose fortune has increased from $13,500,000 to $37,750,000 within ten years. Next to these is Baron Goldschmidt Rothschild, with $26,750,000, and there are a number of others who are in a lower multi-millionaire class. So it appears that Germany does not compare very unfavorably with America in the matter of ultra-millionaires, and, too, she has a sufficiency of that pauper brood which always is found in the train of the inordinately rich. Did one man possess all of the earth's increase, the rest of us would be paupers. As a few men possess only a goodly portion of that increase, the number of the resulting paupers is reduced to a few hundred thousand, more or less.

She Warbles Like a Canary

In Melbourne, Australia, lives a girl of six years, named Vida Manley, who is not unlikely to be recognized as one of the musical marvels of all time. At two years of age Vida began to warble in such manner that her notes hardly could be distinguished from those of a canary. This she still does and, in addition, she is said to have a voice as sweet as that of any diva. An examination of her throat by specialists has revealed the fact that her vocal cords differ widely from those of other human beings. In short, she is a "freak," but of a fortunate kind. Neither her parents nor her brothers and sisters are at all musical, and there seems to be no way of accounting for her except on the Topsy theory that she just "grewed."

Extracts From the First Britannica

Now that the eleventh edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica is about to be published, it is interesting to note what the first edition, published in 1768, had to say concerning two topics now deemed important. Here is the treatise on Prussia: "Prussia, a province of Poland, situated on the coast of the Baltic sea, and divided into regal and ducal Prussia, the first subject to Poland, and the last to the King of Prussia." Here is the dissertation concerning Japan: "Japan, or Islands of Japan, are situated between 130 deg. and 144 deg. of E. lon., and between 30 deg. and 40 deg. N. lat." This was every word that the first Britannica said on these two subjects, but probably the amount will be increased in the next edition.

NEVER ASK HER

According to a Yonkers contractor, a young man had been complaining that he could not get his wife to mend his clothes.

"I asked her to sew a button on this vest and she hasn't touched it," he said.

"Never ask a woman to mend anything," said the older man.

"What would you have me do?"

"You haven't been married very long. When I want a shirt mended I take it to my wife and say, 'Where's that rag-bag?'"

"What do you want with the rag-bag?" asks my wife.

"I want to throw this shirt away; it's worn out."

"Let me see that shirt," my wife says.

"Now, John, hand it to me at once."

"Of course I pass it over, and she examines it."

"Why, John," she is sure to say, "I never heard of such extravagance. This is a perfectly good shirt. All it needs is"—And then she mends it.—Yonkers Statesman.

WHISKERS GO TO SENATE

A. B. Crompton, editor of the Carroll county Citizen-Times and a lifelong friend of John W. Kern, sent the following telegram of congratulation:

"Heartiest congratulations. Now John, shave off those dern whiskers. Nobody but jays are wearing whiskers."

The following letter was received by Mr. Crompton the day following:

"Thanks for your congratulatory message, Dell. The last state convention by a unanimous vote indorsed the whiskers, and as the people of the state so decidedly expressed their approval of them I shall have to carry them with me to the senate."

The California Weekly
IS PRINTED BY
Donaldson & Moir
PRINTERS
330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

TOLSTOY IN LITERATURE

Tolstoy already stands in literary history as one of the few monumental figures. Whether he will permanently stand as a creative literary genius of the first rank, only generations to come will decide. But the influence of his leadership, both in literary ideals and literary methods, has already so profoundly affected literary history that his name will be memorable. Even if his stories are not read a century hence, the stories of that day will be colored by his ideals.

Tolstoy wrought a revolution primarily in literary method. Writers of the past had been divided into classicists and romanticists. Tolstoy introduced a new classification: he is the father of modern realism. Before his day the blunt facts of life had been used by satirists and rude humorists, but their work had rarely achieved the level of art. Tolstoy took life naked, sweating, stinking of the stews, fact by fact, careless of horror or filth or deilement, lifted those facts bodily, still smoking with reality, and transferred them to the pages of his books. Nothing so daring had ever been done in the history of letters. To put life itself into print, without adornment or illusion, and to let the bald facts supply their own sting to the imagination—this was literary revolution. The world gasped. Only the transcendent genius of the man made his coup successful. We say genius, conscious of the qualification above. Genius he undoubtedly had: whether or not literary or creative genius of the first rank, posterity will say.

The revolution wrought in literary ideals by Tolstoy is equally remarkable. He is the most striking exemplar of the "novelist with a purpose" in all literature. The satirists had shot at current evils, but at random. Dickens pleaded for the poor. But Tolstoy is the first commanding figure to strike at the root of society, to declare that not merely certain institutions are wrong but that the foundation principles on which the whole social structure rests is a false foundation, and that the race must start wholly anew, from a new standpoint, and build itself over entire before there will be any hope.

Tolstoy's purpose was the amelioration of the condition of mankind. As a precedent to that amelioration, he conceived the necessity of fixing a starting point by showing what the present condition is. He chose the form of fiction, but he used the facts that history would use if historians dared or were human enough to do it. Such startlingly vivid pictures of misery as his have never been penned. No detail of the horrors of war or of the decadence of moral depravity was too vile to be placed where it could make real the picture of things as they are.

This is the foundation and the method of modern realism. It is moral sanitation by means of a literary pitchfork. If we accept the theory that the function of literature is social reformation, Tolstoy is the greatest of all literary geniuses. If we accept the theory that the true method of reformation is first to expose the sores to be cured, Tolstoy is the most creative of literary geniuses. Those theories are matters of opinion. But there can be no doubt that Tolstoy's theory and his method have produced something new in literature, nor that they have so powerfully affected a considerable proportion of writers that they will be a permanent influence in literature.

TOLSTOY'S LIFE

Jeanette L. Gilder, in the Chicago Tribune, quotes liberally from a new life of Tolstoy, by Aylmer Maude, which has not yet been published. It contains much new material about the inner life of the great author. Some of these quotations are of timely interest. She says:

From time to time, when Tolstoy was a boy, he kept a diary of "every little sin" he had committed, and "especially of any offense against the seventh commandment, in order that he might repent, and, if possible, refrain for the future, and his diary shows how full he was at this time of strenuous resolutions."

We find an entry in this diary after he had passed his examination at the university, but altered his mind and decided to enter the Horse Guards as a junker:

"God willing, I will amend and become a steady man at last. I hope much from my service as a junker, which will train me to practical life, and volens-volens I shall have to earn the rank of officer. With luck, i. e., if the guards go into action, I may get a commission even before the usual two years are up. The guards start for the front at the end of May. At present I can do nothing: First, because I have no money (of which I shall not need much, I fancy), and secondly, because my two birth certificates are at Yasnaya. Have them sent on as soon as possible."

His Aunt Tatiana, who was like a mother to Tolstoy, was strict in some things and liberal in others. A woman of high moral character herself she seemed to think that men were exempt from moral laws, though she did want Tolstoy "to marry a rich girl and become possessed of as many serfs as possible."

Tolstoy himself seems to have been more worried about the dissipated life he was leading than was his aunt, for in his diary we find this entry:

"Men whom I consider morally lower than myself, do evil better than I . . . I live an animal life, though not quite debauched. My occupations are almost all abandoned, and I am greatly depressed in spirit."

In these early days Tolstoy was fond of hunting, which is not consistent with his views in later life, but when he was young. In a letter to a friend he writes:

"I go out hunting alone for whole days at a time from morning to evening, with a setter. That is my only pleasure—and not a pleasure, but a narcotic. One tires oneself out, gets famished, sleeps like the dead, and the day has passed. When you have an opportunity, or are yourself in Moscow, buy me Dickens' David Copperfield in English, and send me Sadler's English Dictionary, which is among my books."

That Tolstoy did not have a high opinion of his personal appearance, we learn from his diary:

"I am ugly, awkward, uncleanly, and lack society education. I am irritable, a bore to others, not modest, intolerant, and as shamefaced as a child. I am almost an ignoramus. What I do know I have learned anyhow, by myself, in snatches, without sequence, without a plan, and it amounts to very little. I am incontinent, undecided, inconsistent, and stupidly vain and vehement, like all characterless people. I am not brave. I am not methodical in life, and am so lazy that idleness has become an almost unconquerable habit of mine."

"I am clever, but my cleverness has as yet not been thoroughly tested on anything. I have neither practical nor social nor business ability."

"I am honest, that is to say, I love goodness and have formed a habit of loving it, and when I swerve from it I am dissatisfied with myself and return to it gladly; but there is a thing I love more than goodness and that is fame. I am so ambitious, and so little has this feeling been gratified that should I have to choose between fame and goodness, I fear I may often choose the former."

"Yes, I am not modest and therefore I am proud at heart, though shamefaced and shy in society."

Mr. Maude considers this a "grossly unfair estimate of himself, but it shows just that sort of eager injustice to any one who fails to reach the high standard he sets up that has always characterized him."

Notwithstanding early uncertainties about love, there was no uncertainty when Tolstoy really fell in love with Miss Sonya Behrs, the woman who became his wife. On his thirty-fourth birthday Tolstoy jotted down in his diary these words: "Ugly mug! do not think of marriage; your calling is of another kind." Finally he decided to propose for the hand of the charming Sonya, and was accepted. Her father was not displeased so much because of the life that Tolstoy had led but rather because he had preferred the second daughter to the eldest, and he at first refused his assent, but Tolstoy was insistent and even threatened to shoot himself if the father did not consent.

Whether it was this threat or the united persuasions of the daughter and her suitor that prevailed who shall say? But the father yielded and the marriage took place.

Before they were married, says Mr. Maude:

"The bridegroom's sense of honor led him to hand his future wife the Diary, in which, mingled with hopes, prayers, self-castigations, and self-denunciations, the sins and excesses of his bachelorhood were recorded. To the girl, who had looked upon him as a personification of the virtues, this revelation came as a great shock, but after a sleepless night passed in weeping bitterly over it, she returned the Diary and forgave the past. To get married it was necessary first to confess and receive the eucharist."

The marriage took place within a week of the proposal, the bridegroom being 34 and the bride 18. The young married couple settled down to a country life occupied with family joys and cares. Sixteen years followed one another with so little change that the story of a decade and a half can almost, writes Mr. Maude, be compressed into a sentence:

"Children came in quick succession, two great novels and an A B C book were produced, a large orchard was planted with apple trees, the Yasnaya Polyana property was improved and new estates were purchased east of the Volga."

One cannot help but admire the patience of Countess Tolstoy, whose tastes were not at all like her husband's. They occasionally had small quarrels, but nothing serious. He lived his own life and she lived hers, and they were always perfectly free. It was not until 1878 that Tolstoy changed entirely the current of his life.

The countess not only loved him dearly as a husband but admired him as a writer. He found her, so he often said, a loving wife, an excellent mother to their children, as well as an admirable and intelligent amanuensis and literary adviser.

Tolstoy must always have been a trial to his wife, particularly at the time of the birth of their youngest daughter.

This account of the birth of Alexandra, the daughter who left home with her father, is especially interesting and timely:

"His youngest daughter, Alexandra, was born June 18, 1884, under very painful circumstances. Tolstoy was just passing through one of his periods of acute distress on account of what he deemed the wrongfulness of the external conditions of his life."

"The evening before her birth, he left home, saying that he could not endure to live in such luxury and the countess remained in uncertainty as to whether he would ever return."

"Soon the birth pangs began and they were long continued. The countess sat or lay weeping in the garden, refusing to go to her room, and at 5 o'clock in the morning, when she heard that her husband had returned, she went to him in his study and asked what she had done to be so punished: 'My fault is only that I have not changed, while you have.'"

"Tolstoy sat gloomy and morose and did not console her. The struggle in his own soul was more important to him than life or death."

"The countess at last retired to her room and the child was born almost immediately, but the mother's milk was quite spoiled by the anguish she had endured and she was forbidden to nurse her baby, to which she attributes the fact that her youngest daughter seems less hers than any of her other children."

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY

ITS ODDITIES, CHARACTERS AND ACHIEVEMENTS

The most democratic place in the world is the public library. Here, of all places, the rich and the poor, the gifted and the stupid, the busy and the idle, all ages, races, colors and conditions sit side by side in a genuine fellowship. And in no other place is there such universal and complete enjoyment. No one comes here who does not wish to come, no one takes down a book from which he does not expect to receive stimulation and pleasure. And no pleasure is obtained so cheaply or so comfortably. Altogether, the public library is an uplifting place to visit.

It has its oddities, its quaintness, its humors. Any librarian could write a book of anecdotes about the queer people who frequent libraries. There are certain types that are common to nearly every one. We may doubt if a public library in the country—a library of any consequence—is without its religious fanatic, usually an oldish man who has failed at everything he has tried to do and who is rounding out his career consistently by a foredoomed failure of a religious book he proposes to write. This book, he assures you, will irrefutably reconcile science and religion, will carry science several statute miles beyond the limits now reached by mere plodding research workers, and will make all creeds and all sects so obviously ridiculous that they will all fade away and merge into his one true, conclusive, millenium-guaranteeing faith. This old gentleman divides his time between books on comparative religions and books on the theory of evolution, with occasional excursions into occultism. He is long on long words and short on sequent ideas. One day he comes in and proudly lays down a printed volume, done at a job press somewhere, poorly composed and badly printed, and insists that you shall read it. It is his "life work," he tells you; and if you read it it will be the death of you. Of course, he has had to pay for printing it himself, no publisher would touch such a jumble, and equally of course the only people who buy it are a few friends whom he bedevils into doing so; and the only people who ever read it are the author and the proof-reader.

Another library type, even more common and familiar, is the "shabby-genteel" loafer. He is another of the failure class, sinking by slow but certain transitions to the county farm and a pauper's grave. He is constitutionally out of a job. But, though he has the instincts of the loafer, he has not the instincts of the bum, he does not like the saloon as a "hangout," he does not care particularly for tobacco, and he likes to be as neat as he can. The library is his ideal refuge. It is warm and respectable and free and entertaining. He finds the periodical room his natural habitat, and devours all the newspapers in the morning and the magazines in the afternoon. When he feels that he is in the way of the crowd, he will cheerfully take out a book of fiction, or even spend an hour in the reference room. He reads slowly, so as not to exhaust the possibilities of interest in the periodicals before next month's supply comes in. Some men of this type frequent a library literally every day for years.

But they are harmless; in fact, the library saves the county their keep as vagrants. The real pest of the library is the married woman with no children, who boards instead of keeping house, and whose whole life is an unsuccessful effort to ward off a killing ennui. She has no intellectual ambition, she wishes merely to pass the time. Naturally she resorts to the only kind of books she can understand, which is fiction. These books spur her feeble imagination, give her life the glamor which reality denies, and help her forget herself. But soon their power to thrill fails. She exhausts the stock plots and the stock characters of current fiction. Then she begins to be a pest. She wants something new. She besieges the librarian to supply the novelty. Nine times out of ten the assistance fails. She has read something just like it before. It is hopeless to suggest the classics—they are "slow." She soon becomes that most dreadful of all things, a person who has exhausted her capacity for taking interest in anything.

Not all the habitués of libraries are either loafers or pests, but before we leave the subject we would speak of one class, peculiar to certain kinds of libraries, who are partly the first and not at all the second. The Mechanics Library, in San Francisco, especially boasts a crew of these genial old gentlemen. They are worthies who have a competence, no business and unlimited leisure. They fall back upon chess, checkers and cards. A special room is provided for them, and here they indulge themselves in their favorite recreation to an unbelievable extent. For an incredible number of years the same group of men, hardly one of them under fifty years old, have gathered daily in this room, where they may smoke or chew, and have played uncounted games of cribbage, whist, chess and checkers. Games of these two last-named, famous to their "fans" the world over, have been played in the Mechanics Institute. And the way these old gentlemen gloat over their victories, and the dark scowls with which they gloom over their defeats, are worthy the pen of Thackeray or Dickens at the least. It is only fair to them to say that they pay for their whistle, as the Mechanics' is a subscription institution.

The current report of the San Francisco Public Library reveals some of the oddities typical of such places. For example, 77 per cent., or more than three-fourths, of all the books circulated were fiction. In other words, a large majority of the patrons of a public library regard it simply as a centre of amusement. Offhand, this sounds discreditable, but it is not necessarily so. By no means a majority of fiction readers are like the tired woman described above. The pleasure most readers of fiction seek and receive is a wholesome pleasure, a necessary and useful relief from the commonplace. The thing that distinguishes mankind from the beast is the power to use the imagination, and many a brilliant career has had its inspiration in the spurring of the imagination received through the reading of fiction.

General literature, travel and history are next in popularity, running about 3 per cent. apiece. The magazines are circulated to about the same extent. Philology is the least sought subject, and religion and philosophy the next in lack of popularity. Each of the three circulates less than 1 per cent. of the total. Obviously, if a man with an idea wants to reach the public through books, he had better make a novel of it, as his chances are about 25 times as good by that route as by any other.

The librarian's report points out an evil of modern methods of book-making. "The miserable paper and binding which characterize many of the new books are also to a great extent accountable for the large number that are sent to the bindery." This, by the way, is where our old friends, the classics, really show up better than their percentage of 3 would indicate. Most of the current fiction is dead and gone in a year, whereas the classics, better bound, live longer before being replaced and, in the long run, are read by more people than the average novel.

A mental peculiarity of the reading public is exposed in this sentence: "Experience has shown that biographies of musicians and artists are of much greater use [i.e., much more extensively read] when classified with the works on music and art than they are under biography."

A characteristically local flavor is contained in this: "A large number of books in the Italian language have been added to the collection at Branch No. 3." We can imagine how that sentence would be varied in Milwaukee or in New Orleans.

Especially appealing to the pride of San Franciscans should be the following facts: Before the great fire of 1906 there were a main library, six branches and eight deposit stations.

The main library, two branches and two stations were destroyed, yet there are now again the main library, six branches and eleven stations. Of 166,344 volumes owned, 140,000 were destroyed in the fire, yet now there are 100,429 volumes. Before the fire 40,771 persons held cards to take out books; now 36,995 hold cards. And with the exception of $17,000, all the money for this rehabilitation has been expended from the regular income of the library.

EUGENE FIELD'S BILL

Eugene Field once paid a bill of $100 with a dime. The story is told by a correspondent of the New York Sun, who quotes "Tewkesbury Joe," or Joe X. Wright, an old-time newspaper man. Joe's story is as follows:

"It happened in Kansas City the day before Field was to start for Denver to take a position on the Tribune," said Joe. "That night Field, Charley Hasbrook, now of the New York Journal; an editorial writer on the Kansas City Star and myself visited several places of interest, finally landing at George Gaston's. George had formerly been superintendent of the mechanical department of the Times. He was a great admirer of Field. Field often said he thought a great deal of Gaston, almost as much as he did of his liquor. Gaston was probably the only saloon keeper in Kansas City that indulged Field with unlimited credit. His only concern seemed to be to keep constantly on hand the brands Field preferred. With all his indulgence, he kept a faithful account of what Field owed him, not for the purpose of enforcing collection but that Field might know how generous he had been.

"After ordering a round of drinks or two in a lordly way and having the bill 'hung up' Field called for a straight ten-cent cigar. As though that were the straw to break the camel's long suffering back, Gaston said something about the overdue account.

"Account," cried Field, 'who said anything about an account? Did I?'

"No, but—"

"Well, you wait till I call for it," retorted the humorist. "What I asked you for, Gaston, was a cigar—the best you have."

"The crestfallen Gaston handed out two boxes of Havanas for Field to make his choice. He looked carefully into each box, daintily selected the cigar he wanted and lighted it.

"Thank you, Gaston; that will do," said Field.

"See here, Gene," expostulated the saloon keeper: 'do you know how much you owe me?'

"Haven't the slightest idea in the world, my boy," replied Field. "You aren't worrying about it, are you?"

"Oh, no, but it's over a hundred dollars. I just thought I'd tell you."

"Then this adds 10 cents to it," said Field. "Don't forget to put it down."

"Mr. Field," said Gaston, 'if you'll pay for that cigar I'll write you out a receipt in full for all you owe me!'

"Done!" cried Field. "Write out your receipt. Hasbrook, lend me a dime and we'll relieve this man of further anxiety."

"Hasbrook handed the dime to Field, who passed it over to the barkeeper who in turn gave Field a receipt in full. Field stood expectantly. Then he coughed.

"What's the matter," asked Gaston. "Ain't you satisfied?"

"Why, isn't it—er—customer? when a man settles a big account like that to set 'em up?" suggested Field.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

After Thanksgiving

Ours was New England's Day of Thanks in time that long has fled.
Still does my memory recall my grandsire's reverent head,
As low we knelt, the heads of brown beside the heads of gray,
The while the room was hushed and still, awaiting, "Let us pray":
"Oh, Thou, who givest strength to do and will to know Thy will,
Whose messengers go to and fro, man's cup with peace to fill,
For love, for health, for plenitude of comfort through our days,
For that our stumbling steps Thou heed'st, accept our grateful praise."

Such heartfelt praise for little things, where is it found today;
For simplest fare and plainest garb within a cottage gray?
Nor wealth nor luxury was there; no diamonds flashed or shone,
Yet was each day a day of thanks, to make His mercies known;
And there I learned, what yet I hold, true wealth alone is found
Where grateful hearts reach out to Him and make it sacred ground,
And there's no cot so humbly low but those therein may say:
"Somewhat there is to make each day a new Thanksgiving Day."

I sat beside the festal board when yesterday was here;
The turkey loomed, a giant bird, a monument of cheer,
And there we left behind a wreck of turkey, sauce and pie,
And, faith! I tried to grateful be—too bad I had to try!
I summed my blessings o'er and o'er, the graces fortune dealt—
Ah, me! for those, my grandsire's days, when praise was what we felt,
And I am wishing we might turn along the rearward way
To where each day was freshly crowned a new Thanksgiving Day.

* * *

Gentle Woman at the Gateway

I believe that woman is gentle, I believe that she is modest, I believe that her heart is tenderly responsive to the woes of mankind, and I also believe that when it comes to a display of pure, unadulterated "gall" in disregarding the convenience and comfort of others she is without a peer in the heavens above, the earth beneath or the waters under the earth.

The foregoing sentence is written with no thought of the horizon-obliterating hat which woman wears in public places, absolutely regardless of the fact that those behind her can see nothing in her van. No, she shows her disregard of others in a thousand ways. Just by way of illustration, here is an instance, which need not stand alone.

At the Key Route ferry, the other day, two well-dressed women met, stopped, and talked and talked. The crowd behind them, desiring to pass through the gate, grew more and more dense, but still they stood there and talked and talked—about a hat that one of them had purchased, I gathered. As the crowd increased, sometimes somebody would elbow past the women and ooze through the gate, and then you should have seen those offended fair ones glare at the transgressor. With complete indifference to those desiring to take the boat, they stood right there and talked until some attendant came and requested them to move on; then, with a look of unspeakable scorn for the attendant, they passed through the gate, as they might as well have done several minutes earlier.

Now, I know the weaknesses and peccadilloes of men, but I claim that never yet were there two—not even in a university—who would have had the nerve to do what these women did. It may be that they deserve no credit therefor, inasmuch as they would not dare to do so, but at any rate they would not. I doff my hat to woman's indifference to the comfort and convenience of others. In this respect she stands alone, and not so admirable as she is in other respects.

The Opinions of Rufus

The parents that expect their son to go to congress oughtn't to train him for state prison, but I've known plenty of cases where they did.

Moral courage is something that we admire a heap in other people—an' middlin' rarely practice it ourselves.

They's some men that have money enough so they can afford to be honest, but it seems es if they didn't use the privilege es often as they might.

I don't know of anything that gits so rusty that it won't work es easy es a feller's conscience.

I've known folks to holler, "Halleluyer!" when all the neighbors admitted they'd better have been yellin', "Is there any hope fer a vile sinner?"

Some men recly want to travel on the path of righteousness, but the dollar in their way is so big they have to sidetrack.

My hope in woman's ballot ain't that it 'll be more intelligent, but that it 'll try hard to be more decent.

Don't tell me that poets ain't useful. Would you probly have known anything 'bout the charge of the light brigade if Tennyson hadn't writ 'bout it?

I reckon the poet that asked, "Where is fancy bread?" must have been doin' business with the same bakery I have.

* * *

A Story on Our Duncan

Rolfe Thompson, the Santa Rosa attorney, who turns out a very neat bit of goods in the oratorical line, told the story while he was canvassing for William Kent, the congressman-elect of whom Californians expect much. It is a trifle late for retelling the story, but it will bear considerable repetition.

"Duncan McKinlay," said Mr. Thompson, in effect, in his most confidential oratorical manner, "has long been recognized as the Great Adviser of his district. He has been found ready to give advice at all times, in all places, to all men under all circumstances, and it made not an iota of difference to him whether he knew anything about the question in controversy or not—he advised, anyway."

"So it came to pass"—Mr. Thompson still in his best vein—"that McKinlay advised certain persons to bore for oil in a certain spot. He knew nothing about the place or the oil, but his advice was prompt, and the advisees acted upon it."

"Well, they bored and they bored, and they bored"—Mr. Thompson in historical vein—"they bored 200 feet. Nothing doing. Five hundred feet; the same doing. One thousand feet; all they had was a hole. A little farther, and they struck—"

"Was it oil they struck?" the Santa Rosa orator paused to inquire. "It was not," he responded. "Was it gold? It was not. Was it metal of any kind? Not so that anybody would notice it."

"Ladies and gentlemen," Mr. Thompson continued with oratorical effect, "what they struck was what always is struck when one gets to the fundamental facts relating to Duncan McKinlay—natural gas."

The orator got no further just then. The audience laughed a long time, and after the laughter ceased and he was about to start again, somebody thought how funny it was, cackled, and the general roar again began.

But there will be less natural gas in Sonoma county hereafter than there has been heretofore.

The Resident of Saturn Reports

The Resident of Saturn had returned from his journey to the earth, and was reporting to the group of Saturnites gathered about the grocery stove.

"What nations did you visit?" the Old Saturnite inquired.

"The Christian nations," was the reply.

"Tell us something about them. What do they do?"

"Well, they engage in war with one another, and when they are not engaged in war they are preparing for it."

"Yes; what else?"

"In their cities they have saloons on most corners and a great many saloons between corners."

"Yes?"

"And they are compelled to hire policemen to keep them from stealing from and murdering one another."

"Yes?"

"And unheeding multi-millionaires who are pillars of the church live almost side by side with those who starve to death."

"But," the Old Saturnite inquired, "did you visit none of the nations that are civilized and good?"

Just then the wife of the returned Resident of Saturn appeared at the door of the grocery and said he was needed at home, and so the report ended.

Whistle, Anyway

Met a scowlin' Worry,

Mumblin', "Much to fear!"

Still I kept a-whistlin'

Tune of hope an' cheer.

Whistlin' in the night time,

Whistlin' in the day.

Plenty chance to worry,

Whistle, anyway

Songbirds whistlin' gaily

All the daytime through

Have no cinch on gladness,

So I whistle, too.

Whistlin' in the night time,

Whistlin' in the day.

Plenty chance to worry,

Whistle, anyway

World is needin' whistlin':

Too much sighs an' woe,

So I judge I'd better

Whistle as I go.

Whistlin' in the night time,

Whistlin' in the day.

Plenty chance to worry,

Whistle, anyway.

* * *

Our Candid Friend Has "Forecasted"

"Two weeks before election I forecasted the result of the poll on governor in San Francisco"—Our "Candid Friend," Edward I. Cahill, in the Call.

Et, tu, Edward! Tu, who look upon dictionaries with noble scorn and refer to lexicons with dreadful contumely and dire reproach! Better, far better, a Century, Standard or Webster about an editorial office than that this spawn of illiteracy, "forecasted," should pass its sacred portals. I am surprised, Edward, pained, unutterably grieved. If it had been the sporting editor who did this thing—but it was tu, Edward, tu!

Conceived of a Signal Service mother who "forecasted" weather and ignored English, and born to the ministrations of ten thousand reportorial midwives, this "forecasted" babe is the sorriest child that has been born into our language in many unfortunate days. And you, Edward, you, who should have prayed that it be stillborn, are supplying it with pan! Who would have believed it were not the proof written in black and white that cannot be denied? "Forecasted!" Say, dear boy, if you heed not what I say, look up Bierce on the subject; and of course that will settle it for you. You should have been the one who casted a stone at this abortion, Edward.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

The Advisory Vote On United States Senator

In the election of a United States senator to succeed Senator Flint it is going to be necessary for people and legislators to hold easy and keep their heads, also to keep the faith and stand by the square deal. The first question is, what does the law say? The controlling section reads as follows: "Party candidates for the office of United States senator shall have their names placed on the official primary election ballots of their respective parties in the manner herein provided for state officers." So far the sailing is perfectly clear. There is not room for two opinions. But why may candidates have their names placed on the primary ballots of their political parties? The law tells why in unmistakable terms:

"Provided, however, that the vote for candidates for United States senators shall be an advisory vote for the purpose of ascertaining the sentiment of the voters in the respective senatorial and assembly districts in the respective parties." There are two important points in that clause. The point of paramount importance is that the vote is "advisory" and not mandatory. Whether or not the legislator is to be governed by it depends upon what he, himself, has done. If he has promised his constituents that he will be governed in his voting for United States senator by the advisory vote he must make his promise good. If he has given no such promise he is under no such obligation and may place what value he pleases upon the sentiment of the voters. The second point is that the ascertainment of sentiment is to be taken by districts and not by the state at large. It may be doubted if a legislature has any power to prescribe how a legislator may look upon, or in what manner he may accept or reject a vote that is advisory only. He may do what his conscience and judgment require him to do and cannot be required to do anything else.

Effect of the Second Proviso

The law goes on to say: "Provided further that the members of the legislature shall be at liberty to vote either for the choice of their respective districts expressed at said primary election, or for the candidate for United States senator who shall have received the endorsement of their party at such primary election in the greatest number of districts electing members of such party to the legislature." This is a bad law, exacted by the corporate interests as the price of having any direct primary law at all enacted at the session of 1909. Assuming that it has any validity whatever, what is the effect of this clause?

First, the legislator, unless he has made personal pledges to the contrary, may disregard the advisory vote altogether and vote for whom he pleases for United States senator.

Second, he may vote for the person endorsed by his district and continue so to vote until all reasonable chance of securing the election of such candidate has passed, after which he may vote for whom he is of a mind to vote without regard to the other alternative.

Third, he may vote for the candidate who received the endorsement of "his party" in the greatest number of districts electing members of such party. Now only twenty senatorial districts elected members at this election. Therefore the hold-over senators are eliminated from consideration by this advisory vote and may vote for whom they wish for United States senator.

Fourth, the Democrats elected to the legislature, not having any senatorial candidate of "their party" are eliminated from all consideration by this advisory vote and may vote for whom they please as freely as though there had been no advisory vote.

Fifth, the legislator may vote for the candidate for United States senator who received the endorsement of the greatest number of assembly and senatorial districts electing legislators representing his party, and he may continue so to vote as long as there is a reasonable chance of electing such candidate, after which he also is free to vote for whom he will without reference to the alternative proposition.

Sixth, the candidate for United States senator who received a majority of the advisory votes cast at the primary election has, under this absurd provision, no legal standing by virtue of such vote, and only such moral standing as the quality and size of his vote may carry to the mind of the legislator. It is infamous that it is so, but so it is unless the clause be disregarded as it should be as lying beyond the province of legislation.

Under This Analysis How Goes the Battle?

This question cannot at this time be answered. The requisite information does not exist. It requires sixty-one votes in the legislature on joint ballot to elect. Candidate Spalding claims that sixty-four Republican districts expressed a preference for himself, while only thirty-two Republican districts expressed a preference for Judge Works, nineteen districts going Democratic and five not heard from, but this settles nothing for the reason that the twenty hold-over senatorial districts are not bound by the advisory vote because not "electing members of such party" at this election. Eliminate those and Mr. Spalding's sixty-four votes on the face of the returns may dwindle. If any other members out of his reputed sixty-four Republican districts for any reason neglected or refused to promise to abide the advisory vote they also may deduct themselves from his column if they choose. Not until the facts in each legislator's case have been brought out in caucus or elsewhere can the line-up be certainly known.

One hundred legislative districts elected legislators at this election. Of these eighteen elected Democrats. This leaves eighty-two Republican districts under the operation of the advisory law. To be sure the hold-over senators may elect to be governed by the advisory vote in their respective districts, or they may choose to do as they please. They are free to do as they like and should make the most of that freedom. Mr. Spalding declares that the prize is and by right ought to be his. Perhaps the event may prove him to be right, but neither he nor anyone else now knows to a certainty.

More Accurate Figures Than Made by Spalding

Mr. Spalding received the advisory vote of twenty-seven senatorial districts, but fourteen of these were hold-over districts and four elected Democrats, which leaves him a net senatorial support, provided that these senators agreed to be bound by a vote that was only intended to be advisory, of nine votes, in the state senate.

Mr. Spalding received the advisory vote of forty-two Republican assembly districts which, with the nine senatorial, gives him fifty-one Republican votes "advised" to vote for him if the legislators so "advised" elect to be bound thereby. There are ninety-nine Republicans in the legislature, of whom forty-nine, or two less than have been "advised" by their districts to vote for Mr. Spalding, would be sufficient, if they all hang together, to give him the caucus nomination. To these may be added, if Republican senators so elect, eleven votes from hold-over senatorial districts that "advised" for Spalding, which would make a total of sixty-two Republican districts that expressed a preference for the San Diego unknown. If the Democrats elect also to be "advised" by their constituents, which is unlikely, there must be added one assembly district and three senatorial, or a total of all sorts of sixty-six out of a total of 120 legislative districts in the state.

Judge Works' situation, notwithstanding that he has a small plurality of votes, which does not count under the law, is far less fortunate. Of Republicans elected in senatorial districts five "advised" for him and twenty-one assemblymen were also "advised" to vote for Judge Works, making only twenty-six legally "advised" districts for him, but to this five holdover senators "advised" for Works may elect to add themselves and, if the Democrats should conclude to take a hand with the Republicans in electing a United States senator, Judge Works will be entitled to two Democratic hold-over senators, and to six Democratic assembly districts, also to four elected Democratic senatorial districts, or a total of thirty-nine of all sorts. Notwithstanding Judge Works' plurality in the statewide contest he would seem to be out of the running if the advisory law is to count for anything, and whether or not it is to count depends on how the legislators in each individual instance may have obligated themselves before their constituents, a fact that will require the polling of the entire legislature to make evident.

Southern Senator. Southern Sentiment.

By tacit consent one of the United States senators from California is accorded to the southern portion of the state. The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League suffered the southern members of the league to name the league candidate. It is interesting and enlightening to note how the southern legislative districts voted on the issue. Of nine southern senatorial districts seven voted for Judge Works, one for Spalding and one for Meserve. Of eighteen assembly districts south of Tehachapi, counting Kern and San Luis Obispo as southern, Judge Works carried eleven, Spalding four and Meserve two. Of the numerical vote Judge Works received 24,030, Meserve 18,062, Spalding 14,114. Again there was no such preponderance of sentiment, except as to Works and Spalding, as would warrant a legislator in paying great heed to the advisory vote even of the south; but of course the legislator from north of Tehachapi cannot conscientiously abdicate to the members from south of Tehachapi the whole matter of choosing the senator. His oath of office forbids it. That oath reads as follows: "I do swear (or affirm) that I will support the constitution of the United States and the constitution of the state of California and that I will faithfully discharge the duties of the office of (legislator) according to the best of my ability." How can a legislator be true to that oath and abdicate any function or duty imposed upon him by virtue of that office?

Spalding To Be Beaten If He Honorably Can Be

All honorable means for defeating the senatorial aspirations of A. G. Spalding should be exhausted before permitting his election, not because it is known that he is unfit for the office, but because it is not known that he is fit, and no man should be elected to that office whose fitness is not a matter of state-wide notoriety. We have such men, and one of these should be chosen if he can be. Mr. Spalding's candidacy is due to the not too fortunate activities of the once politically defunct, but lately resurrected, John D. Spreckels, whose blundering adventures resulted in his political demise along about 1898. It is fairly evident that said John D. Spreckels must have entered into relations with Charles F. Curry whereby said Curry's campaign for governor was abundantly financed in consideration of securing the advisory vote for United States senator for A. G. Spalding. Curry did his part splendidly. The "organization" stood for Meserve. The candidate of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, Judge Works, while an honorable and able gentleman, did not rightly impress Republicans north of Tehachapi. Thousands who should have voted for him wrote him down a crank who was against Roosevelt and took a chance on Spalding as an unknown in preference to Meserve who wore the "organization" brand. The law is bad, the advisory vote fails of advising and the best thing that can now happen will be to throw the whole subject into the legislature precisely as though there had been no advisory vote whatever, if that end can be honorably attained, and that can only be told by a count of legislative noses. All depends on how many legislators accepted the advisory vote as advisory only and how many accepted it as mandatory. It is too much to ask of any legislator that he break his faith with his own constituents.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK--Continued

What Hope Is There In a Free For All?

In the improbable event that the Republican members of the legislature conceive themselves to be unbound by the advisory vote, and therefore free to elect to the United States senate a man of known, fitness to be a United States senator, what chance is there that such a man could be elected?

As good an analysis of the legislature as The Watchman has been able to make would, of the thirty-one Republican members of the senate, class eighteen or nineteen as to be counted on to stand for Right Things as long as there are others to stand with them and twelve or thirteen who either have conscientious scruples against being right or are bound by ties of interest to The Interests.

Of the sixty-eight Republican members in the assembly twenty-eight can be counted on to do what is right and nineteen to do what is not right. The remaining twenty-one new members are to The Watchman unknown, with the chances that fourteen out of the twenty-one will do what is best for the state if the dominant element in the legislature be headed that way and is well organized. This would give forty-two Republicans in the assembly and eighteen or nineteen in the senate, sixty, sixty or sixty-one in all, that should be lined up for a senatorial candidate with a state reputation for being of senatorial size, of probity of character, such a man as a consensus of state opinion would approve the election of; enough members easily to dominate a Republican caucus and possibly enough to elect in the event of a close contest.

Moral of the Predicament

California has done something extremely foolish. It has burslesqued the advisory vote idea by choosing a pig-in-a-poke for United States senator. The Democrats had no advice to advise, and the Republicans, to gratify the whim of the (politically) late John D. Spreckels, and the gubernatorial aspirations of the never-late Charles F. Curry, "advised" the election of a gentleman of whom not one citizen out of a hundred could have told if he were related to Spalding's glue or Spalding's baseball bats, or if he had any qualifications at all for that or any other office. Such advice may, in the absence of specific pledges to the contrary, be disregarded without doing violence to either good conscience or the spirit of the primary law, but all personal, legislative pledges that have been given should be redeemed, unless vitiated by fraud and the issue now involved is one of foolishness, not fraud.

But if there are legislators who have given no pledges to abide the advisory vote for heaven's sake let them refrain from giving any. Let every legislator go to Sacramento as free as possible and make up his mind what to do only after he has held free and frequent conferences with such of his associates as he feels that he can believe in.

The importance of the issue must be the justification of The Watchman for devoting so much space to an analysis of the law and the facts. California needs to be ably and patriotically represented in the United States senate. She has men who are known to be fit for the job. Let one of them be elected if he can be with honor. Above all else suffer not the Spreckels' newspapers to clamor and howl legislators out of their better senses and away from a right course. That effort will be made with no sparing of ink or verbiage. If the event shall prove that personal pledges to abide the advisory vote have been given in sufficient number to elect Mr. Spalding he must be elected. We can better do a foolish thing than a dishonest. The advisory idea has come to stay. Profiting from this unhappy experience next time the advisory vote can be employed with a wiser discretion, the more certainly if we have a better law.

Fight Promoting In The Political Field

Nothing else would create quite so much joy in the hearts of The Interests as to provoke a disagreement between Governor-elect Johnson and other leaders of the reform movement in the Republican party, Meyer Lissner, for example, and evidences are not wanting to show that fight promoters are making themselves perniciously active with that purpose in view. The Watchman is confident that nothing can be farther from Mr. Lissner's mind than to attempt to "run" the Johnson administration, or to have the Republican state committee attempt to take out of the hands of the legislature the business of legislating. Those who would give currency to any such suspicion are busy-bodies bent on mischief. The Republican state committee and its chairman can be of great assistance to the governor and to the legislature in causing measures to be drafted and information to be whipped into shape for legislative action, and there is no reason to doubt that all such assistance will be cordially and thankfully received by both governor and legislature. Whoever seeks to breed strife in the reform forces is opposed to reform and is trying to defeat reform measures by setting the reformers to fighting among themselves. That won't near do.

Zumwalt Suing Wrong Parties

An Arbuckle paper states that I. G. Zumwalt is about to bring suit against the Sacramento Bee and the Colusa Herald for the damage they did him in his recent race for congress. Mr. Zumwalt seeks reparation from the wrong parties. In so far as Mr. Zumwalt did not defeat himself by his inconsistent tariff talks on the coast side of his district and over in the Sacramento valley it was Mr. William Kent who defeated him and neither the Bee nor the Colusa Herald. If Mr. Zumwalt would be indemnified for his defeat by the persons upon whom the final responsibility rests he should make about 2,000 of his fellow Democrats, who voted for Kent instead of Zumwalt, parties defendant to his action. Better drop it, Mr. Zumwalt. You verge upon the ridiculous.

Seeking to Dislodge Henry Cabot Lodge

Eugene Foss, governor-elect of Massachusetts, must be an impenitent unregenerate political dare-devil in whose eyes nothing is sacred else how could he have the heart, not only to bowl over the prim and smug Governor Draper, but heave his battle-ax at the head of that most immaculate personality of them all, Henry Cabot Lodge? He impeaches Lodge before the people of Massachusetts on the ground that he, Lodge, is hostile to a real downward revision of the tariff, lower duties on the necessities of life, free raw materials, reciprocity with Canada and an untaxed food supply, a platform upon which Foss himself swept the bay state. But has this Foss no regard for the traditions of Massachusetts, strictly adhered to ever since there was a United States and it had a senate, a tradition that none not of the aristocracy of intellect and culture, born in and representative of her Brahminical cult, shall ever seek senatorial honors? If Lodge can be displaced and a mere mortal man be elected to succeed him no longer will there be anything sacred in Massachusetts. The very holy of holies will have been polluted by the election to the senate of a pleb. But the Foss platform is as likely as not to sweep all New England like a norther. It about furnishes forth what that little handle to the United States stands most in need of.

A Conference Of Kindred Spirits

A conference of senatorial kindred spirits was held at Santa Barbara Saturday last, upon invitation of State Senator Roseberry, just to talk things over. There were perhaps twenty-five of the forty senators present. Governor Johnson and Lieutenant-Governor Wallace were also there. They talked everything over but programmed nothing. It was not, as it has been reported to be, a counter movement to the conference held at the St. Francis hotel on the previous Tuesday upon invitation of Chairman Lissner of the Republican state committee, but was more for the purpose of renewing old friendships and getting acquainted. No doubt good will come of the meeting and, if no other good comes of it, the general settling down to the conclusion that Senator Boynton will be a good man for president pro tem of the senate is of itself important. He is a fine man for the place and may as certainly be relied on to further the public interests as E. I. Wolfe was to further special interests while holding the same office.

Graft Prosecution Municipal Reform

Perhaps time enough may have elapsed so that we can afford to let the cat out of the bag. Before it would have been dangerous, but the most significant work accomplished by the recent charter amendment election in San Francisco is directly traceable to the graft prosecution and the work done by former Mayor Taylor's committee empowered to prepare and publish an authentic history of that prosecution. That committee was also empowered to make recommendations to the public as to what should be done to prevent the recurrence of atrocities such as gave rise to the prosecutions for graft. Turning to the Denman report on the graft prosecutions, and to the recommendations with which that report concludes, we find this: "We submit the following recommendations: (1) Non-partisan municipal elections. The charter should be so amended as to prohibit partisan nominations for election to municipal offices, the ballot, when printed, to show nothing more than the name and the office of the candidate." That is exactly what was done by charter amendment. How was it done? That is the story.

Certain Taxeaters Got Exceeding Busy

There were certain tax-eaters in and around the city hall who desired more jobs and more pay and the only chance of attaining either lay through charter amendment, and so they got busy and organized a charter amendment convention. William Denman saw an opening there to insert some of the recommendations of his committee, attended the meetings, got himself made chairman of the committee on elections, interested some of his associates and friends and, with their aid, took hold and made the charter amendment convention reputable and an instrument for doing good things. They could not keep out all the bad things or get in all the good ones, but they did get into the scheme of amendment the non-partisan feature and majority rule, which will prevent any more splitting of the decent element in the city's voting constituency by the indecent use of the tenderloin wedge. So far McCarthy and his followers had not taken alarm.

Then followed a long and arduous campaign for votes for these measures. Men of influence in all the improvement clubs in the city were won over to the idea and set to work. The promoters of good government did not dare invade the hallowed precincts of McCarthyism in the Building Trades Council, but they did make overtures to the proper committee in the Labor Council, McCarthy still being asleep, and got a favorable report from the committee.

That woke McCarthy up to his danger and he organized to meet it. The report of the committee had to come before the whole council and McCarthy got the council packed. Mr. Denman was given respectful hearing, indeed, was allowed to reply severally to the seven objectors who rose, at a tip from the mayor, to file objections. But it was of no avail. The council voted the recommendations of its own committee down to the tune of something like sixteen to two hundred instead of sixteen to one and the endorsement of the Labor Council was lost to the cause of good government.

However, the subject had by this time gotten before the working people beyond McCarthy's recall. The reform measures appealed to their common sense more strongly than to their partisan political feeling. Even in the Potrero the men voted for it two to one, and south of Market generally, three to one. So the best bit of constructive municipal work accomplished in years came as a result, as well as through the advocacy of, the friends of the Graft Prosecution.

The reform, with its abolition of party designation, its majority rule, rotation of names on the ballot, will be a permanent gain and San Francisco is the first city of the first class, so to speak, to put these reforms into its charter.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editors California Weekly:

Gentlemen—Nearly a year ago I ordered the weekly discontinued at the expiration of my subscription for reasons which were no reflection upon the paper. I am still receiving the paper and as the "reasons" have ceased to exist I herewith remit check for $4.00 to cover current year and the following.

I appreciate the good work the paper has done and is doing, although I deplore the attitude which it took in reply to my communication upon the subject of the Civil Service system, viz: that "The Civil Service is about the dearest thing in government" and favoring that incubator of the spoils system "rotation in office" or in other expressive terms the governmental "pie counter." You advocate, and rightly, the short ballot. That means fewer elective officers and more appointments. That means, unless those appointments are protected by civil service provisions, more "spoils." The same is true of the commission form of government which is simply an example of the short ballot with all its advantages. Without a civil service provision, independent of the commission it is foredoomed sooner or later to failure. With the civil service and the recall its success is assured and insured. You may argue "but with the short ballot better men will be elected who can be trusted." True, they will be better men but they will still be men and it is not in human nature to withstand the pressure of personal friends and the influence of fellow officials. A case, very much to the point—president Taft, a warm friend and advocate of the Merit System yields to the pressure of politicians and uses his appointing power as a party club to whip the insurgents into line. That he did this against his better judgment he practically states in his letter reversing the order and that he would remove so far as possible the future temptation to repeat the mistake, he demonstrates, in his expressed desire to extend the Civil Service to cover an important part of his own appointive field, viz: first, second and third class postmasters—the "higher ups" of the postal system.

If such a president of the United States finds the temptation to use unprotected appointments irresistible is it right or fair to subject a municipal commission to that temptation and expect them to resist it?

Yours very truly,

FRANCIS B. KELLOGG

618 Auditorium, Los Angeles.

[It is possible that Dr. Kellogg might the less deplore the stand of The California Weekly with reference to the Civil Service if we were nearer an understanding as to definitions.

Civil Service is service rendered to city, state or nation otherwise than in the naval or military arms of government and the constant tendency of that service, in this country and all countries, is to become inert and filled with dead timber, yet immortal. Governments may rise and fall, administrations come and go, thrones topple and republics rise, or republics topple and dictators take their places, nevertheless the civil service goes on with the work of governing in detail little influenced by what goes on outside. In its last analysis Russia is governed neither by its grand dukes nor by an aristocracy or autocracy, but by a bureaucratic civil service that no czar since Peter the Great has been able to control, more because the hand of that service is paralyzed than because it is served to strike.

Civil Service Reform has to do with the reformation of that service and the system for which Dr. Kellogg stands is the Merit System designed to take the place of the spoils system. There is nothing more natural than the spoils system, the system that gives to the victors the spoils of office. The trouble with that system is that the victors are not always fit to hold office and that the spoils system is eternally turning out trained men to make places for raw recruits. If we Americans were not extremely versatile and adaptable we should have shipwrecked our government long since through inefficiency, but we are versatile and we are adaptable and we do get on, although with a degree of efficiency relatively low to what we might look for if our civil service were filled with persons chosen for their fitness, and yet not so ensconced in office as to be immovable when no longer fit or when their zeal shall have oozed out.

There is the trouble. The clock-watching man on a stool, who got into office mainly because he was too nerveless to make a place for himself in the world of free opportunity—if he can not be knocked off that stool when he deserves to be, he becomes a body of death chained to the living, a burden and clog on human progress. The inertia of the average man is deadly enough, but the inertia of the soft-berth-hunting-man—the trump of Gabriel can scarcely make him bestir himself. Nothing will do that except an ever present fear of losing his job.

Therefore The California Weekly's idea of a model civil service is one recruited from a classified list of entrants who came in through the door of examinations, a definite four year tenure of office, at the expiration of which one steps out automatically unless reappointed, power to discharge at any time for incompetency or neglect of duty, open way for promotion over the heads of others if warranted where special efficiency has been developed, but upon no account must we rear up an office-holding class out of touch with the commonality entrenched beyond removal.]

Mrs. O'Toole—She's takin' on awful. Her husband got three years—but he kin git 12 months off for good behavior. Mrs. Dooley—Tell her to rest aisy. Sure an' he may not behave himself.—Life.

SHEAR WIT

A youth from Calhoun county, Illinois, which has nothing but steamboat transportation, came over to Elsberry, Mo., the other day to catch a Burlington train to St. Louis, says the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. He had never seen a train and when the Hannibal local came rolling in he stood there gaping, watched it hiss and steam and finally pull out. "I thought you was goin' to St. Louis on that train!" shouted the station agent, thrusting his head through the window. "I was," answered the youth, "but they didn't put down no gangplank."

The ever burning question, "What shall we do with our boys?" seems to be satisfactorily answered in the following advertisement, which appears in the window of a Farrington road butcher's shop: "Wanted: A respectable boy for beef sausage."—London Tribune.

"Mr. Fawcett entertaining an unexpected guest at luncheon, said as they sat down to table: 'My dear sir, will you have some of the sliced bologna sausage or—or—' His eyes darted frankly all over the table, and he continued: 'Or not?'"—Washington Star.

"Mary!" Father's voice rolled down the stairs and into the dim and silent parlor. "Yes, papa dear?" "Ask that young man if he has the time." A moment of silence. "Yes, George has his watch with him." "Then ask him what is the time." "He says it is 11:48, papa." "Then ask him if he doesn't think it about bedtime." Another moment of silence. "He says, papa," the silvery voice announced, impersonally—"he says that he rarely goes to bed before 1, but it seems to him that it is a matter of personal preference merely, and that if he were in your place he would go now if he felt sleepy!"—Harper's Bazaar.

"Good morning, ma'am," began the temperance worker. "I'm collecting for the Inebriates' Home and—" "Why, me husband's out," replied Mrs. McGuire, "but if ye can find him anywhere's ye're welcome to him."

Mr. Jones had recently become the father of twins. The minister stopped him on the street to congratulate him. "Well, Jones," he said, "I hear that the Lord has smiled on you." "Smiled on me!" repeated Jones. "He laughed out loud at me!"

Town and Country

THE city and the country are linked together by Bell Telephone Service.

The city man when away can keep in touch with his office and business interests.

In a like manner, the man from the country who is visiting in the city, can telephone his home and find out how things are.

This is possible all over the country because Bell Telephone service is universal.

THE PACIFIC TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO.

THE ACHIEVEMENT OF POPULAR GOVERNMENT

THE REPRESENTATIVE SYSTEM MADE TRULY REPRESENTATIVE THROUGH DIRECT LEGISLATION

By MILTON T. U'REN

The action of the state convention of the Republican and Democratic parties, the dominant political parties in California, in placing a plank in their respective state platforms pledging their legislative candidates to submit to the people of this state a direct legislation constitutional amendment at the next session of the legislature, makes this question one of primary importance. In other words, both parties have given their solemn pledges to the people of the state that the people will be given an opportunity to adopt or reject a constitutional amendment, reserving to them the initiative, referendum and recall powers. Inasmuch as every member of the next legislature will be a member of one of these parties, this amendment either will be submitted to the people or more than one-third of the members of each house of the legislature will stand as self-confessed traitors to their party platforms.

The executive committee of the Republican state central committee has shown its good faith and firm intention to carry out its platform pledge by appointing a committee to draft a suitable constitutional amendment. Upon this committee were placed men who have given years to the study of this question and who are regarded as authorities. The committee is as follows: Senator-elect Lee C. Gates of Los Angeles, chairman; Dr. John R. Haynes, Judge John D. Works, Assemblyman W. C. Clark of Oakland, A. H. Elliot of Oakland, and Milton T. U'Ren, secretary of the Direct Legislation League. It is to be hoped that the Democratic state central committee will take some similar action, so that these two committees may work together in harmony, and insure the submission of this amendment.

It being certain that this question is one which must be considered by the legislature and the people of the state in the near future, it is therefore only proper that it be considered to some extent at this time.

Definitions

Direct legislation, properly speaking, consists of the initiative, referendum and recall. The initiative is defined as the right of a certain percentage of voters (usually from 5 per cent. to 10 per cent.) to propose laws, statutes and constitutional amendments.

The referendum is defined as the right of a certain percentage of voters (usually from 5 per cent. to 15 per cent.) to have laws and statutes previously enacted by the legislature referred back to the people for their approval or disapproval.

The recall is defined as the right of a certain percentage of an official's constituents to dismiss him from office through the following procedure. A petition is filed by a certain percentage of the voters (usually from 10 per cent. to 25 per cent.); a new election is held; by the provisions of most recall laws the incumbent becomes a candidate by reason of his incumbency. If, at the election, he receives more votes than anyone of those opposing him, he remains in office. If, on the other hand, one of his opponents receives more votes than he does, he is ousted and his opponent takes the office.

For many years the American people were frightened by the formidable sounding names of initiative, referendum and recall, and were afraid of what was termed experimental, populist and socialistic doctrines. Now that these terms are better understood and the prejudice of the people is being discarded, the principles of direct legislation are sweeping the land and are being adopted by state after state and by most of the cities in the nation. Prejudice has long stood in the way of a full understanding of the meaning and value of direct legislation. Now that even the most conservative are willing to admit that something is wrong in our governmental affairs, it is not so hard to present this question upon its merits. Everywhere that it has been tried it has proven a decided success, and has won over those who were its bitterest enemies when first proposed.

Direct Legislation in Switzerland

Direct legislation is no longer a theory but an accomplished fact. For more than fifty years it has been in existence in the republic of Switzerland. Space will not permit a detailed account of its introduction and triumphant accomplishments in that country. Any student of the history of Switzerland will agree with the statement that fifty years ago the people there were in the same political and economic condition that we of the United States are today. They were beset by political turmoil, oppressive monopoly, and corrupt government. Today Switzerland is a model among nations; the freest and most peaceful nation in the world. That her present condition is due to the introduction and use of the principles of direct legislation is admitted by those who are in a position to know. It is from Switzerland that the people of the United States obtained the principles of direct legislation in concrete form. Just as we had to go to the people of far off Australia to learn how to vote, so we have learned from little Switzerland, the baby republic, how to govern ourselves.

For many years the opponents of popular government, while admitting the success of direct legislation in Switzerland, argued that it could only succeed in a small territory like Switzerland, and not in a country of large area with diversified interests and different nationalities. Of late, we do not hear so much of this argument. As a matter of fact direct legislation has been tried in many states of the United States and has proven successful wherever given a chance.

Success in Oregon

The first state to use direct legislation in earnest was Oregon. A constitutional amendment reserving to the people the initiative and referendum powers was voted upon in 1902, and was adopted by a vote of 62,024 yes against 5,668 no; more than 10 to 1 in favor. Since that time the state of Oregon has been the puzzle of the politician. Year after year the people have written constructive legislation into their statutes, and have, through constitutional amendments, taken unto themselves more and more power.

Prior to the last election in Oregon the people voted upon thirty-two propositions. At the election on November 8, 1910, thirty-two other propositions were submitted to the people of Oregon under the initiative and referendum laws of that state. Of these measures nine were carried and twenty-three defeated. Another argument of the opponents of direct legislation is thus disposed of, the claim having been made that the people would vote for everything submitted to them without discrimination. One of the most important of these laws so adopted was the Employer's Liability Act, prepared at the instance of the Portland Federation of Labor and the State Labor Trades assembly. It was carried by a majority of 22,112, the largest affirmative majority secured by any initiative or referendum proposition.

That the people of Oregon have acted wisely and well is admitted even by the enemies of popular government. Through the use of the initiative, the public service corporations of Oregon have been brought under proper regulations and have been compelled to pay their just proportion of taxes. The address of Senator Jonathan Bourne, Jr., of Oregon, delivered in the senate of the United States on May 5, 1910, gives a detailed account of the operation and success of direct legislation in Oregon. Anyone who desires to do so may obtain a copy of this remarkable speech by addressing Senator Bourne at Washington, D. C.

In Other States

Other states which have adopted direct legislation in some form are as follows:

South Dakota adopted it in 1898, but the provisions are imperfect. It was not until the people of the state had some measure of power, however, that the legislature passed a statute repealing the "easy divorce laws." Certain interests appealed to the people from the act of the legislature through the referendum. The people, however, sustained the legislature by an overwhelming vote and the divorce scandals of South Dakota became a thing of the past.

Utah adopted a constitutional amendment in 1900 reserving to the people the initiative and referendum powers; but the legislature has refused to pass enabling legislation and the amendment remains a dead letter.

Nevada adopted the referendum only, in 1905.

Montana adopted the initiative and referendum in 1906, but in an imperfect form.

Oklahoma had the initiative, referendum and recall powers in her original constitution when adopted in 1907, and was admitted into the Union by congress having those provisions in her constitution.

Maine and Missouri adopted the initiative and referendum in 1908. Arkansas was the last state to write these provisions into her constitution: this was done in August, 1910. Other states have made great strides toward direct legislation and many of them will secure it soon.

The legislature of Colorado has just voted to submit an amendment to the people reserving these powers.

In the face of the success of the principles of direct legislation wherever applied, it may not seem necessary to consider its advisability; but perhaps a discussion of its underlying principles may not be amiss.

Business Principles in Government

Direct legislation is nothing more or less than the application of everyday common-sense business principles to matters of government. For many years the people of the United States have been neglecting their governmental affairs, and are now paying the penalty. In the early days, a form of government was established, then set going, and those who were being governed, the people, seemed to forget all about it. Naturally it fell into the hands of those who could profit by paying attention to it. As long as the people had an opportunity of electing their officials at certain periods of time, they considered that they were governing themselves. It is true that in their business, social and domestic affairs, they had direct supervision and control of their agents, but they did not seem to realize the importance of having this same power in their political affairs. Once elected, the officer became the master, and not the servant of those who hired him. While in office no one could control him or supervise his actions. It is true that when his term expired he would have to return to the people for a re-election, but that did not avail much. For the people, if they did not want him, could do nothing more than elect another man with exactly the same powers, after election, as his predecessor. More than this, these "representatives of the people" as they termed themselves took advantage of their opportunities and passed laws so limiting the power of the people to nominate and elect officials, that the people could not even express their will at the polls and elect whom they would.

The conditions which confront the American people today are but the natural outcome of this condition of affairs. For many years men have been studying how to remedy this matter, and the adoption of the principles of direct legislation seems to be the method. The proponents of this remedy desire only to ap-

(Continued on Page 846)

HUMOROUS EPITAPHS

There never was a general scrapbook dug out of an old attic chest that did not contain several pages—more or less—of curious epitaphs culled from local tombstones or from the newspaper press, says the Philadelphia Record. The collecting of epitaphs has been a small fad with many people; one scarcely passes over a printed epitaph without reading it, and many of those current among our forebears—in this and the fatherlands across the ocean—have become as trite and well known to our ears as the ancient conundrum of "Why does the chicken cross the road?"

The helpless dead are treated with more respect and reverence nowadays; certainly many of those so-called verses chiseled on tombstones could not have been chosen by the occupants of the quiet bed beneath, although some of them are written in the "first person fictitious." Even the town drunkard, no matter how great was his remorse, could scarcely have chosen the following doggerel, which was found in an old New Hampshire graveyard for all following generations to read:

Abram Ide
Drank hard cide
r, and died.

As prohibition laws are rife in the land and we are growing more temperate all the time, we may as well continue with another epitaph devoted to another "horrible example"—although Mr. Scott, whose remains lie in a Liverpool (Eng.) churchyard, belonged to the producing end of the game, while Mr. Ide was merely a consumer. Scott was a wealthy brewer of his day, and must have numbered among his friends one who was not only a "poet," but a punster, as the subjoined verse shows:

Poor John Scott lies buried here,
Although he was both hale and stout;
Death stretched him on the bitter bier;
In another world he hops about.

To continue, and still hanging to the fringe of the great drink industry, we came to the department of retail trade, repeating an epitaph in which there is a delicious blending of the temporal and spiritual, and one which shows that in olden times this spirit of successful advertising was already to be found in the business world:

Beneath this stone, in hope of Zion,
Doth lie the landlord of the Lion,
His son keeps on the business still,
Resigned unto the heavenly will.

But here follows a solar plexus blow to temperance advocates, found in a lower English country churchyard:

She drank strong ale, and punch, and wine,
And lived to the age of ninety-nine.

The Suffolk (Eng.) institute of archeology has been collecting epitaphs from the ancient graveyards throughout the shire, and several of the most curious are here printed. One shows traces of a pessimistic philosophy surprising when we consider the strong orthodoxy of the day when the epitaph was written:

Beneath this stone lies Catherine Gray,
Changed to a lifeless lump of clay.
By earth and clay she got her pelf,
And now she's turned to clay herself—
Who knows but in the course of years,
In some tall pitcher or brown pan,
She in her shop may stand again?

Another from Suffolk reads as follows:

Here lies Robert Wallas,
The King of Good Fellows,
Clerk of All Hallows,
And maker of bellows.

Those which follow could scarcely be lines chosen by the reverend occupant of the tomb himself, a clergyman named Chest:

Here lies at rest, I do protest,
One Chest within another,
The chest of wood was very good—
Who says so of the other?

And to conclude, here is a bit of philosophy that cannot be improved by any of the great thinkers of all time. It is:

Here I lie outside the chancel door,
Here I lie because I'm poor.
The further in the more they pay;
But here I lie as warm as they.

PHONOGRAPH LIBRARY FOR POSTERITY

A vocal library is the latest idea in France. It is to be installed in the Bibliotheque Nationale, and will consist of a collection of phonographic records of the words spoken or sung by great orators, singers, and actors, says the New York Times. The library will be equipped with abundant instruments for the transmission of the recorded sounds to the ears of visitors.

Thus in the future the student of the life of some great man, intending, perhaps, to become his biographer, may be aided by the accents of his voice long after he has passed away. It is not improbable that a discourse of the Prime Minister in the Chamber of Deputies may, in after years, be both read and heard at the same time.

The new department in the Bibliotheque Nationale will be called the Museum of Speech. The organizers propose especially to enrich it with important literary works of the present period, recited or read by the authors themselves into a phonograph.

This strikes one as beyond question the most charming feature of the project. What would not certain enthusiasts give today if they could hear passages from Racine, Moliere, Shakespeare, and De Musset delivered in the identical tones of these immortal writers?

"A satisfaction equally great," said a leading French litterateur this week, "is perhaps reserved for our children's children."

"Yes," remarked Jean Coquelin, who was present, "and how much more clearly might have been preserved what are known as the Moliere tradition and the Shakespeare tradition of acting if phonograph records of their stage performances could now be found in our libraries. In an educational sense I do not think that the value to future generations of phonographic libraries of this character can be exaggerated."

This dispatch should be read in connection with another from London, which announces the practical completion of a monumental historical dictionary of the English language. This dictionary shows the history of every word in the language, the date and place at which the word first appeared in print, its meaning and spelling at that time and the changes that have taken place in this meaning and spelling down to date. These two enterprises, the French and the English, if applied to one language, as they undoubtedly both will be, will make a standard of language that will be invaluable for all time. One of the most unfortunate things about a great literature is the constant change in usage and pronunciation of the words of which it is composed. To fix both sense and sound so that both may be imperishable will multiply the pleasure of reading.

A DOG THAT TALKS

The scientific sensation of the hour in Germany is a talking dog, Don, a dark brown setter belonging to a royal gamekeeper named Ebers at The Erhutte, near Hamburg, says the Chicago Tribune.

Don promises to become as celebrated an attraction as the horse Clever Hans, which electrified the savants of Europe eight years ago with prodigious mathematical feats.

The dog's vocabulary already embraces six words. His elocutionary powers came to light early this week as a result of reports in the United States that Graham Bell had succeeded in teaching a terrier to speak. It developed that Germany was not only possessed of a dog with similar gifts, but the animal had been talking five years—in fact, ever since it was 6 months old.

The story first was considered a joke, but interested inquirers have been convinced Don is a genuine canine wonder. His callers included a number of newspaper men who went to The Erhutte to interview the dog.

Gamekeeper Ebers affirms Don began talking in 1905 without training of any kind. The animal sauntered up one day to the table where the family was eating and when its master said: "Do you want something?" it stupefied the family by replying in a deep masculine tone, "Haben, haben" (want, want).

The tone was not a bark or growl; but distinct speech, and increased in plainness from day to day as the master took more interest in the dog's newly discovered talents.

Shortly afterwards the dog learned to say "hunger" when asked what he had. Then he was taught to say "kuchen" (cake), and "ja nein." He added to his vocabulary and now is able to string several words together in sensible rotation. He will say "Hunger, want, cakes," when an appropriate interrogatory is addressed to him.

One correspondent caused inquiries regarding the authenticity of Don's abilities to be made through reliable authorities in Hamburg and is assured the dog is an unqualified scientific marvel.

HONOLULU

And the Volcano

THE TRIP MOST COMPELLING and worth while, excelling all others for grandeur, beauty and pleasure. And this splendid trip can be made in two weeks and a day by sailing on S. S. SIERRA (10,000 tons displacement). The Volcano of Kilauea, the largest in the world, is tremendously active just now, and a few quick dispatch trips have been arranged. Never before has it been possible to make this desirable trip with such speed and comfort, and the price is low, $110, first class, to Honolulu and back, and $41 for side trip from Honolulu to volcano, including rail and auto to Kilauea; hotel at Hilo, also Volcano House. No other trip compares with this. Be sure to visit the islands, and DO IT NOW, while the volcano is active. S. S. SIERRA sails Dec. 3, Dec. 24, Jan. 14, Feb. 4.

OCEANIC S. S. CO.

673 Market Street, San Francisco.

John O'Donnell D. E. Alexander

ALEXANDER & O'DONNELL

ATTORNEYS AT LAW

Tels.: Sunset Douglas 1538; Home J 1508
845 Pacific Bldg., Market and Fourth Sts.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

705 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD
The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed	$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital	300,000.00
Surplus	400,000.00
Profits	45,000.00

DIRECTORS—James D. Phelan, President;
John A. Hooper, Vice President; J. K. Moffitt,
Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph
Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R.
D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty

Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy.
Geo. A. Story, Cashier, C. B. Hobson, Asst.
ant Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)
526 CALIFORNIA ST., San Francisco, Cal.

Guaranteed Capital	$1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash....	1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds....	1,555,093.05
Deposits June 30th, 1910.....	40,384,727.21
Total Assets	43,108,907.82

Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co's. Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President and Manager, George Tourny; Third Vice-President, J. W. Van Bergen; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, A. H. Muller; Assistant Secretaries, G. J. O. Folte and Wm. D. Newhouse; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, George Tourny, J. W. Van Bergen, Ign. Steinhart, I. N. Walter, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Streets. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Heyer, Manager.

IT'S bad 'nough to have the ole Mazuma fall inter the hands of these dam Britishers, 'thout havin' 'em send a red-headed Scotchman over to boss the mine," grumbled Long Tom, as the men sat around the front of the cookhouse after supper, smoking in the warm twilight of an August evening. The sun had gone down behind Grizzly peak, and only the rich glow of the western sky half lit the gulch in which the shacks of the mining camp lay. The sweetish odor of tansy weighed heavily on the evening air, mingled with a faint perfume from the scrub pines that dotted the steep slopes above.

"Yes, an' a hare-lipped Scotchman at that," growled Pete, the mucker, as if that were the last insult in a long list of wrongs.

"Waal," drawled "Missouri," as he lit a fresh pipe, "ye cayn't hardly blame the pore critter fer that. A harelip may be jest a relict o' nateral cussedness, en then, agin, a hare-lip may be jest a misfortin. His mother, mebbe, might be able to tell somethin' erbout that hare-lip."

"Right you are, there," agreed Long Tom. "I'll admit you're right there. I knowed a feller on the mother lode that jest natcherly hissed like a snake every time he talked, en do ye know, 'twas all because his mother was hit by a rattler jest a month afore he was born."

"That's nothin'," broke in Pete, before the admiring exclamations of the crowd had died, "there's a feller down to Yuma—you know him, Missouri, that one-eyed feller with a slit in his nose, Jim Somethin er other—well, sir, his mother was a-settin' by the fire one night 'bout six weeks before this here feller was born, an' while she was a-settin' there she heerd the derndest racket outside, an' before she knowed what was up, here come her little gal, a-runnin' an' a-hollerin', an' right after her a crazy dog, one o' these here water-spaniels, a-snappin' an' a-bitin' at that little gal, plumb ravin' crazy. 'T seems he'd agone crazy down ter the store, an' he tried to bite a feller, an' the feller he picked up a stick o' cord-wood an' threw it an' knocked one o' that dog's eyes out, an' then that dog had run up the street, an' the next thing he saw was this little gal, an' he took right after her an' run her right inter the house where Jim's ma was a-settin'. An' she tried to pick the gal up, and before her ole man could git inter the room from the back yard, that one-eyed spaniel had jumped up an' bit her hand. And when this here Jim feller was born, he had only one eye, an' a slit in his nose, jest like that spaniel dog. That's a fact, ain't it, Missouri?"

"Vessir, it is, an' what's more, Jim had a couple o' marks on his left hand, jest like the marks o' a dog's teeth, right 'n the same place where that dog had bit his ma."

A murmur of approving commendation ran round the group of miners. Long Tom interrupted it.

"Well, I ain't sayin' that this here red-headed Scotchman's responsible fer his hare-lip, ner that he aint. But what I'm gittin' at is facts, and facts he is responsible fer, an' that is, he's a son-of-gun, an' oughter be lynched. Here he comes over here an' puts on airs an' lives in a big house up yonder on the hills an' s too dad-blamed high-toned to take a sociable drink once'n a while with us fellers, an' the first thing we knows he ups and marries ole Smith's little Annie, that every man Jack of ye here used to buy dolls fer an' candy and sich things, an' what thought the world an' all o' all o' ye, an' the next thing ye know he's got her off up in that house an' won't let her come down here no more, ner so much as look outside that garden up there. An' he won't let her go to town, an' the first thing we knows he's fired ole Smith, an' they tell me he wouldn't let ole Smith tell her good-bye, nor he won't let her write to the ole man, even. You know yourselves she ain't ben seen for five months, 'cept'n to stick her head up over them palin's in that garden up there once'n a long time, an' the las' time anybody seen her to talk to her 'twas old Sam Wong, in the chuckhouse yonder, an' I was a-askin' him erbout her an' he says, 'No talkee, jes cly, allee time.' Now I'm pintedly o' the opinion that that dam red-headed hare-lip o' a Scotchman is jest natcherly a-mistreatin' that gal, an' I, fer one, am erbout ready to form one single individ'l member of a vig'lance committee to go an' see that son-of-a-gun an' ask him what's what. That's me."

THE BIRTHMARK

BY

E. R. LEWIS

"Them's my sentiments," added Missouri. "I've ben a-thinkin' erbout this here business fer a good while myself, but I kep' a-sayin' mebbe I was mistaken, an' mebbe I was jest 'n ole fool, but I tell you when old Smith got his, this mornin', an' lit out o' here a-feelin' so bad he couldn't say nothin' ter nobody, not even hev a drink with nobody, then I says to myself, Missouri, derned ef there ain't somethin' rotten here that needs lookin' into. An' so you c'n count me in es Number Two in this here vig'lance c'mittee, an' ef you'll wait about five minutes I'll be back with a few wisps o' hemp rope that mebbe'll come in handy eroun' these diggin's afore long."

The murmur that had started with Long Tom's oration became a deep growl as Missouri finished, and a unanimous but silent determination moved the little band of men. Without words they dispersed, some to go to their cabins, some to raid the blacksmith's shop at the end of the row of shacks, all to congregate at the foot of the road that led half a mile up the hill to the superintendent's house. Long Tom had been first to the blacksmith's shop, and reappeared with a crowbar. Missouri had made good his suggestion of a coil of rope, and Pete had got down his rifle, which he had never used except for deer after the early rains. It was a grim group that drew together in the growing darkness, silent but determined. Under the dim light of the stars they began their upward climb.

Half way up they paused and listened. Below them, far down the gulch, where the wagon road ran along the side of the creek, they heard the distant sound of horses' hoofs. "Who'n thunder's ridin' this way, you s'pose?" Long Tom inquired after a moment's halt.

"Comin' purty fast," commented Missouri.

The hoof-beats sounded louder, nearer, more distinct.

"Two of 'em, by thunder," ejaculated Long Tom.

Clearly the rattle of two separate sets of feet could be heard. Nearer still they sounded. "Aint a-stoppin' at the camp, neither," said Pete.

Suddenly Long Tom yelled:

"Head 'em, boys, head 'em off."

He yelled too late. With a frightened whoop and a startled spurt of the horses, two figures flashed by in the gloom.

"Ole Smith," shouted Missouri.

"No!" the crowd echoed, in doubt.

"Reckon we aint needed tonight, boys," said Pete, shouldering his rifle, and turning back toward camp.

Long Tom leaned on his crowbar and mused a moment. Then he called out excitedly:

"Come on, boys, I've got it. Ole Smith's got the sheriff an' he's a-goin' up to git Annie. Mebbe this is jest the night we are needed. Come on."

The crowd followed eagerly. The way was long, the road was pitchy black, and the grade was steep. But half-running, stumbling, swearing and clambering ahead, they raced up the road. At last they mounted the last stretch and turned into the hundred yards leading to the garden gate. There they paused, but only for an instant. What they heard gave the last convincing reason for their coming: they heard a woman's piercing cry, and the heavy confusion of booted feet on the floor of the boss's house. With a savage yell the crowd broke through the little gate and charged for the front door of the cottage. One blow of Long Tom's crowbar crushed it in, and the next instant the little sitting room was packed with grim bearded faces from which gleamed murderous eyes. A strange man, attracted by the noise, entered the door opposite and faced them with an angry scowl.

Long Tom shot forth an eager, laconic query, "Got 'im?"

The stranger's face relaxed, his eyes twinkled, and he burst into a loud laugh.

"Got him. You bet we have. A nine-pounder, too. Wait a minute, I'll show you."

And before the dazed vigilantes could recover themselves the doctor reappeared, bearing a bundle in his arms, from which were emitted those most pitiful wailings of the newborn child.

Long Tom could only gasp, "Well, I am damned," a sentiment echoed in spirit by his followers. Missouri alone recovered the poise of his native manner. Gingerly lifting the corner of the blanket, he peered into the warm depths and gravely eyed the youngster. Solemnly he reached over and touched one little hand. Politely he addressed the unhappy cause of all the disturbance:

"Howdy, I—I—I see ye're a stranger in these parts."

The doctor bundled up the baby and turned to go.

"You all better scoot, now. And be quiet about it," he added.

But the red-headed Scotchman stood in the door as he turned.

"One meenute," he said. "These gen-tel-men are my guests, doc-torr. We hai a dreenk in Scawtlan' we call whuskey. I haf some."

The hare-lip mixed the brogue, but whiskey was intelligible enough. And the boss poured it and drank with them and thanked them like a gentleman. Several times the libations were poured.

On the dark road back to camp no word was spoken. At the foot of the grade, the group halted. Long Tom leaned contemptuously on his crowbar, Pete used his rifle as a crutch. A dreamy silence comfortably enveloped them. At length Long Tom broke the reverie:

"An' to think it's little Annie's."

Pete spoke:

"Wonder he'll be red-headed—an' a hare-lip."

Missouri concluded the reflections:

"That whiskey! An' to think we might a' lynched him."

FAMOUS WAR ARTIST DEAD

Melton Prior, the artist-war correspondent, died recently, had a long record of active service, says the New York Sun. He represented the Illustrated London News in twenty-four campaigns, besides several revolutions. His first foreign service was in the Ashanti war of 1873. In the following year he was in the thick of the Carlist rising. He saw the Herzegovinian, Servian, Turkish, Kaffir, Basuto, Zulu and Boer wars, the Egyptian campaign, the Sudan expedition, the Burmese war, the rebellions in Venezuela, Brazil and Argentina, the Matabele and Afriidi wars, the northwest frontier campaign in India and the Cretan insurrection. In 1903 he was in the Somaliland expedition and in 1904 in the Russo-Japanese war. Between 1872 and 1886 Prior passed only one year in which he was not seeing service in the field. He went through the siege of Ladysmith and saw the destruction of Baker Pasha's army at El Teb.

Prior used to tell a story of how a dream once saved his life. On his way to South Africa he dreamed that he saw himself shot and witnessed his own funeral. Later after his arrival in South Africa he received a letter from his mother describing the same dream and begging him not to go to the relief of Eshowe. He was so impressed by the coincidence that he obtained a substitute, and was firmly convinced that by doing so he saved his life.

"When a girl goes gunning for a husband," says the Philosopher of Folly, "she should see that her powder is dry."—Cleveland Leader.

("Popular Government"—Continued)

ply to governmental affairs those principles which apply to their private affairs. They want the men who are elected as representatives of the people to be the people's agents.

The initiative is simply the right or power of the people to do that thing for themselves which their agents refuse to do. The referendum is simply the right or power of the people to undo those things which the agents have done against their will. The recall is nothing more than the right or power of the people to dismiss from office an unfaithful, careless or corrupt agent. When put in this way, we readily see that these principles are nothing new nor strange; moreover, they existed in governmental affairs in portions of the United States before the federal constitution was adopted. The town meeting of New England was one method of carrying out these powers.

Opponents Doubters of the People

In its final analysis the opposition to direct legislation comes through distrust of the ability of the American people to govern themselves. Whenever you find a man or a newspaper who opposes the introduction of direct legislation, you find one who does not trust the people. American political thought is today divided into two parties. In the first or "progressive" party are those who believe that the people are capable of governing themselves; in the second, the "reactionary" or "conservative" party, are those who distrust the people. Those of the first class favor the placing of more power in the hands of the people and believe that "the ills of democracy can only be cured by more democracy." The other class are those who believe that in some mysterious way the Almighty made them a little brighter, a little more intelligent, than the average man. Some of them have even gone so far as President Baer of the Pennsylvania railroad, who said that God had given him the coal fields and the wealth to administer as a trustee on behalf of the people. Thus we have a survival of the old, discredited doctrine of the divinity of kings.

Those who oppose direct legislation are prone to split hairs and to prate about "our representative form of government." In the state of Oregon, as in the other states, the political machine manipulated politics for many years, elected county and state officers, and even the representatives in congress and the United States senators. The people had nothing to say. The same organization manipulated both political parties and nominated the candidates. The people then had an opportunity of voting for the one labeled "Democrat" or the other labeled "Republican," both having the O. K. of the political machine stamped upon them. In those days we heard nothing about "our representative form of government." We were told that the people governed themselves, in spite of the fact that we now know positively that these "representatives" so-called, did not represent the people. Those who are now so loudly defending our "form" of government, were not then heard. The truth of the matter is that we no longer had a representative government. Our so-called "representatives" did not represent us. They were nominated and elected by the political machine; back of the political machine stood the political boss, and back of the political boss stood the public service corporations and Predatory Wealth.

Representative, Not Misrepresentative, Government

Representative government is not a failure. It is misrepresentative government that is a failure. The theory of our government is that the men elected should be elected by the people for the purpose of carrying out the will of the people. When this theory miscarries and these so-called "representatives" ignore the will of the people and become the tools of those who are exploiting the people, our trouble begins. Direct legislation is the means whereby representative government will be made truly representative. Through these principles of agency as already explained, the representative will be held to strict accountability by his constituents. The form of government will not be changed. We will leave the judicial, executive and legislative branches of government, but the men who fill these positions will be the agents and not the masters of the people.

The people of this country do not want to be bothered with matters of government. They prefer to give their attention to their business, to their social life and to their homes. They desire that these agents whom they elect for that purpose, perform the functions of government. They have lived for years in the firm belief that this was the case; but they now have their eyes open. The American people are patient and long suffering, but once they set out to right a wrong, they accomplish that purpose at any cost. They are now aroused. They see the dangers which are confronting this republic, and have made up their minds that those things shall be righted. They are taking more and more power unto themselves. Nothing can stand in the way of this accomplishment. Driven back and at bay, the enemies of popular government have one last hope. Convinced that direct legislation will be successful in righting the political and economical wrongs now existing, they are now fighting desperately in the courts to prevent its accomplishment.

Fought in Courts by Special Privilege

In almost every state in the Union where direct legislation has been introduced and tried Special Privilege has fought it viciously. In the state of California, Los Angeles was the first to adopt its provisions into her city charter. The matter was taken to the supreme court of the state and the court held that it was not contrary to the constitution of the state.

See, In Re Pfahler, 88 Pac. 270.

All the state courts of those states which have adopted direct legislation have held these principles to be constitutional. The last hope of the enemies of popular government lies in the supreme court of the United States. The people of the state of Oregon under the direct legislation provisions of their constitution, initiated and adopted as a law of that state a statute taxing the gross incomes of public service corporations. The Pacific Telephone and Telegraph company fought the tax and carried it to the supreme court of the state of Oregon upon various grounds, among which was the claim that the constitutional direct legislation provisions of the state were in contravention of the constitution of the United States, which guarantees to every state a republican form of government. The supreme court of the state of Oregon decided against this contention and held that such provisions were not in contravention of the guarantee clause of the constitution of the United States.

Remarkable Plea of Telephone Company

The attorneys for the corporation have filed a remarkable brief, in which it is claimed that the initiative and referendum provisions in the constitution of the state of Oregon are unconstitutional because they are in contravention of the guarantee clause of the constitution of the United States which guarantees to every state a republican form of government. The claim is made that where the people act directly upon a law, that is a "democratic" form of government; that a "republican" form of government is one wherein the people act only through representatives. Upon this construction of the guarantee clause of the constitution of the United States, the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph company asks the supreme court of the United States to wipe out of the constitutions of nine states their direct legislation provisions. Remarkable as have been some of the decisions of the supreme court of the United States, it is incredible to believe that it will uphold this contention of the telephone company.

In the first place, the supreme court of the United States has held time after time that all questions arising under the guarantee clause of the constitution of the United States as to what constitutes a "republican" form of government are political and not judicial questions. This question arose in the very early days of our history as a nation, and was decided in the case of Luther vs. Borden, 7 How. 1. This decision of the court has recently been affirmed in the case of Taylor vs. Beckham, 178 U. S. 598. This was a case brought by ex-Governor Taylor of Kentucky against Lieutenant Governor Beckham, who became governor upon the assassination of Governor Goebel. This political history is fresh in the minds of the people and will be readily recalled. Taylor appealed to the supreme court of the United States declaring that at the time of the election Kentucky had been in a virtual state of civil war and did not have a republican form of government. The supreme court refused to go into the merits of the case, and declared that it had no jurisdiction in the matter as to what constituted a republican form of government in any of the states; that this was a political question to be decided by the legislative and executive branches of the United States government and not by the judicial.

The Example of Oklahoma

If the decision of the supreme court of the United States to the effect that the executive and legislative branches of the government are the sole judges as to what constituted a republican form of government under the guarantee clause of the constitution of the United States is correct, it would seem that this question has been definitely settled. The territory of Oklahoma applied for admission into the Union as a state, and was told by congress and the president to adopt a state constitution which would be in conformity with the constitution of the United States. It adopted a constitution in 1907 containing as its basic principles of government the initiative and referendum powers, by vote of the people of 40,000 majority. Oklahoma was subsequently accepted into the Union by congress with the approval of the president, by formal resolution, declaring, "that the state of Oklahoma having adopted a constitution containing a republican form of government," etc. President Roosevelt, himself, at that time doubted the wisdom of these direct legislation provisions but certainly did not consider that they were contrary to a "republican form" of government. The whole opposition upon this point rests upon a hairsplitting definition contained in some dictionaries, which distinguishes between republican and democratic forms of government. That any court would go so far as to wipe out the constitutional provisions of nine states, reverse two of its leading decisions, take unto itself the legislative and executive functions of declaring what is a republican form of government, and restore to power again the rapidly disappearing misrepresentative tools of Special Interests, is unthinkable.

The guarantee clause of the constitution of the United States was adopted as a measure of protection to the states themselves. That the original thirteen independent sovereign states should give to the federal government the right to interfere and upset their state constitutions was not dreamed of at the time. Much discussion was indulged in at the time as to what this clause really meant. Alexander Hamilton, who was the leader of the Tories, and who in reality had no confidence in the ability of the people to govern themselves, said in discussing this provision, as follows: "It (the guarantee clause) can be no impediment to reforms in the state constitutions by a majority of the people in a legal and peaceful mode. This right would remain undiminished. The guarantee can only operate against changes to be affected by violence." Hamilton, the Federalist, Paper No. 21, page 107.

No Change in Form of Government

The states which have affected these changes have done so in a peaceable and in a legal way; moreover, they have not even changed the form of government in the slightest particular. In each of these states the form of government originally adopted has remained intact. For eight years the people of the state of Oregon have existed under these direct legislation provisions; they have the legislative, the executive and the judicial branches of government working peacefully and quietly. The only change that has been brought about is that the people are more prosperous, happier and more contented with their government. Dissatisfaction and discontent have ceased.

A decision of the supreme court of the United States declaring that their government is "unconstitutional" would bring back the conditions which existed prior to 1902, and this the people will not tolerate. Thwarted in an attempt to remedy their wrongs in a peaceful manner, the only road open to the people of the United States will be violence. This is abhorrent to all. We know that nothing is gained through revolution, nothing is settled, and we merely begin over again with the same difficulties to face and problems to solve. Having found the road to real self-government, let us follow it. Let us go forward carefully but with confidence in the knowledge that representative government is no longer a mockery, and that through direct legislation popular government is a reality.

ERROR IN "HEATHEN CHINEE"

Every one who knows American poetry is familiar with Bret Harte's "Heathen Chinee," written in the early seventies at the time when the feeling on the Pacific Coast ran high against the mild-eyed Celestial, and voicing that feeling by portraying the hero, if such a term may be applied to "Ah Sin," as a crafty card-cheating villain who outwits the sharps of the California mining camps, says the New York Times.

It is not generally known, however, that the poem is unique in that it contains an error which the author failed to detect when reading the galley proofs and which survived, and still survives, all attempts at correction. Perhaps it is the only instance in literature where a grossly patent error in the copy reading of an afterwards famous article, whether prose or poem, has persisted through numerous editions, despite all efforts of author and editor to kill it.

The poem was written while Bret Harte was employed on a San Francisco daily, and, to him, was merely a part of the day's work. It tells of a Chinee, Ah Sin, who, "with a smile that was childlike and bland" sat in a game of euchre with "Truthful James" and "Bill Nye."

At a crucial point of the game, the artless Chinee plays the winning card, "which," says Truthful James, the narrator of the catastrophe, "the same Nye had dealt unto me." Whereupon, Truthful and Nye proceed to "go for that Heathen Chinee." The damaging evidence disclosed by their rough and searching investigation is told as follows in the poem as it was printed—and has been printed ever since the initial publication.

"In his sleeves, which were long, there were twenty-four packs;
Which is coming it strong, yet I state but the facts."

In this form the busy Bret Harte let the proofs go down to the printer, and it was not until some time later that he recalled having overlooked an error in it. He hurried down to the press, but already several hundred copies had been struck off and were being distributed about the city to the morning subscribers. Bret Harte, attaching no importance to the fugitive verses, which had merely oozed from his pen the afternoon previous, made no effort at correction then. When, however, the Eastern press enthusiastically copied it, and publishers and illustrators rang all manner of comic changes on it, he tried to substitute the correct phrase, but without avail, and "The Heathen Chinee" has persisted in its original form through numberless editions ever since.

What Bret Harte wrote was:

"In his sleeves, which were long, he had twenty-four jacks."

Now in the game of euchre, as all card players know, the jacks are of great value and the stuffing of numberless jacks up his flowing sleeves, as the poet intended to sing, showed great astuteness on the part of Ah Sin. The uncorrected error of the compositor who set up "packs" instead of "jacks" still left enough of sense to pass muster when embodied between the contexts.

The poet, after years of fruitless endeavor, finally gave up all hope and resigned himself to the butchered reading. And today, every copy of Bret Harte's poems sold for a Christmas gift in gorgeous, de luxe editions, contains that error of the inky compositor made years ago.

JUST JOKES

It was a dark night. A man was riding a bicycle with no lamp. He came to a cross-roads, and did not know which way to turn. He felt in his pocket for a match. He found but one. Climbing to the top of the pole, he lit the match carefully and in the ensuing glimmer read: WET PAINT.

Seymour Hicks, the English actor, is quoted by the New York Times as sponsor for this story. Once I remember driving up to a famous playhouse where the business was dreadfully bad at the time, although I was not aware of the fact. I apologized for not having written for seats, explaining I was of the Kendal company, and that I should be grateful if they would allow me to see the performance. The manager looked at me silently for a few moments, and then said: "Is that your hansom outside there?" I replied that it was. He said, "Then drive it right in." I realized when I took my seat what he had meant. I and six others were the only people in the dress circle.

The oligarchy called the new senator before them, says the Newark News. "Do you know what your amendment to section 5 of the freight bill will do?" they demanded. "No," replied the new senator. "It will make the meaning of the section absolutely clear and intelligible," they told him. Apologizing for his rawness and inexperience in legislation, the new senator withdrew his amendment at once.

"To say," a matron observed, "that everybody is talking about a young man is a eulogy; but to say that everybody is talking about a young woman is an elegy."—Yonkers Statesman.

"I saw you kiss my daughter in the conservatory last night. What have you got to say to that, sir?" "Well, I'll overlook it this time, but don't let it occur again, please."—The Housekeeper.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of SARA JACOBS, deceased.
Notice is hereby given by the undersigned executor of the last will of Sara Jacobs, deceased, to the creditors of, and to all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers with 10 months after the first publication of this notice to the said executor at his office, Room 909 Kohl Building, Corner Montgomery and California Streets, San Francisco, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of Sara Jacobs, deceased.

LESTER H. JACOBS,
Executor of the last will of Sara Jacobs, deceased.

Dated, San Francisco, November 18, 1910.

ISAAC FROHMAN, Attorney for the Executor.

11-18-6t

NOTICE OF SALE OF DELINQUENT SHARES OF STOCK

LUXOR OIL COMPANY, A CORPORATION
Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.

Location of works, southeast corner of Section 22, Township 32, Range 24, County of Kern, California.

NOTICE

There is delinquent upon the following described stock on account of assessment (No. 1) levied on the 4th day of October, A. D. 1910, the several amounts set opposite the names of the respective share holders, as follows:

Names.	Number of Certificate	No. of shares	Amount
Bunger, F. C.	111	250	5.00
Callaghan, R. L.	36	6500	130.00
Callaghan, R. L.	90	4500	90.00
Cormack, C. F.	60	1000	20.00
Donovan, Wm.	153	500	10.00
Ford, Mrs.	151	1000	20.00
Grogan, W. R.	156	18183	363.66
Gyles, Edw.	76	400	8.00
Grogan, Mrs. W. R.	152	3000	60.00
Hoadley, G. O.	67	17300	346.00
Harrower, Robert	77	1000	20.00
Hammond, Wm.	83	100	2.00
Hazelton, Mrs. R. H.	87	500	10.00
Hazelton, Mrs. R. H.	127	500	10.00
Hazelton, Mrs. R. H.	138	350	7.00
Kingwell, Geo.	110	500	10.00
Love, Robert B.	81	1000	20.00
McCarthy, I. D.	101	1000	20.00
McCarthy, Jos. P.	169	1000	20.00
Nee, Mrs. M. E.	94	100	2.00
O'Brien, T.	63	100	2.00
Rislin, H. A.	59	1000	20.00
Rislin, H. A.	53	1000	20.00
Rislin, H. A.	54	500	10.00
Rislin, H. A.	102	10000	200.00
Rislin, H. A. Trustee	103	9000	180.00
Rislin, Annette A.	167	100	2.00
S. L. Saunders	145	350	7.00
Saunders, Mrs. A. L.	141	250	5.00
Trammor, Mrs. Anna	148	300	6.00
Whitaker, C. I.	70	1000	20.00
Welch, Mrs. Chas.	142	500	10.00

And in accordance with law, so many shares of a named of such stock as may be necessary will be sold at the office of the said corporation at 219 Sanson Street, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on Wednesday, the 7th day of December, A. D. 1910, at 10 o'clock A. M. of the said day, to pay advertising and expenses of the sale.

Secretary of Luxor Oil Company, a corporation.

NOTICE OF STOCKHOLDERS' MEETING

Notice is hereby given that in pursuance of a resolution and order of the Board of Directors of the Buclimo Mining Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, unanimously adopted at the regular monthly meeting of said board, duly held on the thirtieth day of August, 1910, at the office of said corporation in San Francisco in said State, a meeting of the stockholders of said corporation is hereby called for, and will be held at the office of said corporation at Room 941 Monadnock Building, No. 681 Market St., San Francisco, California (said place of meeting being at the principal place of business of said corporation and at the building and place where the Board of Directors usually meet), on TUESDAY, THE TWENTY-NINTH DAY OF NOVEMBER, 1910, AT 8 O'CLOCK P. M. on said day, for the purpose of considering and acting upon the proposition to increase the capital stock of said corporation from One Hundred Thousand (100,000) Dollars, divided into One Hundred Thousand (100,000) shares of the par value of One Dollar each, to Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) Dollars divided into Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) shares of the par value of One Dollar each. The amount to which it is proposed to increase the capital stock of said corporation is Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand (250,000) Dollars.

By order of the Board of Directors.
Dated September 1, 1910.

THOMAS E. HAVEN,
Secretary Buclimo Mining Company.

9 23 10t

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

Department No. 3.

ERNEST H. CLARK CARY,

Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or

Defendants.

ERNEST J. MOTT,

Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA.
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Ernest H. Clark Cary, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the northwesterly line of Brannan Street, distant thereon eighty-four (84) feet and nine and seven-eighths (97 7/8) inches southwesterly from the southwesterly line of Zoe Street; running thence southwesterly along said line of Brannan Street sixty (60) feet; thence southwesterly along said line, thence at a right angle northwesterly eighty (80) feet; thence at a right angle northeasterly sixty (60) feet and two and one-eighth (2 1/8) inches; thence at a right angle southeasterly eighty (80) feet to the northwesterly line of Brannan Street and the point of commencement; being a part of One Hundred Vara Lot Number 153.

Together with the appurtenances of each and every part thereof.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple as absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same be in fee simple or otherwise; and that the plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 28th day of October, A. D. 1910.

H. L. MULCREVY, Clerk.

Bv M. Kragen, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 11th day of November, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

City and County of San Francisco, a municipal corporation, whose address is San Francisco, California.

The German Savings and Loan Society, a corporation, whose address is Number 526 California Street, San Francisco, California.

TITLES RESTORED

TITLES RESTORED UNDER MEXICAN EJECTMENT ACT complete for $35.00. Burnt Records Title Co., 951-953 Monadnock Building, ninth floor, Market street, near Third.

JULIUS CALMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office,
30 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491

Residence,
1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4590

SAN FRANCISCO

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

State Board of Railroad Commissioners

In the beginning of road making each person cut his own trail out and, if there were others who wanted to travel that way, they helped to cut it. If there was great demand some enterprising person, with the King's warrant, made a road, built bridges on it, kept it in repair and took toll of every person and thing that passed over it, so much for a person on foot, more for a person on horseback, still more for a team, the bigger the team the higher the price. By and by people became tired of paying so much for such a service and, through their government, built the roads, first taking enough of toll to keep the road in repair and, finally, taxing all the country round about to keep the roads in repair, but leaving them free of tolls.

A railroad is a toll road given a king's right to build across other folk's lands, paying such damages as they inflict, but going right along whether other land owners like it or not, completing the line and so putting the owners of the road in a position to take tolls. That is the purpose of railroad building—to get the tolls.

Ordinarily railroads do not suffer others to run their vehicles over their roads, preferring to supply their own vehicles, but sometimes they do. There are great lines of fruit, cattle, fast-freight, oil shippers, and the like, that furnish their own vehicles for hauling their own freight and the freight of their customers over railroads that they do not own, paying tolls to have the railroad company's locomotives hitched to their trains, or their cars hitched to other trains, and so hauled to their destination. Sometimes rich men own private cars and when they travel they pay to have their cars hauled, and sleeping car companies run thousands of their traveling hotels over railroads that they do not own. These are all phases of the old toll road idea adapted to modern conditions where steam and electricity are used instead of horses, mules or oxen.

Now under the toll road system greedy road makers, if left to themselves, made their tolls so high as to restrict travel and commerce and complaint by travelers was general. They said they were being robbed. They were willing to pay tolls that should, in their aggregate, pay interest on the cost of making the road, pay for keeping the road in repair and pay good wages to the superintendency for it and, by and by, return the original investment, but they were not willing to turn over to the owner of the toll road all, or nearly all, the profit to be had in traveling over his road.

These complaints grew so loud and insistent that they finally reached the ears of the king and he appointed someone to look into the matter and fix such tolls on that road as would be fair to both the road builder and the traveler. Always and everywhere some power other than the toll road owner had to be called in to settle the quarrel between the traveler and the road owner over what the rates of toll should be.

This is just as true of railroad rates as it ever was of toll road rates, with the difference that railroad traffic is ten thousand times more important, more complicated and more in need of impartial adjustment than ever toll roads were. And this is what our State Railroad Commission is for.

California has not been fortunate with its railroad commission. The people have elected its members, or thought they had, for the purpose of dealing justly by shipper and railroad, producer and consumer, traveler and shareholder in the railroads, but for thirty years, and until 1910, the railroads had either made shift to select the commissioners whom the people elected or they were able to buy them up afterward. For this and a variety of other reasons railroad rates have been fixed by the railroads in contravention of an immemorial human experience that toll road owners could not safely be left to fix their own rates of toll. Human greed is so constantly active wherever it has opportunity that it is sure to be a despoiler instead of a benefactor unless held in check.

The courts have also been resorted to, generally, but not always, in the interests of the railroads and upon this just and proper ground: That the rate fixing power must not fix rates so low as to confiscate the property of the railroad, inasmuch as so doing would be depriving the owners of railroads of their property without due process of law, a wickedness so abhorrent to the judicial mind that it will not be tolerated and is clearly unconstitutional.

No exact measure of railroad tolls has yet been reached, but the present-day judicial and administrative concept is that rates must be reasonable. What constitutes reasonableness is a question to be determined in each separate case. This does not limit owners of railroads to interest on the investment, after all operating expenses have been paid, but does tend to prevent those extortionate charges that sometimes take all that the producer can make over and above a meagre living just to get his products to market. With this preliminary view of the railroad regulation problem we shall be in better shape next week to take up our State Railroad Commission in its legal and economic aspects.

Seems ter me that the fellers that allers put off till tomorrer what they can skip doin' to day 'll have a ruther tryin' time when Gab'r'l blows his horn.

The doctors operated on Noah Bangs for appendicitis. The operation was successful, an' it's been a long time sence a funeral in our neighborhood was so largely attended.

They ain't many men that would refuse to do their duty if it could be fixed so it wouldn't be so unhandy.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE

A full line of Theosophical Literature from Point Loma, California, the headquarters of the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society, under the leadership of Katherine Tingley, is now on sale at A. M. Robertson's, 222 Stockton St., S. F., and at Smith Bros., 462 13th St., Oakland, California.

PUBLIC MEN USE

Allen's Press Clippings

to help them keep in touch with every publication in the State. Send your order to 88 First Street, S. F. IT PAYS TO KEEP POSTED.

Day School---Night School

Electrical, Mining, Civil
AND

Automobile Engineering

Architectural Drawing

Wireless and Morse Telegraphy

BOOKKEEPING : SHORTHAND

Our Graduates in Every Department Secure Good Positions

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO

16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved

KRYPTOK

Invisible Bifocal Lenses

181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tels: Oakland 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY

DECEMBER 2 : '10
FIVE CENTS THE COPY

Vol. III Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street: San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH · GOOD COURAGE · GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six Months, $1.25; Three Years, $2.00, In Advance. No. 1.

For Soul and Pocket

IT HAS LONG BEEN RECOGNIZED that an open confession is good for the soul, but it was left for Doctor Frederick Cook to demonstrate that it can also be made effective for replenishing a pocket. Before going into retirement he sold his Cooked-up story of having discovered the north pole to the press and on the rostrum, for upwards of $80,000. Now he has sold for at least another $1,000 his confession that his former story was, if not a fake, at least a yarn of huge improbability. He takes us going and coming and sort of rubs it in on us both ways. By the way, about how mad was he when he wrote that book on the ascent of Mount McKinley that he did not ascend? The Ananias club is the only one in Dr. Cook's home-land likely to keep a latchstring out for his coming.

One or Other

WE CALIFORNIANS ARE NOT prohibitionists if we can have option in its stead, but if option is to prove satisfying it must afford a wider range of choice than between wide-open and half-open rum selling. We must have option by county, city, precinct, what the citizenship in each case wills, or there will be such a campaign for prohibition as will make the rummies rub their eyes. Good people are growing weary of having to whip all the saloons in California to a frazzle as a mere preliminary to doing any good thing.

Another Count Against the Roadhouse

THE ROADHOUSE is, on the whole, the most detestable instrument of inebriety that human depravity has yet invented and, to its indictment, has lately been added a new count, that of responsibility for automobile accidents. With one or two rounds of roadhouse whisky inside him every chauffeur is ready to climb trees with his machine, buck a line of freight cars or try to kick goal with a horse and buggy for a football. Down with the road-houses!

The Sun

ALAS, BRIGHT SUN, that thou shouldst be so soon eclipsed! However, thou wert a hark-from-the-tombs. Thou belongest to an era when every party had to have an organ and every organ had to fight for its party right or wrong. Now the honest citizen only asks of a paper, Who owns it? If the answer be a Spreckels, a De Young or a Hearst; a Calhoun, a Union Trust Company or a Dargée, there is a shaking of the head and a turning away in sadness that, if possible, a paper may be found that is neither a personal organ, a brawling woman in a wide house nor a party hack. It was because the Sun was an announced party hack (and also didn't have capital enough), that it failed to stick, and not because San Francisco does not need a clean, able, honest, untrammelled morning newspaper. It does, but it would take a million dollars to establish one.

Blue Monday

CONGRESS ASSEMBLES MONDAY. It will be a solemn occasion in the shadow of the obsequies, so to speak, of 107 standpatters whose feet will, after the fourth of next March, no more patter adown the aisles of the House. At least there were that number of changes from side to side involved in the late election in that one chamber, not to speak of similar changes foreshadowed in the senate. But let not the unction be cherished in Democratic souls that the country went Democratic. It didn't. It is no nearer Democratic now than it was two years ago. We, the people, merely wanted to give the President a hunch and a Joe Cannon a punch. That will content the country if the President takes the hunch to pick his advisers from his friends rather than from his enemies and, as for Uncle Joe, old as he is, he must cease to do evil and learn to do well or the next punch will settle him.

Dignity of the Courts

MR. JUSTICE HUGHES lately gave expression to some strong statements relative to the necessity for the preservation of the dignity of our courts. That is within the keeping of the courts. If they will establish justice, speedily and without respect to persons or privilege, the gates of hell cannot deprive them of one jot or tittle of the dignity that will be their due. Dignity by any other right will be as empty of honor as the sounding brass of a boarding house gong.

Diaz Inaugurated

PORFIRIO DIAZ has been formally inaugurated president of Mexico. It has got to be a habit with him. A great man is Diaz and all the nice things our American minister, speaking as dean of the diplomatic corps, had to say of and about him were appropriate and true except that he is where he is by the mandate of the people of Mexico. The people of Mexico are as politically undiscovered as they were the morning before the landing of Cortez.

One Thing More

THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION has, in certain instances, ordered reduced the rates for Pullman sleeping car berths, with especial reference to a decent differential between upper and lower. So far so good, but one thing more is requisite. The compelling of the hundred-million-dollar corporation to pay its own porters for services rendered instead of inflicting upon the traveling public a horde of brass buttoned mendicants. To do that would be to strangle the tipping iniquity in its lair.

Stealing Democratic Thunder

A TIP IS OUT that the burden of the President's message will be economy in public expenditure. If so there will be more wrath in Democratic circles than was occasioned by the alleged stealing by Roosevelt of Bryan's isms. It is exactly that kind of thunder that our Democratic friends have been weeks a-pumping, but let us cherish the hope that the President does not especially favor the economy of going without. That would ill become this greatest and richest of nations. What we need is not so much economy as efficiency in expenditure that a dollar of value may be had for every dollar of taxes raised.

Plenty of Indignation

WHATEVER OF GOOD may be said of the people of the west coast metropolis," declares the Rochester (New York) Democrat, "they have shown few symptoms of indignation toward political grafters." Not so. At least 25,000 men of San Francisco have both voiced and voted their indignation for grafters, but the powers of successful rascality, backed by wealth and abetted by judicial "t" crossing and "i" dotting, have proven more potent for injustice than indignation, however righteous, has proven for justice. We San Franciscans are good people, but we are not in the majority.

Oakland's New Charter

It has been said so often as to have lost all its novelty, but no part of its truth, that the problem of government by democracy is the problem of the government of cities. And so it is. Unless the cities within a republic can be properly governed the republic itself cannot be properly governed.

Oakland, among other enterprising cities, is reaching out toward better government, not as San Francisco is trying to do, by whipping the old charter into better shape, but by making a new charter. The outlines of the new document are succinctly laid down in our leading article for the week written by Councilman A. H. Elliot of Oakland, for which favor he has our hearty thanks.

Mr. Elliot likens the government of a city to the government of a corporation. The analogy is strong, but the new charter does not carry that analogy as far as it might have carried it with profit. The directors of a corporation seldom undertake the executive duties of that corporation. The duty of the directorate is administrative rather than executive. The directorate sits in council, determines policies, apportions means, and employs experts to carry out the ideas of the administration. There is a fundamental difference there that even the dictionary does not make wholly clear and yet a difference that the practical working of a city government will make obvious.

The Oakland scheme of government contemplates that the administrators shall be the executives, and this paper doubts the ability of any community to select and elect competent executive heads to the five departments of city government for which Oakland's new charter makes provision, but Oakland voters can select and elect men who are capable of formulating, financing and sustaining constructive municipal policies for skilled specialists to carry out to completion.

In one of his public addresses Councilman Elliot stated that Oakland's new charter does not provide for government by experts; but there cannot be good government without government by experts. No great industrial enterprise, which a city is, can be conducted without expert and trained men at every strategic point from top to bottom. J. Pierpont Morgan knows nothing of practical railroading, but he knows everything about financing railroads and how to secure the practical railroad men needed.

We think that the framers of Oakland's new charter have builded better than they knew, that in the working out of their new scheme of government necessity will compel the five commissioners to sit as a directorate of a great corporation; that the incompetency of each individual commissioner to head his department will compel him to avail himself of an expert assistant or chief to perform the executive tasks of his office so that Oakland will come to have government by experts through an administrative directorate of level headed, but non-expert, citizens who will perform services similar to those performed by a board of directors of a railroad or manufacturers' corporation.

At all events the new charter of Oakland should work out immensely more to the advantage of the ambitious and growing young city than the old system of government by patronage and for patronage.

The Oregon Idea

At the late election Oregon decided to do away with the party convention as an instrument for selecting delegates to the national conventions of the great political parties and, in its stead, permit the electors at a direct primary to determine who shall go to such conventions and for whom they shall stand for presidential candidates of their respective parties. California must make some provi-

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage.

Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application.

Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

Copyright 1910

sion for sending delegates to the national conventions to be held early in 1912. The people will not tolerate that the delegates elected to county conventions at the August primary in 1910 select the delegates to the state conventions that are to name delegates to the national conventions in 1912, although that is the way the law now stands. There must be provided some means for ascertaining popular preferences of a more contemporaneous character, and why not adopt the Oregon idea of expressing state-wide preferences for national candidates? Another state primary of some sort must be held between August 12, 1910, and May 1, 1912, and why not for electing and instructing delegates to national conventions as well as for electing delegates to county conventions to elect delegates to state conventions to elect delegates to national conventions? Here is something for legislators to think over. Oregon is something of an aurora borealis for the lighting of California's political feet and this light is a good deal safer guide than, for instance, the dark of the moon.

The Viper's Sting

If there be a man in this bay district of California for whom all good people, male and female, cherish an abiding affection that man is Rev. Charles R. Brown, for fourteen years pastor of the First Congregational church of Oakland. A gifted pulpiteer, a sympathetic and ministering pastor, a wise counselor in time of perplexity and trouble, he carried the sorrows and trials of his congregation until the burden broke down his health and forced him to resign his pastorate.

There was no man in this bay cities community who stood more strongly for what was right, who gave to Mr. Spreckels and Mr. Heney more loyal support, than Rev. Charles R. Brown. In his church he held a monster meeting of men to listen to Mr. Heney and to do honor to Mr. Spreckels, and there were packed into that church not less than 2,500 earnest men, men who dared to stand for Right Things, and what men could do they did to encourage the fight for right in San Francisco. From his own pulpit he denounced graft somewhat as the Master he serves denounced the scribes and the pharisees and the hypocrites of his time.

The malefactors waited their opportunity, waited his resignation and the eve of his departure for another field and another calling, and then put vipers in his path to sting him. A gutter weekly was the first to strike, not boldly and directly, but by innuendo, suggestion, slur and foul breath. Then the Examiner took it up and did its malignant worst, and now every injurious tongue is wagging, the occasion being an honest friendship between Dr. Brown and a lady member of his church. The cause evidently was the determination of the associated villanies to find some means of tarnishing a hitherto unblemished reputation, thereby to take a sweet revenge upon an enemy to their ilk.

Every popular pastor that ever was was daily and hourly menaced by the presence in his parish of sentimental, morbid womanhood, and nothing could be more natural or praiseworthy than that the wife of every such pastor should strive to safeguard her husband against that risk, for, be it remembered, the reputation of every social exemplar, as every pastor must be, is peculiarly vulnerable. As with a mirror so with such a personality, every injurious breath tarnishes, but unfortunately the tarnish is not so easily removed as from the surface of a mirror.

Nothing could be more natural also than that a wife of a pastor may sometimes misjudge a worthy but delicately organized woman for one of these ever effervescent human bottles of smelling salts always languishing about the person of "that dear man," her pastor. Mrs. Brown confesses that she misjudged Mrs. Martin when she snubbed her, unfortunately in the presence of others. That set tongues wagging, the reporters got wind of it and as lamentable an incident as comes to the recollection is the result. The plaint of Mrs. Martin, that Dr. Brown should have stopped the wagging of tongues forthwith, affords some insight into her mental make-up. As well might he be required to stop the playing over the surface of the arid west of those vagrant, summer whirlwinds that constantly do whip the dust into spiral columns joining heaven and earth. It cannot be done.

We none of us know another as God knows us all, but if it would advantage the Reverend Doctor Charles Reynolds Brown to carry with him where he goes the affidavits of 2,000 or 2,500 reputable men and women, members of his congregation, setting forth their unqualified confidence in him as a Christian gentleman, loyal husband, a faithful and pure-minded pastor and counsellor (and that whoever avers to the contrary lies), he can have them for the intimation that he would like a trunkful of them, excess baggage charges prepaid.

Redress Dr. Brown has none, for nothing is charged against him. He is but paying the price that an aggressive decency must pay for being decent and aggressive. It is a toll exacted by the indecent and the cowardly, but being decent and aggressively militant for right is worth even that price.

Another Hichborn History?

Franklin Hichborn's "Story of the California Legislature of 1909" was a potent factor in the last election. It forced candidates to face their records, and those who could not were dropped out of sight. It is important that another such record be kept and published for the legislature of 1911, but to make such a book effective it must have an entirely non-partisan support. Mr. Hichborn cannot afford to attempt another such enterprise. In spite of all that he and his friends could do to sell his book, its publication proved a losing venture and he is not financially able to pocket another such loss. Nor can he accept the proffered aid of any man of means through fear that the charge of bias of mind might defeat the purpose of the book, which was and is to write history as he sees it from day to day in the making. There is only one way in which the publication of a history of the legislature of 1911 can be financed without impairment of the validity of that history when published, and that is by having the books subscribed for in advance by persons who, severally, wish to have such a history published. It will require 1,200 volumes at $1.50 per volume to sustain the enterprise. Elsewhere in this paper will be found a form of order for that book. That form may either be cut out, filled out and sent to Mr. Hichborn, or a letter can be written embodying the substance of the filled out form. The 1,200 responses should result from this one appeal to the readers of The California Weekly. The purpose of that history is to set down in black and white the record that every legislator makes. If any legislator make a good record he is entitled to the full benefit of it, if a bad record his constituents are entitled to know it. Mr. Hichborn is qualified for that task. It is a task important to be performed. Give it a lift.

Justice Sustains Defeat

The supreme court of California, by a four to three decision, has granted Louis Glass, the grafter, a new trial, which means that he will escape the penitentiary, for Lonergan is dead, Gallagher has been spirited out of the country to stay out, and the machinery of justice is in the hands of men not likely to be over-zealous in enforcing the laws against genteel personages affiliated with the House of Graft. Nothing is now likely to come of anything.

Any man on the street, being asked to conjecture the line-up on a divided supreme court, in such a case would unerringly and off-hand have placed Henshaw, Lorigan and Melvin on the one side, with Sloss, Shaw and Angelotti on the other, the determining factor being Chief Justice Beatty. Unfortunately for the vindication of justice the Chief Justice sided with the three first mentioned. It would be unjust to him to suppose that he reached the conclusions that they did through processes similar to those by which his colleagues reached their decision. Chief Justice Beatty merely belongs to the old order that changes not, but an order that must change or justice will be defeated as often as the letter of the law can be placed above the establishment of justice. His special, concurring opinion will be looked for with great interest and treated with great respect. Likewise the dissenting opinions of Sloss, Shaw and Angelotti will be awaited with solicitude.

As we gather it from the daily press reports the decision went off on two main points; the admission of evidence going to show that Glass was up to the same sort of skulduggery in Oakland that he had employed in San Francisco, the failure of Judge Lawlor gravely to inform the jury that they were not to consider that the refusal of Zimmer to testify implied that if he had testified he would have testified to the injury of Glass.

This may be law. This paper is not saying that it is not, but if it is it is fool law and should have no place in jurisprudence. A common sense jury, had the judge made his instruction never so strong, would have disregarded it, for it was as plain to every sane person cognizant of the facts as the nose on the human visage that the refusal of Zimmer to testify was for the precise purpose of shielding Glass, and, as the event has proven, it did shield him, not from the infamy of being a grafter, that will stick, but from the degradation of wearing stripes that he richly deserves to wear.

As for the other point, the general bad character of a criminal of low degree somehow goes to every jury before whom such criminal is tried, and the general bad financial character of a criminal of high degree should go to the jury as certainly. The failure of justice in the Glass case is to be lamented. Every such jolt shakes our institutions like an earthquake. Every such decision causes every mind to differentiate the personnel of every bench into sheep and goats. And verily they are severally known for what they are.

Justice Is Vindicated

Last week this paper went to press immediately upon receipt of the news that the appellate court had sustained the conviction of Ruef, but opportunity was not afforded for comment upon the decision. That decision was worthy of comment. It was a surprise. It was not generally believed or hoped that the appellate court would be able to rise to the requirements of justice. To sustain their decision the appellate bench were logically forced to conclude: that $200,000 in gold was placed in the mint to the credit of Patrick Calhoun; that at the request of Tiley L. Ford that gold was exchanged for currency, was taken out by Ford in currency and was by him paid to Ruef; that Ruef handed over $85,000 of this sum to Gallagher and that Gallagher paid over all but $15,000 of it, which he kept for himself, to the supervisors.

Here then, as a basis of the decision for sustaining the conviction of Ruef, is the precise state of facts necessary to be proved, and which were proved, for the conviction of Calhoun, Ford and the rest of the United Railroads bunch of grafters. The conviction of Ruef convicts them, alas, not judicially, but morally, intellectually, socially, every way in the world in which scoundrelism can be convicted of scoundrelism except the way that puts scoundrelism behind bars.

But let not Abe Ruef mourn as one without hope. The decision in the Glass case, just handed down from the supreme court, must be no small comfort for him. It is true that he is not in a class with Glass, Calhoun, Henshaw, Lorigan and Melvin. He has not the entree to San Francisco's best society, but he has a mouth and he can testify and his testimony can be so corroborated as to give it validity. A new administration is soon to be inducted into office at Sacramento, an administration not unlikely to take the prosecutions of San Francisco's grafters out of unworthy hands to be placed in hands that are worthy. Let not Ruef despair. His chance of defeating justice is still many times better than that of many dead men, better than that of many men now living will be when they are dead. His co-conspirators cannot safely desert him yet. What can be done for him will be done, and it is rarely that flaws in proceedings cannot be found if diligently looked for, as they will be. Not until that mouth of his forgets its cunning will Abe Ruef find himself, deserted, on foot and alone in striped misery.

It Might Have Been Prevented

The December Everybody's Magazine contains an illuminating article on the great timber conflagration that raged last August in Idaho and Montana, a veritable world afire. The lives lost probably exceeded 200, the forests burned approximated 2,000 square miles, the market value of the timber as it stood was $100,000,000, the young timber was worth $50,000,000, the loss to the settlers, the railroads, the earners of possible wages, make the total reach, if not exceed, $650,000,000, a destruction of wealth that a thousand years can scarcely replace. All this could have been prevented.

What was needed to prevent it? Trails and horses and men, not then but years before. A great part of the burned district was inaccessible. The unusual happened in that district, much as it happened in San Francisco April 18, 1906, only it was hurricane and fire instead of earthquake and fire. In the one case there were no trails and few horses; in the other case there were no cisterns, independent reservoirs of water or auxiliary systems for salt water fire fighting. There had been neglect. In San Francisco that neglect was due to apathy, official and individual. In Montana and Idaho the neglect was chiefly due to opposition on the part of those who see in conservation the loss of a chance to grab. The burning of San Francisco did not entail a greater loss, direct and consequential, than did the burning of that 2,000 square miles of forest. There are other forests awaiting the conjunction of hurricane and fire. Shall they also be neglected until that conjunction removes the need for care?

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Of all evils that afflict humanity there is nothing more terrible than insanity. Between genius and feeble mindedness there is a deal of irrationalism that is exasperating but that does not amount to insanity, and for which there is probably no remedy. Society must endure it because it cannot cure it, but there are forms of insanity of which there is more hope of effecting both cures and preventions.

A recent good authority states that 14 to 21 per cent. of all insanity is due to what is commonly called "softening of the brain," or paresis, and that eighty-five or ninety per cent. of this form of the disease is due to syphilitic taint which, of course, is preventable. Alcoholism is chargeable with being the occasion if not the cause of nearly 30 per cent. of the insanity that goes to institutions for treatment, and this, too, is preventable.

But there is another large percentage of downright insanity that is every whit as certainly within our own keeping as syphilitic taint or alcoholic excess, and this is classed as "bad habits of the mind." As surely as "the earth hath bubbles as the water has," so surely the mind hath habits as the body has, the mental vision as certainly as the eye. It is a misfortune to be cross-eyed, but it is a calamity to have the eye turned in so that it is ever and always searching the inner recesses of the mind and heart. God knows that humanity is ugly enough on the outside, but it is nothing to what it is inside!

And yet there are those who never tire of looking in upon themselves. They must relate every outward fact to the inward state. Such persons are intellectual cave-dwellers. They early become what people call "queer," and as they grow older they become queerer and more queer until, having approached or passed the meridian of life, they become so queer as to have to be shut up.

A certain woman was overheard talking to a friend through a telephone and the burden of her conversation was: "Oh, the day has been hideous. It dragged from morning 'till night. I have been so unhappy! No, I have not felt like going out anywhere. I have preferred to be alone with my thoughts, depressing though they have been. Go to bed early? Oh! what's the use? It isn't likely that I'll sleep or, if I do, more than likely my dreams will be as unbearable as my thoughts. I don't know what to do. Sometimes it seems as though I must go mad. No one seems to understand me or have any consideration for me. And the children! They seem to be possessed. They won't be still a minute and every shout they give cuts me like a knife. Good-bye."

What ailed this woman? Not a thing in the world. She had everything that the heart could desire, a fond husband, bright children, money to burn. Her eyes were turned in and, of course, there was nothing inside worth looking at. An interior view of a morbid personality is enough to give anyone the horrors. What that woman needed was a downright misfortune to be followed up with a sentence to unrelenting hard labor for others.

There are thousands of such women, and some men. They live what we call shut-in lives. They are self incarcerated jailbirds. Unmarried persons are especially vulnerable to this form of malady. Such a man were better off with a Xantippe for a wife, and such a woman were happier almost with a husband who came home roaring drunk three nights in the week and for the support of whom she would have to take in back stairs to scrub. Many a case of morbid sorrow has been cured by a real sorrow. Many a fancied grievance has been remedied by a real grievance, but there are better remedies than these which may be applied at no greater cost than a little effort. "Look up and not down, look out and not in," that was the advice of one of the healers of the nations and if uniformly followed by morbid persons would relieve society of as much insanity as would the elimination of either syphilis or alcoholism.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Why Your Pocketbook Is Flat

Recently the United States census bureau issued a bulletin in which it compared the average prices of certain leading food staples in the decade between 1890 and 1900 with the average prices of the same articles in 1909. Here, in brief, are the data it gives: Beef increased 32 per cent. in price, mutton increased 35 per cent., salt pork and bacon 80 per cent., ham 45 per cent., veal 30 per cent., bread 24 per cent., butter 35 per cent., coffee 8.6 per cent., eggs 42 per cent., flour 54 per cent., milk 41 per cent., potatoes 20 per cent. This is an average increase of 37.22 per cent. in the twelve staples enumerated. The census bureau in this bulletin does not give the increase in clothing prices, but probably personal experience will suggest to the reader that it has not far from kept pace with the increase in food prices. Now comes the pertinent question: Has your income been increased more than 37 per cent.—or, say, by three-eighths—during the time under consideration? If it has, possibly you are not aware that you have been hit, but if it has not you should experience no difficulty in deciding why your pocketbook presents such a ghastly appearance in these days. Somebody must be making money from these increased prices. Will the members of the common rabble please speak up at once and say if it is they? What, no voices! Surprising situation, is it not?

Money in Unaddressed Envelopes

Two or three items in the British postmaster-general's annual report are sufficiently striking to be of general interest. For instance, as against our western idea that a cent is of small moment, it may be mentioned that since letter postage to the United States has been reduced to two cents the amount of the letter mails has been increased by 32 per cent. Evidently our thrifty British cousins look upon a cent as of some consequence. But, while foreign mails have increased, local mails have decreased, presumably because the English are using the telephone rather than write a letter. It might appear improbable that people who consider cents in postage would send money through the mails in unaddressed envelopes or so carelessly wrapped that it would be found loose in the mail sacks. Yet, during the year covered by the report loose or unaddressed money was found as follows: In cash and bank notes, $75,635; in checks, drafts and stamps, $3,163,525, which is a neat little total of $3,239,160. When it is considered that this money might just as well have been given to any one of us as to have been sent loose through the mails—or perhaps it might—the full significance of the blow will be felt. Curious how closely hand in hand egregious carelessness and rigid economy do walk.

The Kaiser Needs a Yacht

The people of Germany are considering a proposition to donate money to buy a new steam yacht for the Kaiser. The royal gentleman already has a steam yacht which to most of us would seem palatial, but it is realized that he ought to have something more modern. Like other enlightened nations, Germany is deeply concerned about how its pauper problem shall be solved—but the Kaiser needs a new yacht. There are poor, gaunt wretches who seek work and cannot find it—what can citizens spare for the Kaiser's yacht? There are pale women who know not whence tomorrow's meals shall come—it is hoped that a grateful people will not forget the Kaiser's new yacht. There are little children who know the pangs of hunger, and babes who die for lack of sustenance—prithce, consider how a new yacht would become the Kaiser. Hunger, and hunger's anguish; destitution, and the rags which are Destitution's banner—let nobody overlook the hat when it is passed for the Kaiser's yacht. Ah, our gifts do shoot grossly wide of the mark of need; and, if you doubt it, note how they go on the Christmas Day that approaches.

She Took a Long Nap

The case of Caroline Kronboeck, of Oknoe, Sweden, gives the impression that Rip Van Winkle may have been a light sleeper, for she is outclassed only by the princess of the fairy tale whom the prince awaked from her slumber of one hundred years. Caroline, who then was fourteen years old, went to sleep in the winter of 1877-78, and from then until a few weeks ago her siesta was unbroken. Even while her friends were administering nourishment to her she continued to sleep. Not long ago she awoke as an aging woman, and it hardly need be said that nearly 33 years of her life was an absolute blank to her. What she had learned in childhood she remembered, and among her first demands was one that she be permitted to continue her studies from where she left them. Some of her schoolmates were grandparents, but it took her long to realize the fact. In conclusion, it may be well to say that the foregoing account is given on the faith of newspaper narration, but it appears probable that there is a considerable amount of truth in it.

Three Women and Three Hats

Most of the London churches are old, and their aisles are extremely narrow. Moreover, the London women wear their perfectly lovely big hats to church and wear them throughout the service, the ladies having discovered that they can worship successfully even when the persons behind them have not much of a show to do so. It follows that when two of the large hats try to go down the narrow aisle together something unpleasant happens. However, the climax of such unpleasantness was reached when three women mixed their hats in one particularly narrow aisle after a wedding ceremony the other day. It was a hopeless mixture. Hatpins, feathers and shrubbery all were in one tangle, and the more the women struggled and thought even more than they said to one another, the more hopelessly enmeshed did the three "lids" become and the more incensed were their wearers. Personal warfare seemed imminent, when three noble men heroically stepped to the front and held the women while three other men, only less heroic, disentangled the hats and gave liberty to their fair owners. The incident would be unworthy of note were it not that it is humbly trusted that it will serve as a solemn warning to the heroines of the big hats in American churches. Of course one may worship without once seeing the clergyman, but it interferes; undoubtedly it interferes. The ladies should beware. Their hats, too, may become tangled some day. And then!

The Briton's Hunting Expense Account

His ludship dotes on hunting, and consequently he keeps hounds. He rides to the chase, and accordingly he keeps horses, although an American cowboy could give him cards and spades in the riding game and then beat him seven to four, a fact which does not disturb his ludship. But the hunting game comes high. The London Outlook reports that there now are in Great Britain 443 packs of hounds comprising about 30,000 dogs, the annual keep of which amounts to about $2,500,000. Then there are 200,000 horses, the maintenance of which costs about $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 annually. Summing up, the Outlook calculates that the capital invested in hunting amounts to $60,000,000, while the annual expenses of the game (including interest on investment) are about $30,000,000 or $35,000,000. Evidently his ludship has a good time, but it is whispered that the life-game, as played by some other Englishmen, is less enjoyable.

The World's Largest Hotel

The largest hotel in the world is located—Before we proceed any farther let the reader amuse himself by guessing its place of location. Ten guesses allowed, and unless the reader already is informed it is very certain that not one of the guesses will be successful. For this largest hostelry is located—of all unlikely places—in Jerusalem. Think of that! In a city whose glory long since has departed! In a land once flowing with milk and honey, but now largely given up to sand and sagebrush! The hotel is owned and managed by Russians, and its patrons also are Russians. It has rooms for 10,000 guests, and in addition has cottages for families in which still more of its guests may sleep. Entering its portals, one readily may feel that one is in Russia. An American colony which makes the Golden Rule its one religious tenet—and, by the way, runs a one-price store—also is a feature of the reviving Jerusalem. So, various nationalities are in evidence in the old city of the Jews, but the German is the predominating influence there, and the largest of the churches, built in the shadow of the holy sepulcher, was erected by Germans for their worship.

The Rev. Effie M. Jones, a Universalist minister of Iowa, is spoken of by the newspapers of Berlin as having made the greatest impression oratorically of all the speakers heard at the recent world's congress of Free Christians and Religious Liberals. The German newspapers dilate on Dr. Jones's impressive appearance, the carrying power of her voice, her self-possession and her wise and witty sayings. Among the other women who spoke at this congress were Mrs. Clara T. Guild, the head of the Tuckerman School for Pastors' Assistants in Boston, and Mrs. Herbert Smith and Miss Helen Herford of London.

1911 IMPRESSIONS CALENDAR 50 Cents

No calendar has been produced by any publisher the equal of this in value and beauty at the price asked. It consists of fifty-four beautiful motto leaves decorated with original designs printed in many colors. Size 6 1/4 x 10 inches. Tastefully boxed. Price 50 cents, by mail 60 cents.

The work of our publishing department is all produced in San Francisco and is creditably known in all parts of the United States and in many foreign countries. It includes many books and booklets, cards and calendars suitable for holiday giving—to Eastern friends and those in distant countries as well as to those at home. All of these publications are described in an illustrated booklet entitled "PLEASANT PAGES," interestingly written by Arthur Guiterman and full of timely suggestion. Call at our shop, or, if not convenient, send for a copy. There is no charge. It will be gladly given or mailed to you.

A splendid stock of calendars of all varieties and prices, cards, pictures and objects of art value is displayed in our ART ROOMS.

PAUL ELDER & CO.

Books and Art

239 Grant Ave.,

San Francisco

The California Weekly
IS PRINTED BY
Donaldson & Moir
PRINTERS
330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

"THE VANISHED RUIN ERA"

"The Vanished Ruin Era" is a book which should appeal to two classes of people: First, to San Franciscans and Californians because both in its profuse duotone illustrations and in its descriptive verse, the latter by Louis J. Stellmann, it deals with the most tremendous physical event in the history of the Golden State; second, to readers elsewhere because that event—the destruction of San Francisco—was the loosing of such elemental forces as aroused the interest of all civilized mankind.

In beginning Mr. Stellman apostrophises the smitten city thus:

"My city! alas, my city!
I saw you, in anguish, slain;
And all of the world is bitter
With Memory's blighting pain."

A picture of a shattered fragment of the city accompanies this verse. And so, by verse and realistic illustration, the course of the city is followed through the days of gloom that accompanied the disaster and through the potent days of rebuilding that followed, until Mr. Stellman at last can write:

"Again, in my heart is comfort;
Again, in my soul is rest.
No more do I wander, homeless—
Oh, City—I-Love-the-Best."

The handsomely illustrated book will make an attractive souvenir of the greatest calamity recorded in the history of American cities.

Paul Elder & Co., San Francisco. $2.50, net.

OF DISSECTING LITERATURE

A clipping from a recent issue of the Educational Review (quoted below, in smaller type) touches upon a tender spot in our American teaching, both secondary and university, where that teaching affects the appreciation of English literature. The clipping is as follows:

A Changed Sorbonne

During the last decade a complete revolution has been effected in the study of literature in the higher educational institutions of France. Although the old titles of the university professorships remain, everything else which once gave character and direction to the instruction carried on under the jurisdiction of the faculty of letters—philosophy, history, literature, in short, the humanities—has been wholly changed.

No one can doubt that the atmosphere of the Sorbonne has changed. In the celebrated courses, the real defenders and representatives of the highest and best in French culture, where once were found general concepts and insights stated with elegant precision, sound literary taste, refined distinctions, sober and measured syntheses, nothing is now spoken of but scientific method and bibliographies.

The personal interpretation of great authors and the critical analysis of their thoughts have given way to philological annotation, to the study of sources and to the chronology and interdependence of texts. One is impressed above all by the sharply defined and highly organized plan of study, like that which is characteristic of the German university seminars. Patient drudgery and minutely learned research have little by little gained control of the entire teaching, and were it not for certain courses that are spoken of with scant respect one would not know where to look for any trace of the old fashioned classical culture.

Nobody who has attended an American high school or university in the last ten years can fail to recall a parallel of this experience. The idea of teachers of English seems to be that literature is a science rather than an art, and that the way to learn to enjoy literature is to study it as a skeleton or micro-organism rather than as a living, pulsating thing of beauty. Analysis is their watchword, analysis of structure. The result has been that students have been taught to dissect works of literature as they have been taught to dissect flowers in their botany classes. The theory seems to be that the joy of literature is the joy of knowing its mechanics and of seeing the wheels go round. And every student of natural sympathy for books has felt what a refinement of cruelty this method is.

We would not cry down this method for specialists. There must be bookmen who know the mechanics of the art, and bookmen whose researches shall constantly correct misimpressions and keep alive the historical facts surrounding the compositions of great works. We complain only when this method is applied to the beginner in the study of letters and to the general reading public and to those guardians of public taste who perpetuate taste because they have it themselves. For the beginner and for the general reader it is of no importance to know the bibliographies of Shakespeareana, but, on the contrary, it is of supreme importance to them to have the beauties of Shakespeare called to their attention, the potentialities for pleasure in reading Shakespeare. Once make him, in any way, an allurements to them, and they will follow him gladly, of their own volition. Once gently persuade them to read him, and the power of his dramatic appeal, or the intensity of his stories, or the sweetness of his philosophy, or the glory of his verse, will lead them on. Then, once they become disciples, it is time enough to ask them to become adepts. Then, of their own will, they will wish to know the more technical details: how this effect was produced, why that line was phrased as it is, who his contemporaries were, and the rest of the analytical facts that now load down our college courses.

The whole thing is gone at wrong end to. We do not try to interest a child in reading by propounding to him Grimm's Law of the Permutation of Consonants. Instead, we read Grimm's Fairy Tales to him, pleasing his fancy and creating an appetite for more. And yet, when we get this child into high school, we give him long disquisitions on the permutations of the ballad form of verse and then ask him to read "The Ancient Mariner" with a weather eye out for Coleridge's skill in adaptation, instead of with a spirit open to fresh impressions of beauty, which is what Coleridge was striving to convey. Coleridge, as a craftsman, would have appreciated this compliment to his skill, but Coleridge, as a poet, would have felt poorly repaid for his labor if the public at large had noticed the form instead of the beauty of his lines.

In fact, for the public at large, it is an impertinence to tell it how a writer produces his effects. The effects themselves are the sole concern of the public, and properly so. They do not want to know the labor behind the effect. The hardest work the author has to do is to conceal that labor. And yet the teacher of English insists most upon exposing that labor. It does seem too bad that the schools should impertinently undertake to do what geniuses have exhausted their resources of art to prevent.

And, finally, as we have so often tried to point out on this page, science and art have no business traveling together. The artist has need to know the science of his art—and as much other science as he has time to absorb—but the public does not, and the attempt to apply scientific standards to the appreciation of art is at one blow to fail to establish such a science and to destroy the appreciation itself.

HENRY ARTHUR JONES

One of the most distinguished dramatists of the day is visiting America. An interview published in the New York Times gives some interesting facts about his personality, opinions and career. It is, in part, as follows:

Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, who shares with Sir Arthur Pinero the leading place among English dramatists, and who is in this country on a business trip, is certainly a man of enthusiasms. In appearance he is slight and what we term English-looking. In age he must be approaching 60, but it is the biographical dictionary and not his appearance that supplies this information. When he talks he is a man of early middle age, and when he fights he is a youth of vigor and intrepidity.

"I am," said Mr. Jones cheerfully, by way of beginning conversation, "a monomaniac. Nothing but the drama interests me."

One cannot contradict a visitor or a celebrity, and indeed this statement is, in a wide sense, true. Mr. Jones is interested in the drama first and last, but the definition that he gives to that phrase includes about all of human life. He finds nothing alien to him, for the course of human passions, the light and shade of the comedy and tragedy that go on all about him are parts of his art as he understands it.

Mr. Jones has been a voluminous writer. He has some thirty plays to his credit. He is writing now, and he expects to be writing many years from now. The longer he watches the everyday drama about him the more eager he becomes to present it faithfully to the stage; but his intense interest in the matter carries him into all its related phases. He talks interestingly about his own work, but you cannot keep him long on personalities. His ideas on every conceivable topic connected with the stage explode in the course of a few moments, and you find yourself in the presence of that interesting and rare specimen, the unconquerable idealist.

"I am a dramatist because I couldn't help it," said Mr. Jones.

"I was born in the country among the strictest people, who thought dancing and playing the devil's own work. In my boyhood I never saw a play or heard any talk about such subjects. I never was in a theatre until I was 18 years old, but two years before that, all alone and certainly utterly unencouraged, I had written a great drama of my own. So you see there was nothing for me to do but become a playwright."

"I had the luck to have an early success in the 'Silver King,' and then I was free to follow my bent. People speak of me as a man of many successes. I suppose one in three of my plays has been successful. I don't believe any author has more than that to his credit, but the public is so good-natured that it forgets all about the failures and remembers only the things that it liked."

"My greatest success in England was 'The Liars.' Over here I believe it has been 'Mrs. Dane's Defense.' I suppose 'Mrs. Dane' is my strongest play. Personally, I like 'Michael and His Lost Angel' best. I think it is the play I felt most deeply. Maybe as parents sometimes love their least attractive child the most, I may be mistaken about Michael."

"Are you not especially pleased with the technique of 'Mrs. Dane'? Mr. Jones was asked. "The scene in which the lawyer questions Mrs. Dane, meaning to help her, and succeeds in entangling her, is thought by many people to be the most thrilling act they ever saw. The suspense is kept up until the audience is fairly weak with excitement and sympathy for Mrs. Dane."

Mr. Jones nodded. "That scene certainly gave me as much trouble as any I ever wrote," he said. "But the odd thing about it was that I kept turning it over in my head for weeks, and then suddenly it all came, and I wrote the act at a single sitting. Although there are only two people in it, and there are seven or eight in the big scene of 'The Liars,' 'Mrs. Dane' gave me more trouble."

"Do you not think that there has in recent years been a change in the attitude of the public toward the drama—that it has come to be more thoughtful?"

Mr. Jones looked serious for a while. "I will say," he ventured at last, "that there has been created within recent years a very appreciative public. I do not know that the mass of theatregoers take a more intelligent interest in the drama than they did, but there is now a small audience to which the author can make a serious appeal."

"Do you not think that the theatre is bound to take over more and more the function that the church alone held as a moral influence?"

"Well," said Mr. Jones, "the ways in which the church and the theatre approach moral questions are quite different. The church says 'Thou shalt' and 'Thou shalt not,' and the theatre says, 'You can do as you choose, but this is what will happen.' Plays that show life as it really is, and the consequences that follow the complications of life are, of course, full of moral influence, but we have got to make the public understand that."

THE GREEN STREET CHURCH

A CHURCH SOCIAL CENTRE FOR UPLIFT IN NORTH BEACH

Out in the North Beach district, where the French and Mexican "quarters" touch and merge into the Italian quarter, in the midst of the swarming gray frame buildings stands a building of red brick, offering a striking contrast to the rest in color, solidity and lofty impressiveness. It is a bit of New England dropped down into westernmost California, and in the heart of California's Old World settlement at that. It is a bit of Congregational Puritanism set down in the midst of Romantic Catholicism. It is the Green Street Congregational Church.

But it is a great deal more than that which the name church implies. The churchly spire conceals a roof playground. The churchly vestibule opens into passages that lead to gymnasium and shower baths. The churchly auditorium, with its pulpit and organ loft, open upon occasion into rooms where chess is played or where sewing machines whirl in the sewing classes. It is a church where you may pray or box, sing hymns or ragtime ballads, read the Bible or the latest novels, hear a sermon or a concert. And it is a church open all day of every day, and the evenings as well. It is a church, a social settlement, a civic centre and a recreation place, in one. The social activities receive the hearty endorsement of the Associated Charities of San Francisco and have the commendation of the Sage Foundation.

The pastor has an odd name but a very earnest purpose. His ambition is to make the church truly of the people, touching their lives hourly, informally, intimately, sanctifying the everyday activities with the higher ideals of Christianity, making religion an actual force in every hour of the day.

Naturally, such a conception of ministry is at the opposite pole from the formal or the conventional. Rev. E. L. Walz—he would rather have the Reverend left off—lives in the church, to begin with. He thus practices his own precept, makes the church, for himself, the centre of a daily routine of life, brings into his own experience the constant suggestion of higher things. At the church he is constantly at the call of those who wish to see him: his callers are mainly those who are in trouble—men out of work, parents solicitous for their wayward child, the sick, the despairing. All receive sympathetic attention and practical aid. In the last four years, Mr. Walz has lent much money to men and women to whom these small loans meant the turning point in life: some they released from the loan sharks, some they tided over the illness of the bread winner, some they rescued from the despair of desperate necessity, some even from the brink of suicide. And the surprising and heartening fact is that not only have the loans been met with genuine thanks but the borrowers have paid or are paying them back. One man, his wife ill and he out of work and in the grip of the loan sharks, borrowed fifty dollars, which he is now paying back at the rate of fifty cents a week.

But Mr. Walz does not merely sit in his church and wait for the opportunities for service to knock at his door. A large part of the day he spends in searching for these opportunities. He and his helpers have made, sometimes once a year and sometimes twice, a house-to-house canvass of the North Beach district, inquiring for cases of illness, of indigence, or of other forms of distress that they could help relieve.

Not at all that the function of his church is primarily philanthropic. Rather the reverse. That function is preventive rather than curative. What he wishes to do is to supply so much of recreation and wholesome exercise to the youth especially that they will find the church a more entertaining place than the questionable resorts with which the neighborhood abounds. If the young people find the excitement and amusement they crave here in the midst of refining and uplifting surroundings, they will be kept away from the sordid and glittering attractions of the dance halls and from the unguarded freedom of the streets.

This is the explanation of the varied equipment of the church building. Young people cannot be attracted solely by hymns and prayers. But they can be attracted by a gymnasium equipped with $700 worth of apparatus and with hot and cold shower baths, where they are freely welcome and where a capable instructor discloses to them unsuspected possibilities for pleasure in the exercise of the muscles in drills and boxing and the expert use of swings and bars and mats. Children to whom often-repeated Sunday school lessons would be a bore, find delight in the open roof garden, where they can play or dance or slide to their hearts' content. Men whom daily sermons would weary are glad of a place to play chess, in comfortable quarters, far preferable to the noise and vulgarity of the bar-room.

That these things have a refining influence, wielded so unobtrusively that it is scarcely noticed, is illustrated by one little incident. Mr. Walz had made no objection to the boys smoking cigarettes in certain parts of the building—he was content to leave them to their own habits so long as he could keep them from worse things. But one day he quietly asked them to think it over: they could keep on or quit as they saw fit, but he wanted them to decide, on their own initiative. Without hesitation they announced that they would "cut it out" around the church, and without further ado they did so and have maintained the rule of their own will.

That is the spirit of the place. It is a democracy. It is literally these people's own church. They regard the pastor as their friend and equal. He has preached to them, prayed with them, lent them books, joined in their social relaxations, and boxed with their best athletes. He is simply the keeper of the house: otherwise he is one of themselves. He has never attempted to proselyte. The devout Catholic who worships in no church but that presided over by the priest, is made to feel as free to accept the other hospitalities of the Green Street church as a regular member of the congregation. The results desired are prevention of sociological evils and the application of a workaday religious influence to human lives. Creeds, or even acceptance of any formal generalization about Christianity, are not considered. There are other churches enough for that kind of work.

The history of the Green Street church is interesting. In one building or another, the congregation has used the present site for fifty years. Seven years ago, Mr. Walz, who had done settlement work in New York City, took charge, and altered the character of the church's mission from that of a conventional house of worship to that of an institutional church. Three years later the fire swept the church edifice away and disorganized its work. Mr. Walz and his wife made three trips to the east to secure funds, collecting there two-thirds of a necessary $40,000. The present church was built especially to accommodate the kind of classes and social activities he wanted, and the work of organization was resumed. Today, the church reaches from 300 to 1,000 people a week in one or another of its varied activities.

The congregation is as interesting as the church. North Beach has always been noted for its sturdy Americanism as well as for its cosmopolitanism. Many old families of native stock have clung to the district from early days, and have preserved the native traditions intact. This element is represented in the congregation of the Green Street church. In fact, nearly every state in the Union is represented. Of foreign countries, those so diverse as Finland and Armenia have natives in attendance. There are also Germans, French, Mexicans and, of course, many Italians. The Italians, by the way, when one remove from their fatherland, are distinguishable from the native born Americans in very few ways. They are assimilated quickly and almost completely into the life about them.

The work of the church is now at a point where it could be greatly widened in its activities and influence if the means were available, means either in the sense of voluntary helpers or of money. For example, classes in English for foreigners using any of several languages would at once attract to the church, and bring under its influence, large groups of people whose interests it does not yet reach. More teachers of physical culture could be used. Here are opportunities for people who speak other languages or who are good all-round athletes to be of genuine service in their spare hours.

The rewards are nothing at all in money but large in human returns. Mr. Walz, for instance, has repeatedly had men whom he has befriended return after many days to remind him of their gratitude and to tell him that his interest had meant to them a new lease on a life of usefulness at an hour of utter darkness, some even literally a new lease on life at the brink of self-destruction. And he still receives letters from boys whom he rescued from the life of the streets and saloons, telling him of their steady progress in paths of usefulness and honor. These are the rewards of his labor, and, as Mr. Walz says, "it is worth while."

Mr. Walz is not alone in his work. He is assisted by two men and their wives, men attached in an official way to the Congregational Church but who devote their spare time, out of sheer love of the work, to the development of the social influence of the institution. And the superintendent of the building, a plumber by trade, whom Mr. Walz secured when he was newly arrived in this country and down on his luck, has caught the spirit of the place so that, after he has attended to all the details of caring for the building, he goes out and makes neighborhood calls such as Mr. Walz makes, with a fine enthusiasm for the extension of the church's influence. This man's wife, too, is the organist for the church.

Altogether, there is something very fine and inspiring about the place. Conspicuous by their absence are things that might suggest mere pose. Conspicuous by their presence are quietness and sincerity and earnestness. Religion here becomes not merely a mystery but a friend, an agency of light. It is not forced upon an unwilling and unresponsive community, but its persuasive virtues are exhibited in their most alluring guise—religion offered, not thrust forward. It is an effort to recommend a faith by its works of kindness, charity and gentleness. If the faith be not accepted, at least the works are done, and their effects remain.

BERNHARDT'S TAKINGS

The Chicago Record-Herald says that Mme. Sarah Bernhardt broke existing records for this season's gross takings, during the two weeks' engagements at the Studebaker theater. The receipts for the period were $54,000, of which the French actress received 80 per cent., or something over $40,000. When the New theater company played a fortnight's engagement at the Lyric theater in the spring, the receipts amounted to $27,385.75. The Record-Herald admits that even the New theater cannot hope to compete with Mme. Sarah Bernhardt.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

The Game We Play

Oh, the game that we play, and the merry
game we play,
Till the player leaves the table and is gently laid away
In a narrow, narrow valley in a narrow, narrow vale
Where the prizes are forgotten and the earthly voices fail.
There are shouts and trills of laughter, there are moans we would not hear;
There is Folly crowned for queenship, there's the grinning specter near;
There is nighttime turned to daytime, those who dance and those who pay,
Till all Heav'n and Hell must wonder at the merry game we play.

There's the game that's played for dollars,
dollars king and dollars god,
Though no dollar e'er is carried to the chamber
'neath the sod.
Some do play the game of pleasure, never ceasing from their play
Till there comes the pale musician, whisp'ring grimly, "You must pay;"
Some for gain and some for glory, some for that and some for this,
Many for the yap'rous bubble that tomorrow's sun shall miss.
Now divine, and now all brutish, note the
gamesters swing and sway;
Now with tears, and now with laughter, watch
the merry game we play.

Dives playing for a palace, Lazarus a hovel small;
Yet one end is to their playing, as one God
is over all.
West Side Madam clad in sables, East Side
madam rag-arrayed—
This or that will matter little when the sexton grasps his spade.
Singing drowned in tears of sorrow; moans that laughter strives to quell;
Here a prayer that's fit for Heaven, there a curse that's bred for Hell.
Striving, striving, madly striving, for the trophies of a day—
Ho, a sight for imps or angels is the merry
game we play!

Sacramento Bee Not Treacherous

Neither the Bulletin nor any other paper or any individual will succeed in making any reader of the Sacramento Bee believe that "artistic" treachery can be learned of the Bee and its editor, C. K. McClatchy. If there be one word, more than almost any other, which does not apply either to the Bee or McClatchy, that word is "treacherous." Often enough the Bee has been accused of expressing its opinion regardless of policy, but it remained for the Bulletin to make the unique discovery that, in addition to being too combatively frank, it also is a past master of treachery.

Throughout the campaign the wonder in my mind was that the Bee maintained the impartial attitude it did. Four years ago that paper supported Theodore A. Bell when it was a case of either supporting him or swallowing as nauseous a dose as ever the Southern Pacific experts prepared for Californian consumption. In the campaign just closed it still believed in his honesty and ability; yet, believing that both Johnson and Bell had the welfare of California in mind, it maintained an attitude of strict neutrality, unless defense of Bell against unjustifiable newspaper assaults may be considered a departure. Born to the love of combat, C. K.
McClatchy did this thing, and if this was not vastly more difficult for him than taking sides would have been, if anything less than a love of fair play could have compassed such a result in his case, then do I not know Mc-Clatchy, and I feel somewhat acquainted with him.

No, treachery is not a characteristic of either McClatchy or the Bee. Like almost everybody except myself, they have their faults, but double-dealing is not numbered among them.

The Opinions of Rufus

The feller that waits fer things to turn up is middlin' likely to be upset in his calc'lations by the feller that turns things up.

I've noticed that it gives me more satisfaction to criticize a feller citizen than it does to hear that he's ben criticizin' me.

Sometimes I reckon that I'd take more stock in folks that say they know Heaven's their home if they showed more of a yearnin' to go home.

I don't claim that a politishun can't be a good man, but if he is why does he take sech risks?

Es between bein' a dern fool an' a feller that's so smart he's allers 'bout ten years ahead of his time, I reckon the fool has the advantage.

I've noticed that editors that ain't able to think of anything wuth sayin' never b'lieve in havin' editorials in their papers.

I never knew a successful preacher that didn't preach of anything that was much less than 1900 years ancient.

Fourteen years fer Ruef! Say, if Patrick
Calhoun don't come right to the front now with money to buy some technicalities fer Abe I shan't b'lieve they's anything in the theory that there's honor 'mong thieves.

Josh Bings says these hobble skirts make him b'lieve wimmen have gone so fer toward wearin' the trousers that they've already got into one leg of 'em.

Once I knew both a man an' a woman that never said anything unkind 'bout their neighbors. The poor creechers was both dumb.

A rich man may have a tender heart, but one or the other is mighty likely to give up the struggle 'fore long.

Too often folks give their respect to a suit of clothes rather than to the man that's in 'em.

Middlin' often the kind of patrytism that's wuth the most is the kind that does the least spoutin' 'bout itself.

Automobile Selfishness

When Smithkins, your neighbor, used to ride with a horse and buggy he sometimes would overtake you, who owned no horse and buggy, on the road, and he would say, "Hello, Jonesy, old boy, have a ride?" Then Jonesy, old boy, would get into Smithkins' buggy, and you two, riding along together, would have just the most agreeable time imaginable. It was so pleasant, so fraternal; there was so much of cordial good will in the little transaction.

But after a while Smithkins bought an automobile, and, as you could not afford it, you did not. Explain to me, if you can, what then came to pass. For now, if your neighbor overtakes you on the road, he merely bows, and—you continue your walk. Of course, you say to yourself that you don't care, that you don't like to ride in an automobile, that you really are afraid of them, they kill or injure so many people; but you know the feeling deep down in your heart of hearts, the feeling you impart only to Maria.

Is the foregoing exaggerated? Yes? Well, my pedestrian friend, how many times have you been offered a ride by an automobiling acquaintance? Count them up. Let's see;
there was the time when Brown wanted to show you some lots, and there was the time when Wilkins struck you for a ten, and—and —well, that's twice, anyway.

I merely call attention to the fact; I do not pretend to account for it, and I suppose physicians have no means of diagnosing automobile heart to determine just how and why it gives way to selfish degeneration of the tissues. No, I do not attempt to explain it, but haven't you noticed it?

In Prices, of Course

Clarke—What is the difference between a menu and a bill of fare?

Smithie—Well, I don't know as it is definitely settled, but, so far as I have noticed, it usually is about fifty per cent.

Two Rules for Husbands

How much more felicitous matrimonial life, how much less danger of inharmony and strife, if husbands would heed and observe two simple rules. I thought of these rules myself, and they are based on much observation of married life, but I charge nothing for promulgating them. They are offered in that spirit of purely fraternal kindness which only a few people carry about with them. Here are the simple rules:

First, Do all things exactly as your wife wishes you to do them;

Second, Do not interfere with her doing all things exactly as she wishes to do them.

It may be a trifle hard at first to follow these rules, but think of the tender love which will reward you if you do, and I know of men who have made a glorious success of married life by strictly heeding them. It is, for instance, trying when your dear girl suggests that she would better wear your pajamas as you would be less likely to catch a cold in her nightie, but, after all, it is not difficult if once you make up your mind to it;
and always remember that it keeps peace in the family.

Woman, with her nobler nature, likes to feel that she is leading the "old man" in the perplexed path of right. She realizes that he is subject to all varieties of masculine temptation and that he must be firmly led, if he escape them, and why should you let a little thing like pajamas stand in the way of pleasing her? Evidently you should not.

If all men will heed the two simple rules given above, the world will be better and smoother, and married life will be the snap that Willie imagines it to be.

Four Lines Enough, Considering

The quatrain of the magazines

We greatly may deplore,

Yet oft we should, with grateful heart,

Thank heaven there is no more.

The Image of His Father

"And," said the enthusiastic visitor, "nobody can fail to see that the dear little thing is the perfect image of his father."

"I know it, I realize it," the fond mother sighed, "but don't you suppose that folks will feel that the poor little chap is not to blame, that he could not help it?"

Failed to Hit the Mark

Sissy Parker e'er insisted

That she ne'er would wed.

"Men are horrid; I despise them!"

Scornfully she said

Years have passed, and wilful Kitty,

Sure as you're alive,

Has been married three times only.

But her kids are five.

"I will be," said Tommy Swiftleigh,

"Very rich indeed,

For 'tis money makes the mare go

At her utmost speed."

So he grabbed the hurried dollars—

Something seemed to fail,

And it's sad to say at present

Tommy is in jail.

Madam Flewey oft would mention

That she'd lead the ton;

Said that to its tricks and methods

She was strictly on.

So she spent Bill Flewey's money

Just to keep her vow,

And she glittered I assure you—

Flewey's busted now.

I've dragged these tragic instances

From gloomy graves, and dark,

To demonstrate that we may shoot

And fail to hit the mark;

And there is such a thing, I judge—

I mention it off-hand—

As trotting at a swifter pace

Than our slow legs will stand.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

The Interests Not Out of It Nothing could be more foolish than for the reform forces to conclude that because they have elected a governor in California therefore the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company confesses itself permanently whipped and is out of politics to stay. It is no such thing. That bureau was soundly beaten, but what does that amount to? Does anyone suppose that Mr. Herrin is a booby? He is of stern stuff, is cold, calculating, determined, persistent and, moreover, he is part of a great machine that ramifies the nation, a machine that was victorious in the late election more often than it was defeated, a machine that controls the banks, the insurance companies, the railroads, the great industrials, the greatest combination of power and influence the civilized world has seen, a power that transcends national boundaries. The history of civilization has had previous to the present generation nothing comparable with it. That power does not believe in free government. Its supreme love is power and the supreme good it craves is financial profit. The only obligation it conceives it owes to humanity is a chance to work at such wages as will sustain life on a workingman's standard of living, and it conceives a workingman's standard of living to be such as will maintain him on a plane of industrial efficiency. This is farther than most of them see or care, probably farther than Mr. Herrin sees or cares, but is it reasonable to suppose that such men, so minded, will accept a single defeat as final? Are such men likely to relinquish and forget their heart's supreme love because Hiram W. Johnson has been elected governor of California?

A Tactician With A Single Tactic Mr. William F. Herrin is neither broad of mind nor resourceful in strategy. He has but a single line of political warfare. If that fails all fails, but not until the year 1910, since he came to head the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, has that strategic maneuver failed of his purpose. This maneuver consists wholly of dividing the opposition and making common cause with one faction against the other. It is exactly the form of strategy that the commonalty must rely on in order to make headway against the power holding class, with this difference: The power holding class can be divided only on a question of human rights while the commonalty can only be divided on an issue of personal jealousy or private gain. With us the power holding class is headed by the House of Morgan working in a community of interest with Standard Oil, and not a hamlet in this nation is beyond the influence of those interests. The Interests are difficult of division. Unfortunately the commonalty is not so difficult of division and subdivision. It is permeated with the retainers of The Interests and it is filled with men afflicted with exaggerated ego, men who, like the Scottish chiefs, can be counted on to fall to fighting among themselves in the face of their common enemy. They are full of human nature and human nature is full of pique and pride and capital I's. It requires no deep discernment to perceive that Mr. Herrin is feeling with caution, but persistently, for a line of cleavage for his entering wedge. The first attempt to insert the thin edge of that wedge was between Hiram W. Johnson, governor-elect, and Meyer Lissner, chairman of the Republican state committee. If a line of cleavage can be developed there it will be all off with the work of reform in the next legislature, for both men have strong followings, followings extremely jealous of the rights and claims of their respective champions. Fortunately both of these gentlemen and their respective followings perceive the gravity of the situation and mutually refuse to be placed in a position of antagonism one to the other. The next attempt to insert the old, familiar wedge is likely to be between the reform elements in the Republican and Democratic parties. Let us take a look at that line of defense as exposed to attack.

Fifteen And Six Going carefully over the personnel of the state senate, without which nothing there are just fifteen true blue Republican members who can be counted on to stand loyally for Right Things unless partisan advantage, looking to the possibilities of 1912, should induce some of them to place loyalty to party above loyalty to the reform movement. To these may be added four band-wagon Republicans who will be inclined to flock with the fifteen stalwarts if the stalwarts can make it manifest that legislative power is going to be in their hands, all the more certainly because of the present state of public sentiment throughout the state and because of the spirit which animates Hiram W. Johnson, but these four are not to be counted on through thick and thin, at crucial instances or when the manhood that is in a man, or is not in him, has to be made evident. But fifteen and four only make nineteen, two less than enough to organize the senate, but plenty to control a caucus of the twenty-eight Republican members. Eight of the twenty-eight are machine men and one is, to The Watchman, unknown.

There are eight Democrats in the senate, six of whom are upstanding men. On all issues really vital to California, likely to come before the legislature, these men will think and feel substantially as the fifteen stalwart Republicans think and feel and there is nothing that can keep them apart unless it be skirmishing for party advantage under the shadow of 1912. If such men are tripped up at critical moments it will be because of having their eyes fixed on 1912 instead of 1911. They won't mean to, and they may not be tripped by the pulling of the partisan string across their path when they are not looking, but that is the danger. Now if 1912 can be left until 1912, and the fifteen stalwart Republicans and the six stalwart Democrats can stand together during the coming session, as they did stand together during the last session, there is no good thing that cannot be gotten through the senate and no bad measure that cannot be defeated in the senate.

Party Patriots To the Front Failing in provoking a quarrel between Hiram Johnson and Meyer Lissner Mr. Herrin's move will be to provoke a fight between the solid Republican fifteen and the solid Democratic six and altogether on party lines. Therefore what Republican ardor shall we not see manifested by Leroy Wright and Eddie Wolfe, what Democratic resolve to die in the last ditch by that one-time Populist Shanahan of Shasta, what judicial concern for 1912 by Constitutional John of Sonora. Fight? Why, if every blow struck, every challenge hurled, every taunt flung at Washington is not repeated in Sacramento it will be because the fifteen stalwart Republicans and the six stalwart Democrats cannot be made to fight each other even by rubbing their noses together. Failing in provoking a quarrel between Johnson and Lissner, or between Republicans and Democrats on partisan lines, Mr. Herrin will, so far as the state senate is concerned, have to sit tight and look on, waiting for some other opportunity to insert his old reliable entering wedge.

Meantime the reading public should pay little heed to the Chronicle or to the Examiner. The quality of their "cussedness" is too notorious to permit their being factors in the next half-year's history making. Watch the Call. There is that about its championship of Curry and Spalding, its linking up with Leroy Wright and its manifest desire to pick a quarrel between Johnson and Lissner that wears a sinister look. Nor can the policy of that paper at crucial junctures in the fortune of the direct primary law two years ago be soon forgotten. It will bear watching. Can it be that communication between the Flood building and the Claus Spreckels in San Francisco has been opened via the San Diego & Arizona Railroad which John D. Spreckels is reputed as building to a connection with the Southern Pacific?

Strictly Business No fuss, no feathers, no frills, no blare of trumpets, pomp or panoply, no obeisance to the smart set of Sacramento, just a quiet, determined, unostentatious entering upon the business of being governor of California! The plain truth is that not many of us know Hiram W. Johnson clear to the heart and mind of him. The Watchman does not pretend to, and yet The Watchman conceived a strong admiration for Mr. Johnson before he ever saw him, largely because of what some who grew up with him, or had known him from childhood, at Sacramento, had to say of him before he became a much talked of man. These said of him that sincerity was his predominant characteristic. It looks like it, and if there be one human characteristic that The Watchman loves more than another it is sincerity. It will not alone suffice. There must still be clarity of mind, soundness of judgment, industry and courage, but if to these can be added sincerity (and how quickly a false note is detected by the public ear) then you have a man who can move the hearts and enthusiasms of millions. The inaugural ball means much to those to whom it means anything. In declining to have it tendered in his honor Mr. Johnson has "hurt business," the business of the milliner and dressmaker, the caterer and the cab. The one chance in four years to be a stunner has been denied to many women who will feel the cut heart deep, but how simple and straightforward and true were the reasons given: a new occupation, affairs of greatest moment, the stress and press of a legislative session, the need for all the time there is with the fewest distractions possible—every person having common sense knows that it is so. Mr. Johnson is right. The smart set can wait.

The Exclusive Mr. Johnson San Francisco shipped its customary delegation of whooper-uppers to Washington to "root" for the fair. Governor-elect Hiram Johnson did not go with the party. He and Mrs. Johnson prefer to go by themselves, quietly, at the right time to be of real service, and then as quietly to come home again. Therefore he has been branded "exclusive." Wrong again! A month in which to make ready for being governor. Many things to find out and think over. Some more resting to do after the most strenuous campaign known to the political history of this state. Use for every minute. His message to the legislature to be prepared. Would not any sane person in Mr. Johnson's place do, if he had the moral courage to do what he knew ought to be done, exactly what Mr. Johnson is doing? Would he not seek the quiet of a trip across the continent to work out some of the problems of his new job and shun the rah-rah-rah of a train full of whooper-uppers about as naturally as he would shun a sanatorium situate over against a boiler factory? We have heard the eloquence of Johnson, we have witnessed his qualities as a fighter, we have known of his enthusiasm for a cause. Now, in declining the honor and onerousness of an inaugural ball, and to join the whooper-uppers, we see something of the plain, sincere, level headed, hard working adaptation of means to ends of the common sense man. This all looks good to The Watchman.

Pullman Taxes Finally Paid It was lately announced from Sacramento that the taxes of the Pullman car company have finally been paid, at least for 1910, as assessed, although there are taxes for other years not yet settled for, but the paying of the 1910 taxes is taken as an indication that the back taxes will be paid, too. Since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary the Pullman car company had been privileged to report its own property for taxation as it was minded to and, as a little investigation started two or three years ago by State Controller Nye plainly disclosed, that company was not moved by the instinct of patriotism to disclose all of its property, or anything like all of it, and so dodged a considerable part of its just share of the cost of government of California. It had dodged so long that its officials really felt it a wrong to their company to be compelled to pay as others paid and so appealed to the courts for redress of grievances. Apparently it has concluded to submit to the indignity of being forced to do right. They do say that a corporation has no soul, but there is enough of human nature in a corporation oftentimes to make it richly deserving of having a soul, if for no other reason than that it may be made to suffer what souls of a certain character are popularly supposed to have coming to them, if not in this life, then in the next. The Pullman car company is one of 'em.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK--Continued

Very Magnanimous, Mister President

Report from Washington has it that the President is so anxious that the short session of the sixty-first congress shall accomplish positive legislation along progressive lines that, as betwixt himself and the insurgent members, he is quite willing to let by-gones be by-gones. Very nice and magnanimous on his part. For instance he will forgive the insurgents for having cut them off from patronage and for his having sought to read them out of the Republican party because they dared to stand up against the interests for a thorough-going redemption of the pledges in the party platform; he will condone the offense of La Follette and Cummins in licking the Wickersham railroad bill into shape, in spite of administration influence to put it through as it was, and the overturning of Cannonism in the House will be unto him as though it had never been. A great hearted man is our illustrious President. If he has ever done anything to anybody he'll not treasure it up against 'em.

To Be Or Not To Be At Legislative Liberty

The advisory vote clause in the direct primary law is under discussion the state over, as well it may be inasmuch as the action finally taken will have the most far reaching consequences. If the advice of the voters is flung aside as wholly inconsequential we shall not have election of United States senators by the people even indirectly, but if the hocus-pocus provisions of the district plan are attempted to be adhered to we shall make such a monkey business of the election of a United States senator as will discredit the whole direct election idea. Therefore should there be some good, clear, hard thinking on the subject. Once again let us look at the provision which declares that the "members of the legislature shall be at liberty to vote either for the choice of their respective districts expressed at said primary election or for the candidate for United States senator who shall have received the endorsement of their party at such primary election in the greatest number of districts." Under an elemental rule of legal construction the inclusion of this alternative choice excludes every other choice. The legislator, under that law, is at liberty to do one or other of these two things, but is not at liberty to do any other thing whatsoever. His range of discretion is narrowed to one of two. Now as we saw from the opinion of the supreme court of Wisconsin, discussed in this paper a week ago, any narrowing of discretionary power on the part of a legislator, apart from a pledge he may voluntarily have made, is unconstitutional, null and void. Therefore the section of the primary law relating to an advisory vote for United States senator should be read as though the district provisions were not in it and never had been. Those district provisions of the law are what lawyers call ultra vires, and lie quite beyond the power of legislators to legislate. If legislators will get this view of the district provision fully assimilated to their understandings they will find them possessed of an untrammelled legislative liberty, except as they may themselves have bound themselves by making personal pledges to their constituents entirely apart from the letter of that pretended law.

Suppose a Legislator Sits Down With Himself Let us suppose that a legislator, having given no personal pledges, sits down with himself to be advised by the returns from the direct primary election. He first discards the district provisions as being null because beyond the power of a previous legislature to bind him. He finds that Judge Works received a small plurality of the state vote, but not a majority or such a decisive expression of popular will as indicates any overwhelming or very marked preference for him, but scrutinizing the districts that went for Judge Works, he will find that they are where the better element predominates. Per contra, he will find that Spalding, in the main, carried districts in which the "organization" element was strong, that district after district in San Francisco, that elected the sorriest kind of men to the legislature, went for Spalding; that where Curry was strong so was Spalding. Then the legislator will ask himself, "Which of these are my kind of people? Which of these elements stand for the sober, better sense of California? To men of which class would I go individually to receive advice as to what I ought to do?" Being thus advised the legislator will give that advice due heed, not forgetting that he was elected, in the last analysis, to learn all he can about men fit for the place and exercise a sound and honest discretion in his voting, being no puppet, no automaton, factotum, but a representative with discretionary powers as certainly his own as the deliberative powers of the judge on the bench are his own. Every legislator who sits down with himself soberly and, in doing so sits with a man and not a mouse, will find little difficulty in determining what he ought to do.

Patronage Card Played On the Wrong Trick

This from the San Francisco Star: "Governor-elect Johnson announces that he proposes to use his patronage to secure efficient state government, and not to build up a personal machine. Former governors have built up personal machines with a view to secure re-election, and they have failed every time. It would be curious should an efficient state government result in Johnson's re-election. If it should, former governors who retired at the end of their first term will be brought to a realization that they played the patronage card on the wrong trick."

It is rather early, even for a Republican paper, to say nothing of a Democratic, to be considering the re-election of Hiram Johnson as governor of California. If re-elected his efficiency in office will be the cause of it, but the Star is not quite fair to governors that have been. From Markham to Pardee the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau supplied the only machine requisite. Pardee early discharged this machine from service and, to The Watchman's knowledge, absolutely created no personal machine to take its place. He, too, depended upon an efficient state government to win a re-election for him and had there been a direct primary at the time it doubtless would have done it. Governor Gillett has created no personal machine and has needed none. The only personal political machine in the state is the property of Charles F. Curry and its ramifications reach every voting precinct in the state. It was the undoing of Curry. Herrin's fear of the Curry machine prompted him to turn Curry down.

A Correction Regarding San Francisco Charter Convention

The Watchman last week published the facts as he then understood them in connection with the passage of certain election amendments to the city charter of San Francisco. The importance of the graft prosecutions in effecting this reform was strongly, and justly, urged. But in doing so The Watchman inadvertently got a wrong perspective and consequently conveyed a wrong impression as to the origin of the Charter Convention which laid these amendments before the people. Fortunately a letter just received from Mr. William Denman places these facts in their true perspective, and for purposes of correction Mr. Denman's letter is reproduced as follows:

Editor California Weekly:

I have just read the article on the source of the charter amendments appearing in the last edition of the Weekly with much interest and no little discomfiture. All that it says about the origin of the advantageous changes in the election laws of San Francisco in the graft prosecution movement are correct, but assigning to me so large a measure of credit does an injustice to the men who finally organized the charter amendment convention and shaped its deliberations.

In the first place, while it is true that some of the employees of the city at one time hoped to have their salary raising amendments approved by the convention, its original impetus came from the Good Government League. This organization, which has always been identified with the anti-graft movement, issued a call for a preliminary meeting to consider the advisability of such a convention. The call was sent out about a month after our report on the causes of municipal corruption, with its recommendations, had been filed with the mayor and embodied in it some of these recommendations, adding a number of others. At the meeting in response to this call, a committee to organize a convention was formed, consisting of E. A. Walcott, chairman; E. R. Zion, vice-chairman; Harris Weinstock, Charles Bentley, C. W. Eastin, Andrew J. Gallagher, Charles L. Field, C. W. Reed, Walter Macarthur, and F. W. Marvin. All of these gentlemen, with one possible exception, were active supporters of the government in the prosecutions for grafting arising from the indictments of the Oliver grand jury.

These gentlemen decided that the convention, to be efficient, should have a wider basis than any one specific organization and invitations were extended to a large number of such organizations to send delegates to such a convention.

The convention as finally organized elected Harris Weinstock its chairman and E. A. Walcott its secretary, and divided its work among the following committees:

Election Laws: William Denman, chairman; Samuel W. Backus, Ralph L. Hathorn, Arthur Joel, Max Kuhl, C. H. King, George Lull, Edgar A. Mathews, H. I. Mulcrevy, Dent H. Robert, W. W. Sanderson, Earnest Simpson, Thos. J. Walsh.

Public Utilities: Jas. A. Johnston, chairman; Mrs. Lillian Harris Coffin, C. A. Clinton, Chas. W. Eastin, Julius Frankel, Chas. W. Fay, A. H. Giannini, Wm. J. Gleason, Mrs. Helen Moore, Byron Mauzy, Seth Mann, Charles Wesley Reed, J. W. Sparrow, O. L. Scott, Matt I. Sullivan, E. P. E. Troy.

Plan of Government: E. A. Walcott, chairman; H. M. Anthony, W. F. Burbank, Chas. H. Bentley, Geo. E. Crothers, A. M. Cuning, Jno. S. Dunnigan, F. H. Gould, Andrew J. Gallagher, P. J. Healy, Isidor Jacobs, J. A. Johnston, E. J. Mott, Walter Macarthur, John L. Polito, Theo. Pinther, B. B. Rosenthal, Fairfax Wheelan.

Direct Legislation: Milton T. U'Ren, chairman; A. C. Bane, Jas. H. Barry, J. L. Howe, Robt. A. Laurin, E. H. Lomasney, John I. Nolan, J. J. Pratt, E. A. Walcott, E. R. Zion.

Civil Service: Matthew Brady, chairman; E. M. Coffey, Geo. A. Connolly, H. G. W. Dinkelspiel, Thos. Elam, C. L. Field, Thos. P. Garrity, Wm. P. McCabe, Frank W. Marvin, Osgood Putnam, Jas. A. Wilson, Miss Maud Younger, E. R. Zion.

Judiciary: Emil Pohli, chairman; H. U. Brandenstein, Geo. Lull, Wm. H. Jordan.

Public Works: Wm. R. Hagerty, chairman; E. F. Conlin, J. Denahy, W. D. Fenimore, Jas. Frappier, Joseph Rothschild, M. J. Roche, R. E. Sullivan, Wm. Basil White.

Finance: Thomas Jennings, chairman; H. U. Brandenstein, John P. Denney, Dr. Hartland Law, Rudolph Taussig, C. E. Tallmidge, E. W. Wilson, Elmer Westlake.

Police: Walter Macarthur, chairman; A. C. Bane, Andrew J. Gallagher, Isidor Jacobs, John I. Nolan, F. G. Sanborn, Matt I. Sullivan, J. E. White, Rolla V. Watt.

Revision: William Denman, chairman; Thos. Jennings, R. E. Sullivan, Jas. A. John-

(Continued on Page 12)

CALIFORNIA VITAL STATISTICS

By GEO. D. LESLIE

In 1905 California took a forward step by adopting an effective law for the registration of births, marriages and deaths on the plan recommended by the Federal Census Bureau and the American Public Health Association. The law applies particularly to clergymen, physicians and undertakers. Every priest, minister, justice or judge performing a wedding ceremony must file a marriage certificate within three days. Every physician, midwife, nurse or other person assisting at a birth must likewise file a birth certificate within five days thereafter. Every undertaker engaged for a funeral is held responsible for obtaining and filing a death certificate and securing the necessary burial or removal permit prior to any disposition of the body.

Local Registrars

The local registrars with whom certificates are filed comprise county recorders, health officers in chartered cities, and clerks in other cities and incorporated towns. The county recorder is ex officio local registrar of marriages for the entire county; of births outside freeholders' charter cities, and of deaths outside all incorporated cities and towns. In chartered cities, the health officer is ex officio local registrar for both births and deaths. In other cities and incorporated towns, the city or town clerk is ex officio local registrar for deaths alone. On or before the fifth day of each month, these local registrars are required to transmit certificates filed with them for events in the preceding month to the State Bureau of Vital Statistics at Sacramento. Here the certificates are bound for permanent preservation after being indexed on a card index system for purposes of legal record and after being used for the compilation of statistical data relating to conditions of life and death in California.

Registration States

The enactment and enforcement of the registration law of 1905 put California on the same high plane as the leading eastern states. In 1905 there were only ten "registration states," or states from which the Federal Census Bureau accepts death returns as being satisfactorily complete. California was among the five added in 1906, while only three more have been added since, the whole eighteen registration states for 1909 being as follows: California, Colorado, Connecticut, Indiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Vermont, Washington and Wisconsin. California is one of four registration states west of the Mississippi.

Increase of Births

A four years' review of California vital statistics shows there has been a great increase in the number of births reported, the increase being due mainly to improving completeness of registration. The following table gives the birth total for California, in comparison with the death and marriage totals, for the four calendar years 1906 to 1909, inclusive:

	1909	1908	1907	1906
Births	30,882	28,077	24,674	20,974
Deaths	30,985	31,287	31,095	29,303
Marriages	22,917	21,739	23,005	21,317

Although the death and marriage totals have varied relatively little in the four years, each having both risen and fallen somewhat, the birth total has increased steadily in successive years, the number of births reported for 1909 being about one-half greater than the number reported for 1906. For 1909, in fact, the birth total falls short of the death total by only 103.

The comparatively small marriage total for 1908 (Leap year), in contrast with the figures for both 1907 and 1909, may be ascribed to the shyness of women concerning leap year proposals and also to a general avoidance of matrimony during a period of hard times.

Geographic Divisions

The table below shows the birth, death and marriage totals for the main geographic divisions of California in 1909 alone:

Division	Births	Deaths	Marriages
The State	30,882	30,985	22,917
Northern California	3,155	3,946	2,081
Central California	18,209	17,599	13,174
Southern California	9,518	9,440	7,662

The birth total falls short of the death total only in Northern California, birth registration being still incomplete in some sparsely settled rural counties.

City and Country

The following table gives the birth and death totals for the twenty-six freeholders' charter cities as a class in contrast with the rest of California for 1909:

	Births	Deaths
California	30,882	30,985
Chartered Cities	18,906	17,472
Rest of State	11,976	13,513

This table shows that there was an excess of births over deaths of no less than 1,434 in the twenty-six cities taken together. However, there was an apparent excess of deaths over births of 1,537 for the rest of California, on account of the incompleteness of birth registration as yet in the rural districts.

Sex

The table below gives the sex distribution of births and deaths in California for 1909:

	Total	Male	Female	Per Cent.
Births	30,882	16,150	14,732	52.3 47.7
Deaths	30,985	19,324	11,661	62.4 37.6

The per cent male is much higher among decedents (62.4) than among infants (52.3), because the immigrant population, whether from other states or foreign countries, has a greater preponderance of males even than the native Californian element.

Race

The following table shows the race distribution of births and deaths, as well as of brides in marriages, together with the per cent. white, for California in 1909:

	Births	Deaths	Brides
California	30,882	30,985	22,917
White	29,736	29,323	22,449
Non-Caucasian	1,146	1,662	468
Negro	222	388
Indian	34	130
Chinese	208	694
Japanese	682	450
Per Cent. White	96.3	94.6	98.0

The per cent. white is 98.0 among brides, 96.3 among infants, and 94.6 among decedents. There was a slight excess of births over deaths for the white population, and a relatively great excess of births over deaths for the Japanese. On the other hand, there were many more deaths than births among the Chinese, Indians and negroes in California.

Nativity of Whites

The preceding table is supplemented by the one below given, by numbers and per cents, the nativity of white mothers, decedents and brides classified as born in California, born in other states or foreign born. The few mothers or brides of unknown nativity are included with those born in other states, while the many decedents of unknown nativity are here shown separately:

	Numbers.	Mothers	Decedents	Brides
Total White	29,736	29,323	22,449
Born in California	10,544	8,231	9,133
Born in other states	10,700	10,763	9,043
Foreign born	8,492	9,457	4,273
Unknown	872
Per cents.
Total White	100.0	100.0	100.0
Born in California	35.5	28.1	40.7
Born in other states	36.0	36.7	40.3
Foreign born	28.5	32.2	19.0
Unknown	3.0

The per cent. born in California was 40.7 among brides, against 35.5 among mothers and only 28.1 among decedents. The per cent. born in other states was 40.3 for brides, 36.7 for decedents (or 39.7, including 3 per cent. unknown), and 36.0 for mothers. The per cent. foreign born was 32.2 among decedents and 28.5 among mothers, as compared with merely 19.0 among brides.

North and South of Tehachapi

There are marked differences in the constituent elements of the white population between Northern and Central California on one hand and Southern California on the other, as appears from the table which follows. For simplicity's sake only the per cents. are shown here and the "unknown" are included throughout with "born in other states":

	Per Cent of Whites
	Mothers	Decedents	Bride
North of Tehachapi.
Born in California..	43.5	31.2	49.9
Born in other states ..	26.2	33.3	28.9
Foreign born	30.3	35.5	21.2
South of Tehachapi.
Born in California..	17.3	21.2	22.1
Born in other states ..	58.0	53.9	63.1
Foreign born	24.7	24.9	14.8

South of Tehachapi the per cent. born in other states was no less than 58.0 for mothers, 53.9 for decedents and 63.1 for brides, as compared with corresponding per cents. of 26.2, 33.3 and 28.9, respectively, for the counties north of Tehachapi. Roughly speaking, natives of other states constitute about three-fifths of the population in Southern California, against about three-tenths (or half as much) in Northern and Central California.

The per cent. born in the Golden State, however, was as great as 43.5 for mothers, 31.2 for decedents and 49.9 for brides in Northern and Central California, against corresponding per cents. of merely 17.3, 21.2 and 22.1 for Southern California. The per cent. foreign born likewise ranges higher north of Tehachapi (30.3, 35.5 and 21.2 for mothers, decedents and brides, respectively) than south of Tehachapi (only 24.7, 24.9 and 14.8).

Nativity of Brides and Mothers

Comparison of the nativity of white brides and mothers discloses some facts of interest in relation to the fecundity of native and foreign born women in California. Since single women marrying are more likely to bear children than widows or divorcees, the comparison is best drawn between single white brides and white mothers, as in the following table for California as a whole and for the counties north and south of Tehachapi in 1909:

Per Cent of—
	Single Brides	Moth-ers	Single Brides	Moth-ers
The State
Born in California.	43.3	35.5	7.8	...
Born in other states	37.8	36.0	1.8	...
Foreign born	18.9	28.5	..	9.6
North of Tehachapi.
Born in California.	52.6	43.5	9.1	...
Born in other states	26.4	26.2	0.2	...
Foreign born	21.0	30.3	..	9.3
South of Tehachapi.
Born in California.	24.2	17.3	6.9	...
Born in other states	61.2	58.0	3.2	...
Foreign born	14.6	24.7	..	10.1

This table shows that a much larger proportion of the single brides than of the mothers were born in California and also that a slightly greater proportion of the single brides than of the mothers were born in other states. On the other hand, a very much greater proportion of the mothers than of the single brides were born in foreign countries. The contrasts here noted appear not only in the per cents. for California as a whole but also in the per cents. for the fifty counties north of Tehachapi as well as for the eight to the south. The figures indicate that foreign born women surpass the natives, whether Californians or other Americans, in the proclivity to bear children.

Mrs. Antoinetta Beckhart, who sells flowers on the curb at Sixth and Race streets, Cincinnati, and presents President Taft with a bouquet whenever he visits Cincinnati, has received a photograph of the president with this inscription: "To Mrs. Antoinetta Beckhart, with many thanks for her beautiful roses. William H. Taft."

OAKLAND'S NEW CHARTER

COMMISSION GOVERNMENT, WITH SOME ORIGINAL VARIATIONS

By ALBERT H. ELLIOT

On December 8th next the question of whether the people of Oakland desire a new form of government will be submitted to them at the polls. We should not assume that all of the citizens will read the long instrument which is now being printed in two newspapers. But we have a right to assume that all intelligent citizens should have a fair idea of the general principles set forth in the charter for the adoption of which they are voting.

We shall not attempt to give even a condensed statement of the contents of the instrument. We hope such a statement will be prepared and presented in the daily press. Our present idea is to show that a new plan of city government is proposed—direct, scientific, businesslike.

It is about time that a science of municipal government should be discovered if there is such a thing. We as a people have devoted much study to other governmental problems but we do not seem to be convinced that most of good and evil in government comes from the way our American cities are managed or mismanaged. It ought to be possible to devise a simple system of management of municipal business, which should have some of the merits at least of the up-to-date plan used by the American business man in the management of his private corporations. A municipal corporation is after all a large business corporation organized for the purpose of doing for its stockholders, the citizens, on a large scale that which they cannot do so well for themselves.

Commission Form of Government

We call the plan set forth in Oakland's new proposed charter a commission form of government. The heart of the entire plan is that all the business of managing the affairs of the city shall rest in the hands of five men (including the mayor), who are elected at large by all the voters of the city.

Every possible safeguard is thrown around the people in the selection of their managing agents. Two elections must be held and everything has been done, except to supply the thinking for the voter.

First, or Nominating, Election

The first election is called a nominating election. Any citizen who desires can be nominated for an elective office and placed on the ballot, provided a petition is filed in his behalf signed by not less than fifty electors. All the names of those nominated for each office are arranged on the ballot alphabetically and without any party designation whatsoever. The two nominees receiving the largest number of votes for each office are the only ones whose names appear on the ballot at the second election. The nominating election is therefore a process of sifting or elimination. Probably the nominating election will go off on the question of individual worth, or friendship, or public service. At the second election, where only two persons are running for the same office, as against possibly fifty at the first election, issues will in all probability be defined—not partisan political issues, but a new style of issues involving municipal problems.

Difference from Berkeley Plan

No man can be elected at the first election, even though he shall receive a majority of all votes cast for the particular office. This is a departure from the Berkeley plan where any candidate can be elected at the nominating election if he shall receive a majority of all the votes cast. It is possible that there may be some confusion in the minds of voters caused by a large number of candidates running for office and the significance of a particular nominee's candidacy may not be made clear. At the second election, however, the lines will necessarily be well drawn. If a candidate shall have received the majority of the votes at the first election, he should be able to hold the majority when the "sober second thought" of the voter begins to work.

In any event we believe in encouraging sober second thought—another evidence of the way the voter is guarded and led into thinking out his own governmental problems.

Device to Prevent "Plumping"

When a citizen announces himself for office, he shall specify whether he is running as Commissioner No. 1, No. 2, No. 3, or No. 4. This classification by numbers may seem confusing until it is explained that the classification is purely artificial, used only for the purposes of nomination and election, and has no significance whatever after the election. In fact it is an ingenious device to prevent what is called "plumping." Where men are running for four offices in a field of say fifty candidates, there is a great temptation for the friends of one man to "plump" for him—that is vote for him as commissioner and fail to vote for any one whatever for the other three commissioner-ships.

Departments of Administration

After the commissioners are elected the real work of government begins and we come now to the heart of the new system of administration. The work of running the city's business is divided into five departments: 1. Department of Public Affairs; 2. Department of Finance and Revenue; 3. Department of Public Health and Safety; 4. Department of Public Works; 5. Department of Streets. The mayor is the head of the Department of Public Affairs and the other four commissioners assign themselves to the head of the other departments. These five commissioners handle the entire work of the city government. Into their hands is given all the power; upon their shoulders rests all the responsibility. They levy the taxes and spend all the money. They are held responsible before the people for the size of the tax rate and also for the condition of the streets, public health, etc. They cannot escape responsibility—they cannot shift the burden to any other officials. Every inducement is held out to them to do the business of the city in a businesslike way. The path of efficient management is the line of least resistance. The people can understand a simple system such as is here described. They can reward where reward is due; they can punish where punishment is deserved.

At this point the conservative and old-fashioned citizen exclaims, "What has become of the 'checks and balances'! Do you mean to say that all this power is placed without check or hindrance in the hands of a small group of elected officials?" We do say that all the power is placed in the hands of a few men. The system is designed that way. We want the power definitely fixed and likewise the responsibility. We cannot exact responsibility and withhold power. But we wish now in a few words to show that checks—real, ball-bearing, well oiled checks—are prescribed in the new charter, which bear the same relation to the old-fashioned "checks and balances," that a limited train bears to a prairie schooner.

The Recall

And first of all, study the recall. The people will no longer place in office an agent to do their business whom they can easily "hire" but can practically never "fire." We do not understand where the idea first originated of employing men in public service for a fixed period, without any regard whatever to proved fitness, efficiency or civic loyalty to the city to be served. Let us bury the idea regardless of its genesis, so deep that no modern city can ever dig it up. The small group of men clothed with plenary power must "make good" or the ax of the recall will take them somewhere between the place where they keep their brains and their collars. Fifteen per cent. of their fellow electors, but not less than 3000 in number, may sign a petition which puts the official to an election. Printed arguments pro and con are sent to each voter. The case is presented to the jury, composed of the stockholders in the municipal corporation. The verdict is rendered after a fair election. If the official is recalled, the agency is simply cancelled. Those who "hire" have "fired." The city, presumably for good reasons, has changed managers. Is not this a good business procedure? The small group of elected officials, clothed with great powers, have hanging over their heads the recall. So does every manager of every business house. Is it not about time that we compel our public officials to make good by the same "check" which a private corporation uses so effectively? "Do your work well. Use your power for our good. Manage this large property efficiently, loyally and honestly or quit the job. If you do not quit we have a way reserved in our charter to make you quit." Can we talk further of "checks and balances" when this great power is reserved to the people? With the recall set on a hair trigger there is a splendid guaranty of the wise and honest use of the great power granted by the people to the managers of the city's business. We have here a check that checks and a balance that balances.

The Initiative

And the initiative is also a powerful weapon in the hands of the people. Even a group of wise and honest men may differ in opinion with their principals as to some particular piece of legislation. There should be no assumption that all wisdom resides in the group of elected officials. A petition may be secured signed by 15 per cent. of the electors, proposing a piece of legislation. The council must now either place the law on the statute books or submit it for endorsement or rejection at the polls. We think that the small body of officials clothed with power, will at least give respectful attention to any group of honest citizens who propose legislation, if they know that the stockholders can go over their heads to their principals in certain contingencies. It is obvious, therefore, that the power is rather well "balanced"—the "checks" are all working.

The Referendum

The referendum is the third great brake in the beautiful new machine (I know the unholy associations of this word, but we must not blame a word of good classical lineage for its vicious environment). After an ordinance granting a franchise or leasing or selling public property has been passed by the five municipal managers, their action must in some cases and may in other cases be ratified by the stockholders at the polls. Why not? Tell a modern business man that his manager can deed away his property without consulting him and see him smile. Why should the managers of the city's business be allowed to alienate the property of the citizens without direct authority procured at the ballot box? In the case of renewal of old established franchises, the power to grant is taken from the managers entirely, as such a grant must be approved by the people. In the case of new franchises and leases of public property, the people have the right by petition to demand a reference to them. Or the managers may of their own motion refer a matter to the people, upon which they wish to be advised. This is a brake of such power that even the conservative citizen should cease clamoring for "checks and balances of the constitution"—whatever that may mean. The grant of power to the commissioners is well guarded by the principle of the referendum. These three, recall, initiative, referendum, will shine as stars over the heads the councilman. They are at once a warning and an encouragement—a warning to the unloyal, an encouragement to the faithful. Without these the large grant of power set forth in the new charter would be dangerous; with them the grant of power insures directness, loyalty, efficiency.

A General View

We should like to go into the details of the charter but space will not permit. With the main underlying principles clearly before us there can be no difficulty in reading the charter intelligently. It will be obvious from such a reading that a simple business method of doing the public business is proposed. No system will work itself and the people must be always vigilant and civically loyal to their own and their fellows' interests. The way has been made plain and easy. Believing as we do in democracy, we predict that the peoples' interest in their own municipal affairs will be stimulated. The short ballot, the direct legislation features, the interment of the old ghosts of government, the application of common sense to the solution of political questions, the non-partisan ballot—all these first aids to the injured will be soon understood by the people, and then applied rigorously and effectively. Possibly at times the brakes will be put on too soon or too hard; we may swap drivers too often in the stream and out of the stream; we may even get bad legislation on the books—all these are both the evils and the glory of democracy. We believe we are now on the right road in municipal management, and we must let the future suggest changes. Without desiring to be dogmatic, we think that a municipal science has been at last discovered and we ought to heed some of its obvious teachings.

("Political Table Talk"—Continued)

ston, E. A. Walcott, Milton T. U'Ren, Matthew Brady, Walter Macarthur, Emil Pohli, H. U. Brandenstein, Wm. H. Jordan, Geo. Lull.

Probably there never has been a convention in San Francisco in which more good work was quietly and effectively accomplished. Mr. Walcott, the secretary, has proved himself one of the wisest of the constructive workers for civic betterment of the city, co-ordinating the work of all the committees and saving the convention much of those losses of time and efficiency which ordinarily occur in loosely organized assemblies. Colonel Weinstock is an excellent presiding officer and the convention was never permitted to lose its earnestness of purpose. There was some arbitrary work on the part of the revision committee, of which the writer was chairman, in shelving certain good proposals for lack of time for their consideration, but the necessity of concentrating upon a few much needed amendments was finally conceded by even the most radical.

The so-called "Tax Eating" amendments, for raising salaries (some of which were fairly based on the increased cost of living) were not presented to the convention. A contrary impression was no doubt created by the fact that Mr. Zion, who was the attorney for the organization of civil service employees, was also one of the most active and efficient members of the convention itself. He kept his two interests separated, however, and his good work for the amendments which passed, particularly Nos. 6, 7 and 8, should not be overlooked.

The convention recommended nine amendments: No. 6 for the initiative, referendum and recall; No. 7 for the direct primary, majority rule, Australian ballot with rotation of names and circulation of candidates' statements; No. 8 for the elimination of party designations; No. 12 providing for the construction of tunnels; No. 16, giving supervisors the power to establish employment bureaus; No. 18, raising the age limit of certain city employees; Nos. 19 and 20 regulating the granting of public service franchises; No. 29, increasing the salaries of the supervisors to $200 a month. All of these save Nos. 16 and 20 were passed by the voters.

The convention regarded favorably the proposal for increasing the terms of the supervisors and county officers, but decided to postpone action until the whole subject of commission government for a city the size of San Francisco could be taken up and thoroughly worked out.

The great majority of the members of the convention were staunch supporters of the government in the prosecutions for bribery and extortion. The amendments proposed were a composite of the work of all these men. This is the really significant thing—that is, that after the turmoil of the struggle against municipal corruption, there still exists in San Francisco a body of men who are ready for quiet constructive work and who have the effectiveness to put their measures through when once conceived. The campaign for the amendments developed the fact that the lines between the supporters and those who were against the government in the graft cases had almost disappeared. Among the most enthusiastic advocates of these measures in the last days of the campaign were men who had been most strongly opposed to the government. All the old bitterness seemed to have died out and the spirit of "get together" for better things animated the conferences.

It is, however, a great injustice to the splendid group of citizens who, since the days of the Wallace grand jury, which in 1892 drove Buckley out of power and gave us our charter government, have been steadily fighting and as steadily gaining ground for good government, despite such apparent submersions as during the Schmitz administration, to say that the majority election scheme arose solely from the anti-graft campaign. Both are but stages in the modern civic movement in San Francisco which dates back at least eighteen or twenty years.

Yours faithfully,

WILLIAM DENMAN

November 29, 1910.

A Shock for Saint Peter

She wore a skirt—'twas a hobble skirt—
And a hat that was like a pail,
And she looked like a carrot in dry goods girt.
Although to describe her I fail;
And she came to the gate that is never wide,
The gate that no mortals miss,
And Saint Peter, he took one look, and sighed:
"Oh, riddle of riddles, what's this?"

In reply to many letters inquiring whether I shall publish a review of the session of the California Legislature of 1911, along the same lines as those followed in "The Story of the California Legislature of 1909," I will state that I shall do so, if subscriptions for 1,200 volumes are received before the Legislature of 1911 adjourns. If you wish to be one of the subscribers, fill out and forward this card.

FRANKLIN HICHBORN.

191

Franklin Hichborn,
Santa Clara, California.

As soon as the Story of the California Legislature of 1911 is published, send me one copy, for which I agree to pay $1.50 on delivery.

Name

Address

[From The California Weekly]

An Italian journal in commenting on Mme. Sarah Bernhardt's recent appearance at a London music hall explains how it is that this great artist seems always in need of money. It is interesting to read that in the case of this distinguished artist her money is literally at the disposal not only of her near and distant relations and friends but even of people she does not know, for her house is open to all. At one time she never entertained less than twenty persons daily at dinner, and it is related that Alexandre Dumas, who was one day of the number sitting at the right hand of Mme. Bernhardt, asked her, "Will you kindly tell me the name of your friend on my left?" "That is more than I can do," said she, "for I have never seen him before."

HONOLULU

And the Volcano

THE TRIP MOST COMPELLING and worth while, exceeding all others for grandeur, beauty and pleasure. And this splendid trip can be made in two weeks and a day by sailing on S. S. SIERRA (10,000 tons displacement). The Volcano of Kilauea, the largest in the world, is tremendously active just now, and a few quick dispatch trips have been arranged. Never before has it been possible to make this desirable trip with such speed and comfort, and the price is low, $110, first class, to Honolulu and back, and $41 for side trip from Honolulu to volcano, including rail and auto to Kilauea; hotel at Hilo, also Volcano House. No other trip compares with this. Be sure to visit the islands, and DO IT NOW, while the volcano is active. S. S. SIERRA sails Dec. 3, Dec. 24, Jan. 14, Feb. 4.

OCEANIC S. S. CO.

673 Market Street, San Francisco.

John O'Donnell D. E. Alexander

ALEXANDER & O'DONNELL

ATTORNEYS AT LAW

Tels.: Sunset Douglas 1538; Home J 1508
845 Pacific Bldg., Market and Fourth Sts.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD

The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed	$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital	300,000.00
Surplus	400,000.00
Profits	45,000.00

DIRECTORS—James D. Phelan, President; John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt, Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R. D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.

Attorneys—J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy.
Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)

526 CALIFORNIA ST., San Francisco, Cal.

Guaranteed Capital	$ 1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash....	1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds....	1,555,093.05
Deposits June 30th, 1910.....	40,384,727.21
Total Assets	43,108,907.82

Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co's. Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President and Manager, George Tourny; Third Vice-President, J. W. Van Bergen; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, A. H. Muller; Assistant Secretaries, G. J. O. Folte and Wm. D. Newhouse; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, George Tourny, J. W. Van Bergen, Ign. Steinhart, L. N. Walter, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Streets. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Heyer, Manager.

THE old oak tree that grew on the brow of the bank back of the log cabin on the Serpentine was a standing invitation to little boys to climb it. Its bole was knotty and gnarly and its bark was shagged, abounding in crevices into which small toes and fingers could insinuate themselves for hoisting small bodies up into the limbs and branches. A dozen feet from the ground a big, low-hanging limb branched off and forked again and again, making the most inviting seats with legs astride—and, sitting in one of these forks, with winds whistling and leaves rustling all around him, Jed spent many a vagrant hour day-dreaming. Occasionally his dreaming became more profound and he slept in imminent danger of falling off his perch, at which times his father or mother, if they discovered him, would softly put the ladder against the limb, climb up and take him down lest he fall in the awakening.

But such delicious dreams did he enjoy in the sheltering arms of that old oak! And it was probably there that he formed a habit of day-dreaming that followed him half his life if not all of it. First he dreamed that his yoke of little red calves that, little as he was, he had yoked with a yoke his father had made for him and then had taught to gee and haw like old oxen, grew and grew until they were ever so much bigger than old Spot and Jere, his father's oxen; bigger and stronger even than the big white oxen of Uncle that Cousin never tired of bragging about being the stoutest oxen on the creek. Jed would show them how to yank logs out of the woods to be taken on the wooden-wheeled trucks to the sawmill down in the Connecticut settlement, and everybody would praise Jed and his oxen and he would be both proud and happy.

Alas for dreams, day as well as night! One day, when there was just a little summer shower and a clap of thunder that made the echoes wring their hands and cry with anguish, a chain of lightning ricocheted across the prairie for half a mile after where it first struck straight for one of those steers where he stood feeding on the fresh green grass and killed him as dead as any stone. He swelled up tight, his legs stuck out stiff and straight, and the coyotes, dogs and vultures feasted to their fill for half a month. His mate had to be sold to the butcher in order to get money with which to pay the taxes and that day dream came to naught.

Now Jed wanted to be strong. He wanted to be six feet high and stronger even than Jack Robinson, who, however, did not know how to read. Jed caught him one day with his paper bottom up and called his attention to the fact in the presence of others, at which they all laughed and Jack blushed, and the laugh was on Jack wherever he went around the neighborhood, for he was not without pride and wished to conceal his lack of learning behind a bold pretense, but he could take a bucket of water on each little finger and hold his arms out straight, something that no other man in the neighborhood could do. Jed looked up to him and loved to climb into his lap and feel the huge, hard bunches his biceps made. Perhaps it was because Jed was not strong that he so wished to be, perhaps it was the stories of Samson and the Philistines or of David and the lion. Anyhow, that was a consuming ambition and, up in his nest in the forks of the oak, times without number, Jed day-dreamed of being beset with wolves while on the way to his aunt's, half a mile down the creek, and as the wolves sprang upon him, he grabbed them by the skin at the top of their heads and by the lower jaw and, with a quick, powerful wrench, threw their lower jaws out of joint so that they hung down upon their breasts, sending them off whining piteously, unable either to bite Jed or to close their mouths again, a whole pack of them. It didn't happen, and whenever Jed was out after night-fall looking for the cows, and heard the yapping of a coyote his blood almost froze in his veins, but the more afraid he was the more did he day-dream of his own prowess and undaunted courage.

As Jed grew older his day-dreams became more expansive. One day he was riding on a splendidly mettlesome and beautifully caparisoned horse when he spied, just ahead of him, a group of four or five persons on horseback,

RECOLLECTIONS OF JED

BEHOLD THE DREAMER!

BY

JUDSON

an elderly gentleman and his elderly wife, an only child, a daughter two or three years younger than Jed and two vaqueros on their mustangs. The horses ridden by the gentleman and his wife were large and powerful, but not swift, while the one ridden by the daughter was lithe and fiery and as nimble on her feet as a gazelle.

Perhaps it was the clatter of the hoofs of Jed's shod horse on the flinty covering of the gravelly road, perhaps it was the vixen in the beast that prompted the act, but, whatever the cause, the mettlesome mare took the bits in her teeth and dashed away across the open plain beyond the control of the daughter. Now there was a deep arroyo ahead a mile or so that Jed knew of, although its presence could not be seen until on its very brink. Unless the mare could be stopped before reaching that arroyo the death of the daughter was certain. All saw the danger, for they knew of the arroyo as well as Jed, and only the mare did not know of it and she was making for it with her precious burden with the swiftness of a coyote.

The vaqueros flung free their lassos, but their horses could nowhere near keep up. The gentleman and lady sat their saddles, white as any sheet, powerless to do more than stare wild-eyed at the fleeing figure. Jed took all in at a glance, put spurs to his horse, loosened the hitch strap from his saddle, leaned forward like an Indian and joined in the chase, striving not only to overtake the girl and her ungovernable mare but to place himself between her and the arroyo in order to turn the flying animal away if he could not stop her.

He passed the father and mother like a meteor, overtook and passed the vaqueros, headed off the runaway and turned her out of her course, ran alongside neck and neck, leaned over and snapped the snaffle of his hitchstrap into the bit of the mare, wheeled her away from danger just at the very nick of time and galloped back to the highroad to receive, not only the smiles of the daughter, but the hearty thanks of the girl's parents with an offer of a rich reward, which Jed, of course, magnanimously declined to receive.

Nor was this all that did not happen. It was only the beginning of it.

Jed was questioned closely by the father and mother as to who he was and what he was doing. In reply he informed them with entire frankness that he had ridden all the way to Colorado to seek his fortune, stopping to win some racing money at the fairs on his way, with the expectation of getting into the cattle business somewhere when he should win enough to start him, but as for selling the horse, he would never part with Fleetwing, never while he lived, for he was a wonder, although he did not look the part, which enabled Jed to take in all the betting men at the races at his own discretion.

"But isn't it wrong to win people's money away from them that way?" demanded the mother of the young lady, to which, Jed frankly replied that he supposed that it was, only he betted only with gamblers and, after winning and receiving the stakes, he always gave them an opportunity to have their money back on condition that they go before a notary and take a solemn oath never to bet on horse racing again and allow the affidavit to be published for three issues in the principal paper in the community, an arrangement which the father of the girl pronounced entirely fair and considerate and likely to do more good than all the harm winning money from gamblers could ever do. So Jed felt entirely justified, especially as the girl herself nodded her approval.

As they drew near to Denver, where they were all going to attend the Colorado state fair, Jed was pressed to stop at the hotel with their party, and the vaqueros, who had been eyeing Fleetwing with great interest, volunteered to help Jed make some easy money on his horse, for they had not a doubt that he could outstrip anything that would be likely to be there, though they would nose around and get hold of all the inside tips for him.

So on they rode to Denver. Jed laid low for a day or two until the vaqueros had learned the lay of the land, so to speak, and had found just the time the best horses could make, when he placed out all the money he could spare at great odds in his favor in all the classes of races under saddle to which Fleetwing could be admitted. It was like taking candy from babies. He began with the slow races, then going into those that were faster and faster, Fleetwing not half running and yet taking every race as he went along until he boldly entered for the sweepstakes, the supreme event of the week. Then indeed came the tug of war, for Jed had up on the race every dollar he had in the world and all that the vaqueros had, but at an odds of ten to one in Jed's favor, for, as already explained, the horse did not look to be the swift racer he was and Jed as evidently appeared to be a greenhorn.

But the race was run and won and, as he passed under the wire at least two lengths in the lead, Jed saw Inez Wentworth, for that was her name, swinging her hat and handkerchief. When he had returned to the judges' stand, and the crowd surged around, there were his new found friends to shake hands and congratulate him. When the stakes were all paid over Jed had more thousands of dollars than he had ever seen in his life and was now able to buy a good stock farm somewhere.

Then it was that he was advised by Mr. Wentworth, a man of large affairs, to place his money in bank in Denver and come along with the family over into Wentworth park to spend the winter, for when one got into the park there was no getting out all winter, although in the park it was nice and sheltered and sunny. They were going to take a private tutor in with them. Mr. Wentworth explained, for their daughter and, if Jed liked, he could join the classes with her and improve his education, which he had confessed to be limited, and it would not cost him a cent. Perhaps, too, he might find something to like in the park, for there were a few settlers there, although Mr. Wentworth now owned nearly all.

The invitation was accepted and, in a few days, after taking in all the gaieties of the city and stocking up for the winter, the cavalcade set out for the park with a long pack train of mules that had joined them. The park was all surrounded by lofty mountains with only a single gorge, through which a little river had broken its way to the plains, but such a narrow way that not even a mountain goat could thread the passage.

They rode along up the winding course of that river, then in single file up the long trail and over the rocky rim where Jed caught his first view of Wentworth park surrounded with pine-clad mountains, streams running down in every direction, jumping off a precipitous cliff into a broad, shining lake where the river took its rise and had bored its way out to the plain miles and miles, and hundreds of feet, below. Everything, Mr. Wentworth explained, even to Inez' piano, had to be taken in on pack animals and every product taken out had to go on foot. Even the sheep had to be driven out to be sheared, and the cattle to be killed, for no railroad, or even as much as a wagon road, could be built in. For that reason the splendid forest to be seen on the mountain slopes was practically valueless except for use in the valley, and then only as the logs could be shaped by ax and adze, for not even a saw mill could be packed in, the trails were so rough.

Laughingly, Mr. Wentworth declared as they looked down into the beautiful park where he was undisputed monarch of all he surveyed, that he would give the hand of his daughter in marriage and half the valley to anyone who would find a practicable way to get a railroad, or even a first-class wagon road, into and out of Wentworth park, for, besides the pine clad mountain sides and the beautiful lake and never ending rushing streams, there were tens of thousands of acres of upland grazing ranges and other thousands of irrigated valleys where hay and grain were grown to be fed to the stock in the valley. Sometimes the animals got to be so fat that they could scarcely climb out to market.

Jed went on down the slopes with the rest, Fleetwing almost sliding on his haunches part of the way, it was so steep, reaching the brink of the lake at last, where stood the great log ranch house, and its cluster of smaller buildings surrounded by gardens filled with fruits and flowers. Above and about all the solemn snow-capped mountains looked down in peace and contentment. It was the most beautiful place that Jed had ever dreamed of and his heart was filled with joy at the prospect of remaining there all winter, but when they had shown him to a sunny, commodious chamber, and he would have thanked Mr. and Mrs. Wentworth again for their splendid hospitality, they stopped him with, "the obligation is all ours, not yours. Had it not been for you our daughter, the only child we have preserved alive, would long since have been lying dead in the bottom of the big arroyo."

And what a splendid winter it was, going to school with Inez to their wise old special tutor! As for Jed, he took up the study of surveying and civil engineering mainly, for, deep down in the recesses of his own soul, he had a reason for it. He developed a love for hunting, and for learning every foot of the park by traveling over it on Fleetwing or on foot, nearly always returning with venison or bear meat. He threaded every canyon from its mouth upon the lake to its head on the rim rock of the valley.

There was one place that baffled him. Threading a canyon, little explored because of its barrenness, Jed came at last to a sheer granite wall hundreds of feet in height, up which he could not climb. What lay beyond? Was it far through to the head of some other canyon leading down to the plain? Some day he would have an answer to that query, but he could not now, the cliff was too precipitous and the snow too deep on the adjacent ridges.

Toward spring a hungry cinnamon bear made a raid upon a sheep fold and worked sad havoc. Jed with his dogs took the trail. It led up this canyon. He followed it to the end, but when he got there there was no bear to be found. Where could he have vanished to? Jed was puzzled. So were the dogs. At length one of them, sniffing about, looked up the precipitous side of the cliff and whined, ran from side to side of the canyon, then back a little way to a jutting ledge, a ledge that led to a little slide of loose rock and earth in which a few scrubby shrubs had taken root. The other dogs followed. Jed followed the dogs. The dogs went in behind a sliver of rock, that stood out a little at the bottom from the sheer wall, and disappeared. Looking up from below it had seemed to be a part of the wall itself. In fact it covered an open V-shaped seam in the granite, perhaps ten feet high, zig-zag, half filled with broken fragments of fallen granite. Into this the dogs had disappeared.

Jed halted. It was not a pleasant place in which to meet a furious cinnamon bear if he should come charging out in pursuit of the dogs. Jed found a standing place around the edge of this upright sliver and waited with rifle at shoulder, not doubting that the bear would soon chase the dogs out, but no sound issued forth. A half hour went by and Jed whistled into the crevice the loud, shrill whistle with which he called his dogs. By and by they came back quietly, tired, with tongues lolling but perfectly unconcerned as to the presence of any bear. Having rested, they turned and went into the cavern again, barking, evidently wanting Jed to follow. He did so on hands and knees, climbing over the obstructions. What was his astonishment, when he had gone fifty feet or so in the darkness, to see the light break in ahead of him around a point of rock. By this time the dogs had gone clear through. Five minutes more and Jed had followed them into the open and looked down into a broad, deep canyon. The dogs wagged their tails and plunged on, Jed following at the top of his speed.

To make sure of his way Jed unslung his mountaineer's hatchet and blazed his path from tree to tree. An hour later the dogs broke out in full cry up a little side canyon. Jed slung his hatchet, unslung his rifle and pressed on. There was a snarl and a growl and an ugly head was thrust out from under a ledge. Jed fired and a big, shaggy body came rolling down the gulch.

But it was not the bear just then that interested Jed. Cutting enough of a steak to suffice for the dogs and himself he pressed on down the canyon, blazing his way as he went, coming by and by into a main canyon where there was a logging road leading out to civilization. That was enough. He had solved the problem of making Wentworth park accessible from the outer world. A tunnel of a few hundred feet, partly made already, would lead to the outer world.

It was well into the evening before he reached home that night, having been gone since daylight, but he brought the claws of the bear in testimony of his prowess. Otherwise he said nothing, but busied himself with buying out the holdings of the settlers whom Mr. Wentworth had not bought. For practice in his engineering course, as he had explained, he had located dam sites on all the streams, mapped the valley, calculated the power available, built, in his mind and on paper, a woolen mill here, a furniture factory there, a lumber mill at such a point, with a sash and door factory, a little farther down and, on the broad sweep of mesa overlooking the lake, and far enough from the mountains to be free from all risks of freshets and avalanches, he had plotted the town of Wentworth, with parks and boulevards.

Inez had been greatly interested in this planning and map-making all the winter through and it was at her insistence that the maps and plans, the results of half a year's work, were spread one evening on the big dining-room table, which Inez had cleared for the purpose, while the whole household had gathered around. All were much interested. The eyes of Mr. Wentworth fairly shone. Jed stood back with a roll of paper in his hands, saying little, except now and again by way of explanation, while the others waxed enthusiastic.

"But what's the use?" demanded Mr. Wentworth, shoving his chair back from the table and folding his hands behind his head. "I have seen such things in my own mind's eye a hundred times, I reckon, but what's the use while there is no way of getting out of this hole in the earth except by pack train over a mountain rim a mile high? It's nothing but a dream, just a dream."

"Do you remember, Mr. Wentworth," demanded Jed at this juncture, "what you said as we stood on the rim looking down into the valley the day I came in with you?"

"No, what was it?"

"That you would give the hand of your daughter and a half interest in the whole valley to the one who would find a good, practical way out even for a wagon road, to say nothing of a railroad."

"No, I don't remember, did I?"

"Yes, you did, Papa," Inez broke in, laughing and blushing, "for I overheard you myself."

"Well if I did I'll stand to it if you are willing, Inez."

"Oh, I am willing all right—if the right one finds the way."

"Am I the right one, Miss Inez?" asked Jed.

"Oh, but you haven't found the way out yet."

"But am I the right one if I do? I want to know before I show what's in this paper that you haven't any of you seen yet."

"Yes, I'll go you if you find a way out, but, remember, not if you don't," she added, banteringly.

Then Jed spread his remaining sheet upon the table and thumb-tacked the corners down. "Draw around now," he said, "and I'll show you the way out. You begin here, Mr. Wentworth, at the mouth of Barren canyon where that old cinnamon bear killed the sheep, and you follow those tracks right up that canyon to the very end, then through a hidden rift in that 2,000 foot sheer wall, not more than 300 feet long, you come out in Blossom canyon on the other side and so on down the timber road to Denver. I've been through, the dogs and I, down as far as the timber road, but there'll have to be some blasting and clearing out of debris before we can get you through. However, I stand ready to sign up for a thoroughly good wagon road out, with not to exceed a three per cent grade anywhere, for $50,000, and that expenditure will make you worth $5,000,000, or would do it if I were not to come in for half according to promise."

"You don't mean it!"

"Yes I do, and Inez and the Professor and I will go through tomorrow. Perhaps with a little clearing out we may be able to pull you through, too. If we can we'll all have dinner on the Blossom canyon road. I can show you where the tunnel starts and where it ends, but perhaps the longest way around may prove the shortest way through for you, you carry so much avoidupois, although the cinnamon bear made it, but then that was after an all-winter fast while you have fared better, but I'll take the rest through anyhow."

The Wentworth family were hardly able to contain themselves until daylight to verify Jed's map. They started early, Mrs. Wentworth herself insisting upon going, too. They took along two or three men and some ropes and chains, a span of mules in harness and some drills and hammers. By hard work and a little blasting by noon they had cleared enough of the debris out of the way to permit even Daddy Wentworth himself to squeeze through on hands and knees, and down they went to the lumber road, where they soon had coffee boiling and a lunch spread.

After eating, and Mr. Wentworth had lighted his pipe and had leaned back against a tree for a few moments watching the smoke curl upward, he straightened up and slapping his knees with his hands so that his pipe flew off its stem, "Gad, it is great," he said. "Jed, you are a brick. You can put a gang of men to work on that road tomorrow. We'll realize inside of five years every blessed thing you've put on those plans you showed us last night. And what's more, I'll stand by my part of the rest of the bargain to the letter. What do you say, daughter, to your part of it?"

"Oh, I gave my promise two months ago."

"The devil you did!"

"And, old lady, what about you?"

"Humph! Do you suppose I've been blind to what was going on all winter just because you have? I'd 'a put a stop to it then if I had had any objections to make."

And so—what? Nothing, absolutely nothing. If Jed had had a mettlesome horse he would hardly have dared to ride it, for, although he rode horseback a great deal, he never became a broncho buster, and if by any chance such a horse had come into his possession, he would not have known the value of it. He never in all his life lost so much as one bear, and millions could not have tempted him into any such hole in the rocks as above described. If there be on the crust of God's earth any such valley Jed never heard of it. It was all a miserable day-dream, dreamed over and over so many times that it stuck like the memory of a story many times told. It was one of half a score or more of such dreams that haunted Jed half his days, until, with infinite effort, he broke himself of the day-dreaming habit, but that is another story or the sequel to another, if nothing more.

THE SILENT PHILANTHROPIST

Major Henry L. Higginson of Boston, often called "the silent philanthropist," recently celebrated his 76th birthday. He is beloved by the men of Harvard university for his share in enlarging the social welfare of the students by means of the Harvard union, and for his gift of Soldiers' field. It is his fine distinction to have made possible the establishment and maintenance of the Boston symphony orchestra, for he employed $200,000 to fortify this foremost American orchestra. He is a trustee of the New England conservatory of music, and the New England representative of Andrew Carnegie in the trusteeship of the $15,000,000 fund of the Carnegie institute.

SHEAR WIT

A most peculiar and startling accident was that in which Miss Grace Cantonwine of Oxford Junction recently figured, that of unintentionally swallowing a teaspoon. She was relieved only after strenuous efforts by a physician and a most exciting time, which aroused the entire neighborhood in which the young lady resides.

"Look here, waiter," said Mr. Grouch, scowling deeply over his plate, "I ordered turtle soup. There ain't even a morsel of turtle flavor in this." "Of course not," returned the waiter. "What do you expect? Shakespeare said there was nothing in a name. If you ordered cottage pudding would you expect a cottage in it? In Manhattan salad would you look for a Flatiron or Singer building? Any tea, sir?"—Harper's.

"To the drunkard anything is an excuse for a drink." The speaker, Dr. H. Clay Winter, Cleveland's specialist in dipsomania, smiled and resumed: "I found one of my worst patients in a rathskeller one Saturday night. Nine saucers were stacked before him, and pointing to the saucers sternly I said: 'What? Nine large beers already. My dear Jobbins, think of your ten children.' 'Thanks for the reminder, doc,' the dipsomaniac answered. 'Here, waiter, bring me one more beer.'"—Washington Star.

Macdonald—I didna see the bride, Sandy. Sandy—Whist, mon! 'Tis no a weddin', but a funeral. Macdonald—I didna ken! But, onyway, 'tis a grand entertainment.—New York Press.

Prosecuting Attorney—Your honor, the sheriff's bull-pup has gone and chawed up the court Bible. Judge—Well, make the witness kiss the bull-pup, then. We can't adjourn court just to hunt up a new Bible.—Lippincott's.

CLASSROOM REPORTEE

The most popular professor at Yale is William Lyon Phelps of the English department, says the College World. He has been called by Yale men "The Lord of the Quick Answer," and in his friendly clashes with the undergraduates he is just as willing to take as to give—provided only that the "take" is justified by its intrinsic cleverness.

As an illustration of the "give" side of Prof. Phelps, there is told the story of an athlete who approached him one day and asked the professor what he thought of the attitude that it was then rumored the faculty was going to take on the football situation at the university. "Do you wish me to answer as a member of the faculty or as a man of sense?" asked Phelps.

As an illustration of the "take" side there is told the story of one of his students who, having been rebuked for his lack of knowledge on the subject in point, said that he believed he knew enough about English anyway to get along subsequently in the world.

"Ah, do you?" drawled the professor ironically, "and what, pray, is going to be your line of activity when you do go out 'into the world?'"

The young man looked him squarely in the eye a moment and replied: "I am going to take charge of my father's brewery." It was true. Prof. Phelps recalled the fact that the young man's father was a wealthy brewer, appreciated the wit in the retort and laughed out loud with the rest of the class.

A particularly lazy undergraduate at Princeton several years ago, having failed for six successive days to prepare himself in his Latin lessons, was openly rebuked before his class by his professor, who exclaimed: "Mr. Perkins (the name will do), you do not seem to have the slightest knowledge of what work is!"

Perkins, unabashed, replied brazenly that "everything was work." "Indeed," sarcastically retorted the professor, determined to make the audacious young man appear the fool, "I presume (tapping the desk in front of him) that, in your broad classification even this is work." "Yes, sir," answered Perkins seriously, without turning an eyelash, "that's woodwork."

Dean Briggs of Harvard is as much loved by the undergraduates as is Prof. Phelps at Yale. He is a champion of athletic sport and a man possessed of an ever ready wit that can appreciate as well as be appreciated. During the year when the slogan "To Hell with Yale" first became popular with the Cambridge undergraduates community Dean Briggs was one day hurrying to see a football game in the stadium in company with Edward Everett Hale. On the way they met a crabbed old member of the faculty who sarcastically asked the dean if he was going to cheer at the game. "Surely," replied the latter; "I'm going to Yell with Hale."

As an example of the dean's willingness to be the butt of a shaft of repartee in a clash with a student there is the story of the undergraduate who, upon being asked during an English lecture what he considered to be the greatest book written in the English language, replied "John D. Rockefeller's bankbook." "But, sir," returned the dean in mock seriousness, "you can hardly classify that as a classic." "Oh, I don't know," replied the student, "it's certainly a Standard work."

Would you like to know more about the work we are doing in the way of preparing for, and placing young men in, good positions in the great busy new San Francisco?

SAN FRANCISCO BUSINESS COLLEGE
MARKET POWELL & EDDY STS. S.F.
WRITE FOR CATALOGUE

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

Department No. 3.

ERNEST H. CLARK CARY,

Plaintiff,

Action No. 23805

vs. All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof.

Defendants.

ERNEST J. MOTT,

Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Ernest H. Clark Cary, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the northwesterly line of Brannan Street, distant thereon eighty-four (84) feet and nine and seven-eighths (97/8) inches southwesterly from the southwesterly line of Zoe Street; running thence southwesterly along said line of Brannan Street sixty (60) feet and two and one-eighth (2 1/8) inches; thence at a right angle northwesterly eighty (80) feet; thence at a right angle northeasterly sixty (60) feet and two and one-eighth (2 1/8) inches; thence at a right angle southeasterly eighty (80) feet to the northwesterly line of Brannan Street and the point of commencement; being a part of One Hundred Vara Lot Number 162.

Together with the appurtenances of each and every part thereof.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple as absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 28th day of October, A. D. 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
By M. Kragen, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 11th day of November, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

City and County of San Francisco, a municipal corporation, whose address is San Francisco, California.

The German Savings and Loan Society, a corporation, whose address is Number 526 California Street, San Francisco, California.

Nov. 11-10t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of SARA JACOBS, deceased.
Notice is hereby given by the undersigned executor of the last will of Sara Jacobs, deceased, to the creditors of, and to all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers with 10 months after the first publication of this notice to the said executor at his office, Room 909 Kohl Building, Corner Montgomery and California Streets, San Francisco, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of Sara Jacobs, deceased.

LESTER H. JACOBS,
Executor of the last will of Sara Jacobs, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, November 18, 1910.

ISAAC FROHMAN, Attorney for the Executor.
11-18-6t

NOTICE OF SALE OF DELINQUENT SHARES OF STOCK

LUXOR OIL COMPANY, A CORPORATION
Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.

Location of works, southeast corner of Section 22, Township 32, Range 24, County of Kern, California.

NOTICE

There is delinquent upon the following described stock on account of assessment (No. 1) levied on the 4th day of October, A. D. 1910, the several amounts set opposite the names of the respective share holders, as follows:

Names.	Number of Certificate	No. of shares	Amount
Bunger, F. C.	111	250	5.00
Callaghan, R. I.	36	6500	130.00
Callaghan, R. I.	90	4500	90.00
Cormack, C. F.	60	1000	20.00
Dopovan, Wm.	153	500	10.00
Ford, Mrs.	151	1000	20.00
Grogan, W. R.	156	18183	363.66
Giles, Edw.	76	400	8.00
Grogan, Mrs. W. R.	152	3000	60.00
Hoadley, G. O.	67	17300	346.00
Harrower, Robert	77	1000	20.00
Hammond, Wm.	83	100	2.00
Hazelton, Mrs. D. H.	87	500	10.00
Hazelton, Mrs. R. H.	127	500	10.00
Hazelton, Mrs. R. H.	128	250	5.00
Kingwell, Ida	110	500	10.00
Love, Robert	81	1000	20.00
McCarthy, I. D.	101	1000	20.00
McCarthy, Joe	160	1000	20.00
Nee, Mrs. M. E.	94	100	2.00
O'Brien, T.	63	100	2.00
Risipin, H. A.	10	333	6.66
Risipin, H. A.	50	1000	20.00
Risipin, H. A.	53	1000	20.00
Risipin, H. A.	54	500	10.00
Risipin, H. A., Trustee	192	10000	200.00
Risipin, H. A., Trustee	193	9000	180.00
Risipin, Annette	167	100	2.00
A. L. Saunders	145	250	5.00
Saunders, Mrs. A. L.	144	250	5.00
Tregear, Mrs. Anna	138	200	4.00
Whitaker, C. L.	70	1000	20.00
Welch, Mrs. Chas.	142	500	10.00

And in accordance with law, so many shares of each parcel of such stock as may be necessary will be sold at the office of the said corporation at 219 Sansome Street, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on Wednesday, the 7th day of December, A. D. 1910, at 10 o'clock A. M. of the said day, to pay delinquent assessments thereon, together with costs of advertising and expenses of the sale.

H. F. GORDON,
Secretary of Luxor Oil Company, a corporation.
Location of office, 219 Sansome Street, San Francisco, California.
11-18-3t

TITLES RESTORED

TITLES RESTORED UNDER McENERNEY ACT, complete for $35.00. Burnt Records Title Co., 951-953 Monadnock Building, ninth floor. Market street, near Third.

JULIUS GALMANN
NOTARY PUBLIC

Office, 30 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491
Residence, 1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4590

SAN FRANCISCO

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Work of the Railroad Commission

The new constitution of California attempted an elaborate and effective system of railroad control. It declared that all railroad, canal and other transportation companies are common carriers and subject to legislative control; that no railroad company or other common carrier shall combine or make any contract with the owners of any vessel that leaves port or makes port in this state by which the earnings of one doing the carrying are to be shared by the other not doing the carrying; that no discriminations in charges or facilities for transportation shall be made by any railroad or other transportation company; that the state shall be divided into three railroad commission districts as nearly equal in population as practicable, each district to elect one commissioner; it being the power and the duty of such commission to establish rates of charges for the transportation of persons and freight, to make changes as required by the public service, to hear and determine complaints, to prescribe uniform systems of accounts for transportation companies, all these requirements to be enforced by the legislature by forfeiture of charter if necessary in order to compel obedience. To make sure of the proper exercise of these powers the legislature was empowered to remove, by a two-thirds vote of all elected members, for incompetency or neglect of duty, any or all of the railroad commissioners, the governor to fill by appointment the vacancies so created.

If constitutional authority and law were all that were needed to secure a proper regulation of common carriers it would seem that California's constitution and laws should have proven beacon lights to the nation, but alas for constitution and law! For thirty years the common carriers of California have been a law unto themselves and the provisions quoted from above have been as though they did not exist. Not a provision of them all but has been violated with impunity and nothing worth while has been done to bring the violators of the law to account.

Tiring of the lawlessness of common carriers the legislature, two years ago, undertook to strengthen the laws and did strengthen them somewhat, though not nearly as decisively as they might have been strengthened. With the hope of attracting bigger men to the task the salaries of the commissioners were increased from $4,000 to $6,000 per year.

It was made the duty of the Board of Railroad Commissioners to hold hearings at different points in the state and, in the event of failure of the common carriers to heed the directions of the commissioners, it was made the duty of said commission to report at once to the attorney general of the state, whose duty it was made to institute proceedings in the courts to enforce the orders of the board.

Severe penalties were also prescribed for violations of the laws on the part of corporations or their employees, and the fixing of maximum rates was made obligatory on the commission to fix rates of all kinds, joint rates and through rates by connecting lines, and to hear and determine all controversies arising under the law, not, however, without appealing to the courts where the railroad or other carrier feels that such rates work an injustice to it. The new law is not as strong as it might have been made, not as strong as another bill pending before the legislature proposed to make it, but quite strong enough to deprive the commission of the excuse of inaction for the want of needed laws for the control of common carriers.

Still the new law, as well as the old, leaves the commission to an extent a passive body, like a court, in that it must wait for complaints to be made and may not, to the extent needed, search out inequalities and excesses and remedy them by its own positive and initiatory action.

In this as well as in all other cases it is not the law which governs, but the men into whose hands is entrusted the enforcement of the laws. Statutes are of themselves dead timber. They have little vitality until some living hand reaches out to make them effective and, for thirty years, the living hands entrusted with enforcing the laws in relation to common carriers in California have been paralytic in a high degree and for the reason that they were chosen by the common carriers themselves. To be sure they were nominated by conventions of the people and were voted for by the people themselves, but they were selected, if not elected, by the political bureaus of the transportation companies, and so long as corporations select for the people to elect commissions and courts they are little likely to be bothered about the laws or infractions thereof.

Now, however, the state is on the eve of a new deal in the department of corporation control. A railroad commission has been both selected and elected by the people and it is to be hoped that a dead-letter law will be brought to life, not to harass or injure common carriers, whose injury would be injurious also to the general public, but for protection of the common welfare against a greedy and lawless aggression.

The student of affairs will do well to watch the activities of the State Railroad Commission during the next two years with a renewed interest. It will require some time for the new members to get into harness, but if they will address themselves to the task in hand as they would to their own business they will advance the general welfare not a little and injure common carriers not at all.

"Prosperity has ruined many a man," remarked the moralizer.

"Well," rejoined the demoralizer, "if I was going to be ruined at all I'd want prosperity to do it."—Chicago News.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE

A full line of Theosophical Literature from Point Loma, California, the headquarters of the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society, under the leadership of Katherine Tingley, is now on sale at A. M. Robertson's, 222 Stockton St., S. F., and at Smith Bros., 462 13th St., Oakland, California.

PUBLIC MEN USE

Allen's Press Clippings

to help them keep in touch with every publication in the State. Send your order to 88 First Street, S. F. IT PAYS TO KEEP POSTED.

Day School---Night School

Electrical, Mining, Civil
AND
Automobile Engineering

Architectural Drawing
Wireless and Morse Telegraphy

BOOKKEEPING : SHORTHAND

Our Graduates in Every Department Secure Good Positions

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
Invisible Bifocal Lenses

181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tels: Oakland 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY

DECEMBER 9 : '10
FIVE CENTS THE COPY

Vol. III Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street: San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH · GOOD COURAGE · GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six Months, $1.25. Three Years, $5.00, in Advance. No. 2

An Institutional Iago

AS THIS PAPER GOES TO PRESS the charter election of Oakland is in full swing. The chief opponent to this upward and forward step is the saloon, which was to be anticipated, for no good thing can be achieved without first whipping that institution to a frazzle. Was it Iago who declared that, "If ever in my life I have done one good deed I do repent it from my very soul?" Anyhow, that sentiment exactly voices the inward spirit of the American saloon. It can be counted on to be opposed to every good thing from the bottom of its very soul. It is an institutional Iago.

What Wrung the Soul of Him

THE HEART OF THE CONTINENT is the Mississippi valley, at once the richest and most prosperous portion of North America, and yet it is precisely there that population is either diminishing or increasing at the slowest rate. Why? Because prosperous farmers are buying all that "jines" them, farm acreage is enlarging and landlordism is taking the place of independent proprietorship. Of 102 counties in Illinois, 49, all agricultural, show a less population than ten years ago, while farm lands have doubled in value. There is taking place all over the Middle West what transpired in the Sacramento valley when wheat was worth $1.50 per cental: division fences are being torn down and school house windows boarded up. How forsooth did that form of "progress" wring the soul of the late Will S. Green! Does it do it yet? Our guess is that it does.

Their Type of Mind

WITH WHAT CONCERN shall we not watch the filling of the vacancies on the supreme bench of the United States by President Taft! More important than the records candidates have made are their types of mind. Better almost be of dubious integrity than of reactionary tendencies of thought and action. Himself a judicial progressive, cherishing no illusions regarding the low estate of judicial interpretation in America, we have a right to expect judicial vacancies to be filled with living timber, not dead, with men of progressive minds, not with harks from the tombs. All the same, insurgent senators will do well to be on their guard.

Modesto Leads

THE LITTLE CITY OF MODESTO, in that county of Stanislaus of which it was once said that it invariably went Democratic strongly enough "to suit the meanest man on earth," lately adopted a commission form of government, and other up-to-date features, with ever so little of cackle. Yet, in one particular Modesto leads the world. It authorized the city fathers to provide municipal aviation alighting grounds for the convenience of ships that pass in the air. Modesto is not to be found with the unready.

Other Reasons

THERE ARE REASONS other than those dictated through compassion for man, woman, boy and beast why persons should wish to do their Christmas shopping early. Those who do not will have to put up with what has been pawed over times innumerable and left, and who would wish to present their friends with the culls?

Where China Balks

CHINA IS WILLING graciously to accept a loan of $50,000,000 of American money, but balks at accepting with it an American financier to do the spending. Nothing could be more natural than that the lenders should wish to know where their money goes to, but then, naturally, so would China, don't you know.

Mean As Measles

PHILADELPHIA HAS A DEPARTMENT store owner who compromised with an embezzler on condition that he return so much of the stolen money as he had not expended, but that same man dragged before the magistrate a boy charged with having stolen five cents, avid for his punishment. How did so small a soul come to possess a store having more departments than peanuts and popcorn?

Is Cummins Coming?

A FEW WEEKS SINCE The California Weekly hoisted the banner of Beveridge for Republican candidate for president in 1912, but, up to date, the nomination has not received a second. The Fresno Republican now declares for Cummins of Iowa, a sagacious statesman and persistent fighter for Right Things. It is a trifle early for anything more important than honorable mention. The issues will be made during the winter of 1911 and 1912 and the candidate will have to fit the issues as they then line up.

Put Them in Uniform

STOCKTON'S HIGH SCHOOL GIRLS are in revolt because their principal has ruled against personal adornment with false curls and they threaten to go on strike. The highest service rendered by our public school system is that it levels and assimilates persons of all natiivities and stations, and there is no better assistant leveler or assimilator than a neat, tidy, inexpensive uniform. Putting the Stockton girls in uniform will nip their snobbish tendencies as a cold frost puts crimps on tomato vines.

Is the Truth Coming Out?

TELL IT NOT IN GATH, but the report of Secretary Meyer, favoring a naval station on San Francisco bay otherwhere than at Mare Island, raises the presumption that it has at last been officially determined that the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers can be depended on to silt up the channel to Mare Island navy yard as often as it is dredged out. This has been the unofficial opinion of well informed persons for many years, but our representatives in congress have none the less found it as profitable a place to expend appropriations as any other. It was not what became of the money that yielded both glory and votes.

Don't Do It

EUGENE HALE OF MAINE earnestly desires to see his seat in the United States senate go to his Democratic friend, Charles F. Johnson. The kind of man that will suit Hale is exactly the kind that will suit none but the Scribes and Pharisees.

State Training School For Orphans

It is impossible that any state can do too much in aid of such children as, for one reason or other, have been bereft of their natural protection and support, but it is quite possible for a state to make expenditures on their behalf that are much less wise than might be made, and there are reasons for fearing that our state is on the eve of doing exactly that thing. The last legislature appropriated $125,000 for securing a site upon which is to be established a state industrial school for such dependent children as may have graduated from orphanages at 14 years of age when state aid ceases, and this sum has been found inadequate.

Before the state gets this enterprise fairly upon its feet it will be likely to have expended half a million dollars and it need surprise no one if a decade hence the footings will show the expenditure of a million. This is not necessarily a fatal objection to the plan. If the money be expended wisely and well, and if there be no better way in which it may be expended, why then, on with the enterprise. Let parsimony have no part in it. A million dollars will be none too much.

Much mystery has been professed as to what becomes of dependent children when they have reached the state-aid limit of fourteen years, but the lack is merely of statistics not of knowledge. They are absorbed into the life of the people and that is where they should go. Whether half orphan or orphan there is nearly always someone ready to take the state aided child into his keeping when fourteen years of age, by which time it ceases to be a bill of expense and may be able to earn its own keep.

It is urged that children come out of orphanages at fourteen unfit to go out to service because inadequately trained for service. That is true, true partly because the orphanages are unprogressive, true because many more of them are poor and cannot afford to supply the training they would like to, but pre-eminently true because no sort of institution is a fit place in which to train anything except the occasional black sheep of the family for domestic life. A far wiser expenditure of public money than proposed would be one which should first exact of the orphanages better training of young children for life and, second, extend further aid to precisely that end and no other.

But a still wiser expenditure of money even than that of requirement of, and aid to, adequate training in orphanages would be a state system of placing and boarding out to be conducted by the State Board of Charities and Corrections in connection with a general supervision of all placing out agencies. Legal interest on a sum that will locate, establish and equip Governor Gillett's proposed State Industrial Training school for dependent children, would amply provide for such an agency and it would be the greatest benefaction for the dependent children of California of which the mind can conceive.

The highest interests of dependent childhood require that this enterprise be not consummated before the expiration of Governor Gillett's term of office in order that a halt may be called and the funds diverted to a wiser use. It is not so much that a bad thing is proposed to be done as it is that a much better use of state funds may easily be made. Dependency grows on what it feeds on and it will feed on this industrial school and, to all intents and purposes, be as dependent as before.

It is only in family life that a child can be fitted for family life, except that a human sparrow caught up on the streets, wholly undomesticated, may profitably spend a few months in a well ordered institution to be "rough broken," as horsemen would say, before being placed in a family to be reared;

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage. Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

179

but any child institutionalized until eighteen, the age at which it is proposed to discharge children from this institution, will be as unfit to cope with the world as when that child entered the orphanage. It may know how to do certain things, but its knowledge of life will be nil and without that knowledge nothing counts for anything.

San Francisco alone can swamp such an institution and keep it swamped. It may easily be made a bigger institution than any now in the state, unless it be the state university and, if the state will but furnish the means, it will be entirely possible to matriculate more students there than are matriculated in the state university including all its departments. The truth is that those back of this enterprise little know what they are doing. Their hearts are right but their pates are addled. If the issue were this or nothing it might be well to do this. Otherwise not, and that need not be the issue.

What Are We Going To Do About It?

It is all true, every count in the indictment against extortion, bribery, fraud, dishonesty in weighing, measuring and making; that ruthlessness in industry that cracks men through at a pace that makes them aged at 50; that capitalization of childhood and cashing of it in with heartless disregard to consequences; that industrial exploitation of motherhood that involves the impoverishment of the race; government by railroad, the centralization of wealth in the hands of an incorporated plutocracy, the corrupting of congresses, legislatures and municipal councils; the contamination of the courts, subsidizing of the press, tainting of the sources of news; the harm that liquor, opium and the social evil work; the inefficacy of our churchly life and the shortcomings of our educational system—these are all terribly, lamentably, incontrovertibly true. There is small need that further evidence be adduced to sustain these allegations. The case may well be closed and the evidence we have be submitted to the public as a jury that the verdict of guilt may be pronounced.

What are we going to do about these things? Knowing the nature of the malady, what curative can we apply? What constructive work is there that we may undertake with reasonable hope for beneficial results? Where shall we look for leadership and with what measure of self denial may we hope to follow that leadership if we find it? Such queries are always timely, never more so than now that the public is awakened to the existence of social wrongs that were hardly dreamed of, or bothered about, a decade ago.

Let it be accepted that the ills we bear are mainly attributable to dishonesty and greed and that dishonesty and greed are all pervasive and neither to be legislated nor retributively punished out of the race. The race has groped its way up from barbarism, and to barbarism it had groped its way farther than it has come since barbarism, up out of the blackness of prehistoric animalism where the only law was that of claw and fang. Is it any wonder that some cerements of that living death still cling to the body of human society? We must not expect too much in the way of reform in our own generation or in the ten generations that are to follow our own. Sin is in the world and its roots strike to the very marrow of men's bones. Utopia is not yet.

But we can make things better than they are. We can make it easier for people to do right. We can eliminate some of the temptations to evil. We can at least hold up before the face of the race clean-cut ideals as to what is right. We can force in upon the consciences of men a knowledge betwixt good and evil. That will be great gain. Fortunately for the world there lived nineteen centuries ago one who, whatever men may think of him, and with little or no regard to the theories and isms with which his personality has been invested, at least taught a way of living this life whose soundness and beauty neither saint nor sage has dared seriously to question. We can, if we do nothing more, exalt that personality and that way of living, and that will mean much toward making things better than they are.

We can set our standards of public service high and be exacting. Even a second class official can be induced to yield fairly good service if a first class demand be made upon him. We can strive for good laws, but good men with bad laws can give us better and juster government than bad men with good laws, for, after all, it is the man on the job who determines the character of the job.

We can interest ourselves in public affairs, remembering that public business is our business and that public men are our employees. We can each of us perform our civic duty. That of itself will eliminate a great portion of the evils attendant upon bad government.

We can reach out after justice. It has been the quest of the race. We can vitalize and energize that quest. We can hold our bench and our bar accountable, not to a carping but to an earnest, a rational and a courageous criticism. We can, with indignation, resent the imputation that courts and judges are above public call to account for their stewardship or that the concept of an independent judiciary implies immunity from responsibility to the power that created it. The laity may not, does not, know the law as well as the judiciary, but it knows justice and right every whit as well and it is justice rather than law that we want established.

We can remember that the common good is the paramount good and refuse to profit personally at the injury of the common welfare.

These things we can do and only as we do them can the proved, admitted evils of our time, evils that cause the race to groan under the burden, be lessened and their galling of the neck of the race be relieved. There is no way in the world among men whereby civic or personal righteousness may be made easy or achieved otherwise than as here laid down. Let us, each for himself, highly resolve to get busy and keep busy making things better than they are.

The Passing of Mrs. Eddy

The remarkable thing about Mrs. Eddy was not Mrs. Eddy, remarkable woman though she was. The astounding fact, the fact that stuns, is that in enlightened, hard-headed America something approximating a million persons could be found to become followers of this unusual personality. She did not find her followers among the lowly, among the superstitious, among those whom the world would call ignorant, stolid, gross. Rather do the faces of her followers suggest that over refinement and attenuation that betokens exhaustion. No patient plodders, they, climbing up Zion's hill. They are not the burden bearers of research and investigation. The scientific method is as far from them as from the poet, the artist, the seer. They who would follow Mrs. Eddy must take the wings of the morning and fly or be left behind. Her "science" is no more of a science than sooth-saying, clairvoyance, astrology, voodooism, thought transference, spiritism, healing by the laying on of hands, the wearing of amulets and charms. No tireless delvers they with an infinity of patience digging for the root fibres of nature's laws. Their "science" leaped full panoplied from the brain of their Zeus. Starting with an elemental, age-old truth their "science" threw off systems of thought and healing as whirling gases hurtling through space throw off worlds and their satellites, peppering the empyrean with meteors and star dust. The followers of Mrs. Eddy were not the "eternally gullible." They are the eternally spontaneous and enthusiastic. Catching half an idea, whew! the air is made vibrant with the flutter of their wings hieing themselves off to put that half idea into whole operation. Christian science at once became profitable. Had it lacked that sure foundation, that one practical pedestal upon which this remarkable personality could plant her material feet, the whole scheme must long since have evaporated like uncorked ether. To the spirit of Mary Baker G. Eddy peace! She was no humbug. What she taught others she had hypnotized herself into believing to be true. She no more needed a physician in her last hours than does the dying year, having fulfilled its course. Eighty-five per cent. of the ailments of the flesh are either incurable or will cure themselves if let alone. This truth affords every system of healing ever imagined or devised abundant opportunity to "demonstrate" its efficacy and Christian Science offers no exception to the general rule. Charlatans there are in the cult, attracted to it by its profitableness, but they are rare enough to be exceptional. The body of its adherents, practitioners and patients are sincere, devoted and loyal to a marvelous personality. What will become of the cult now that its founder is no more? That will make little difference. She has been no more than a figurehead for a decade. It will thrive as long as the practice of it is profitable and it will be profitable until the advance of true science forces that which is pseudo into the background. Until then, not devoid of good and not of evil, it will persist to live, but compared with such "digs" after real truth as Prof. Koch, Pasteur, Paul Ehrlich, Simon P. Flexner, time will prove Mary Baker G. Eddy to have been a negligible factor in the healing of the nations.

Labor Legislation

Our leading article for the week, from the pen of that thoughtful, sane and restrained leader of labor, Mr. Walter Macarthur, deals with labor legislation in a broad and general way. We had hoped that he might point out more specifically just what will be attempted by labor and for labor during the coming session of the legislature, but he has left us to infer that from the general trend of labor thought. That some things will be attempted goes without saying. We wish we better knew what.

There is in existence a state commissioner of labor with an office force of seven and a salary list totalling $14,000 annually, besides incidental expenses. This commission has its uses, but it is not of the use that it might be made. If it were more fully equipped and required to inquire into the merits of all labor disputes resulting in strikes and lockouts and make its findings public it could be made of incalculable value to industrial peace, always provided that an able and honest expert, such as, for instance, Walter Macarthur would make, were commissioned to head it instead of one whose claim to appointment was based on political manipulation.

Fairness of a Variable Rate

A fortnight ago this paper contained an editorial in criticism of a maximum rate for electric lighting that doubles the minimum rate. Elsewhere in this paper will be found a lucid article from the trenchant pen of Engineer J. D. Galloway replying to our editorial and justifying a higher rate for small consumers than for large and explaining the reasons why. We find his article convincing. He writes as an electrical expert. We write as a layman concerned only for fair play for the small consumer of this most convenient of all known methods of lighting the homes of the people. The issue is of practical value. The cost of lighting enters into the cost of living and the cost of living relates intimately to the desirability of living. Therefore there should be further discussion, not merely in relation to the fairness of "a" variable rate, which our editorial of a fortnight ago conceded, but of the fairness of "the" variable rate now being charged.

No doubt there should be a higher charge per kilowatt hour for small consumers of electric energy than for large, and no doubt that difference should comprehend more than our editorial of a fortnight ago allowed—the difference in the cost of accounting and collecting. To this must be added, as Mr. Galloway makes clear, a percentage of loss in transmission, an allotted part of investment in the transmission lines to each consumer (consisting possibly of one pole and a hundred feet of wire) and perhaps incidentals not here mentioned.

But Mr. Galloway will pardon us if we take issue with him in relation to his statement that, "A, with a factory down town is not interested in B having electricity in his home in the Mission." That interest appears to us to be direct, important and mutual. Roughly speaking, the demand is for power by day and for light by night with a commodity that varies little in supply whether by day or by night. If the daylight use can be so developed as to balance the night demand, and the night the day, electric energy should be furnished the cheaper both day and night.

When the Valley road was constructed the farmers of the San Joaquin figured that, inasmuch as that road had no grades to climb, no bad weather to encounter and had a level pull both ways, they should have the cheapest freight rates in the world in proportion to tonnage furnished, but when the Santa Fe took over the Valley road this hope vanished. The business of the San Joaquin valley was taxed to carry cars up the mountains and across the desert where the local earnings would scarcely buy axle grease. Public policy justified this mulcting of the farmers of the San Joaquin for the common good of the line because a railroad is a public service corporation. The same consideration justifies the imposition of a contributive rate upon large consumers of electric energy in order that small consumers may be supplied.

The issues raised by this paper and Mr. Galloway are not academic. They are practical and demand practical consideration. Among all our reforms in the interests of reducing the cost of living to the common man not even the tariff outranks that of lessening the margin between the price at which rich men and poor buy the same commodities or secure the same kind of public service, and we respectfully submit that where this difference doubles to the small consumer the price paid by the large that difference is too great and should be reduced.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

"The beginnings of reason do not lie in reason, but in something better," so writes a philosopher. What is that thing that is better than reason, that comes before reason and out of which reason grows? What use can we make of it that we do not now put it to?

The history of the life of every child is a resume of the life history of the race and the more we study child life the better shall we understand our own life problems, for we are but children of a larger growth.

Reason is a late product in the life of every child. In fact, it hardly manifests itself in childhood at all. The child can learn and understand, appreciate and sympathize with and be influenced by whatever comes within reach, but deliberately to reason, to start with a premise and build up step by step a cohesive and logical conclusion, well, that comes late in childhood if it comes in childhood at all and many there be who do not attain to it though they reach old age. Those who demand of their half grown children that power of reasoning which they themselves possess are making a mistake as serious as the stupid teamster who expects his horses to know as much as he does and lashes them because they do not.

But if the child has not the power of reasoning to guide it it has something else that serves. The God who made it did not leave it unguided. The child was given marvelous powers of perception and insight, powers that in older folk dull and atrophy from non-use, and the child is given a power of imitation that would be the despair of adults. As we grow old we are what we are and cannot even pretend, just for fun, to be anyone else, but, just for fun, any child can be anybody he knows and act the part with fidelity. Children have love and the spirit of dependence and they can confide in those they love with an utter abandon of reserve.

These attributes of childhood are all sufficing for leading childhood toward adulthood along beaten paths, but they are wholly inadequate for striking out for an independent career, unguided and unled. They are as incapable of a self-ordered life until power for reasoning comes to them as they are for procreation before puberty. Parents who overlook or forget this limitation which nature imposes upon childhood do their children a great wrong. While adults are children of larger growth, having thousands of common points founded in a common humanity, nevertheless adults are less sensitive to what scientists call reactions than are children, and the child's power for reasoning is only embryonic, to be nurtured and developed, but not to be given the wheel that controls the rudder until able to manipulate it.

All that has gone before means just this: The God who made children did not endow them in infancy, in childhood or early youth, with that measure of reason which is needful for their own guidance. Somebody else must guide them. That somebody should be the parents who brought them into being, and any parent that relinquishes that function to the child abdicates family government and is unfit to have a family.

This is not saying that parental authority should be despotic, peremptory, harsh, but only that it must be unquestioning and plenary. It must be sufficient to do the guiding, relinquishing its hold by little and little as the growth of the reasoning faculties of the child makes it plain that the child can a little more, and a little more yet, be trusted to assume control of the steering gear of its own career. It is because parents do not fully understand and appreciate these elemental truths that young America so often reaches adulthood without ever having learned that lesson of obedience without which good citizenship is not to be looked for in man or woman. It is disobedience that fills our prisons and our almshouses and that disobedience is chargeable to parental neglect.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

What English Political Parties Represent

Now that a period of "political unrest" is upon Great Britain foreign dispatches contain many references to the political parties over there, and the names, "Liberal," "Nationalist," "Unionist," "Radical," etc., are frequently found in the newspapers and magazines. It may be enlightening to such of our readers as are not posted concerning English politics briefly to indicate what these various parties represent, that for which they stand in political affairs. The Nationalist party stands primarily, at all times, for the interests of Ireland, for home rule for Erin, and it employs its influence in all conceivable honorable ways to attain that end. The Liberal party simply is the old Whig party with modern attachments. Formerly the Whigs, as opposed to the Tories, or Conservatives, were those members of the aristocracy who opposed and combated the absolute power of kings. When the franchise privilege was enlarged and many of the "proletaire" became voters, they naturally inclined to work with the Whigs; also the men of great influence among them soon held much of the power of the organization. The old name of the party was of aristocratic lineage, and these new leaders were not; hence it was not unnatural that the party gradually assumed the name of Liberal, although some of the more aristocratic members still describe themselves as Whigs. "Radical" is but a name sometimes applied, especially by Conservatives, to the Liberal party. The "Unionists" had their origin in 1886, at a time when Mr. Gladstone advocated home rule for Ireland. Disagreeing with him on this issue, some of his lieutenants left him and united with the old Conservative party, then led by Lord Salisbury, under the name of Liberal Unionists, the latter word being expressive of their view that the existing union between England and Ireland should be maintained. At the time such an alliance between Liberals and Conservatives seemed unnatural, but it has been maintained, although the "Liberal" prefix has been dropped since then, and now the men of the party are known as "Unionists" only.

For Whom Should We Pray?

The Anglican Church Convocation, sitting at Westminster, recently attempted to revise the book of prayer used in the English Church. First, the Archdeacon of Birmingham proposed that the words, "Have mercy upon all Jews, Turks, Infidels and Hereticks, and take from them all ignorance, hardness of heart and contempt of Thy Word," should be changed to read, "Have mercy upon all Jews, and upon all others that be not of the Christian faith." The Archdeacon of Leicester supported the motion, the idea appearing to be that it showed a lack of courtesy to publicly pray for a people so friendly as the Turks. The Dean of Lincoln held that if the name of the Turks were omitted, so should that of the Jews be, as the Jews are quite as friendly as the Turks. Thereupon the Archdeacon of Coventry admitted that he groped when he attempted to perceive a reason why Jews should object to being prayed for, and the Dean of St. David's suggested that if the Jews were left out it might suggest that the Church had given them up as hopeless and off praying ground. The Dean of Westminster urged that "Mohammedans" should be inserted among those worthy of our prayers. By this time the reverend gentlemen had gotten into such deep water that they could not see their way clear to swim out, and so they gave up the attempt, leaving both Jews and Turks subject to those prayers which, by the way, would hurt none of us. When it comes to grave issues difficult of solution, an ecclesiastical council almost always can be relied upon to find them.

The Use of the Telephone

How tremendous is the increasing use of the telephone in the business and social life of this country is indicated by an estimate made by the United States census bureau. According to this estimate more than eleven billion conversations were carried on by telephone here during the year 1907. This was three years ago, and, taking into consideration the phenomenal increase in telephoning, it is not improbable that as many as fifteen billion such conversations were carried on this year. However, taking the figures for 1907, and allowing that there were then ninety million people in this country—although there were not—the average number of telephonic conversations for each man, woman and child in the United States would have been 122. As the babies cannot use telephones, and a goodly number of other people practically do not, it would appear that the telephone-talkers must have been fairly busy. It is interesting, too, to note the increase. Between 1902 and 1907 such conversations increased from five billion to over eleven billion. We did two and one-fifth times as much telephone-talking in the latter year as in the former. There seems to be no question that the telephone has come to stay, and "Line's busy" is a watchword that is likely to go thundering down the ages.

Causes of Aviators' Deaths

Professor Soreau, of France, has carefully estimated that the number of recognized aviators in the world is about 500. Of this number about 30, or six per cent., have been killed. The total number of miles flown by them is about 125,000. That is, there has been one death for every 4,166 2-3 miles traveled. Considering how frequently a fall must mean death, the record does not appear as disastrous as might have been anticipated. The causes of injuries have been classified in the cases of forty accidents occurring on British soil, as follows: Failure of engine and involuntary descent, 13; alighting on bad ground, 10; struck by a sudden gust of wind, 6; fire, 6; propeller breaking, 5. These are but 40 of some hundred cases, but it is presumed that the proportion of the causes would be fairly well maintained throughout. On the whole, it appears to be not improbable that the automobile, as against the aeroplane, will maintain its redly-earned reputation as a man-killer.

The Gnostic Church Universal

Of making many creeds, as of making many books, there is no end, and so in journeying along life's highway, no one need be surprised if he stubs his toe and discovers that he is about to fall over another creed. One of the latest of such creeds finds its exemplification in the Gnostic Church Universal, which is not great in membership but contends that it is long on truth, and as a gnostic is one who possesses knowledge, esoteric insight and wisdom, who shall venture to dispute its claim? Looking at Jean II as he ploddingly keeps books in a Parisian mercantile establishment, you would not be likely to suspect that he is the Grand Master and Sovereign Pontiff of the inspired Gnostic Church Universal, but that is what he is, and could life accord greater glory than this to any one man? To be sure, the Gnostic Church Universal has but 250 adherents, but it is growing; today it has at least seven or eight more disciples than it had a year ago. Moreover, its disciples, over whom Jean II reigns supreme, are found in every land. There even is a Bishop of the Gnostic Church Universal in America, who is one B. Clement. We may not know Bishop B. Clement, nor do we know where he resides, but one takes a species of wierd satisfaction in reflecting that, all unknown to us, he may be bishoping around in our very midst. We have taken too much room to announce that another creed is born, but perhaps we may make compensation by promising, as more than likely, that we will make no mention at all of other creeds that will be born tomorrow, and the day after tomorrow, and the day thereafter, and so on until man ceases to make his flimsy guesses in answer to the eternal question.

Some New Varieties of Meat

In these days when meats is meats, as pigs is pigs, and the prices thereof make one's pocketbook look more and more like a yawning chasm, it is a gratification to learn that Londoners—at least, some Londoners—now are dining on heretofore practically unknown varieties of meat. These varieties consist of the flesh of kangaroos and wallabies which is shipped in a frozen condition from Australia. The flesh is said to be excellent, and kangaroo-tail soup has become quite "the thing" in certain high-class restaurants. It is not alleged that the meat is cheaper than the varieties to which we are accustomed, but, at any rate, it increases the quantity of edible flesh, and as there is supposed to be an intimate relation between supply and price, this is a hopeful symptom. To be sure, it is popularly suspected that the Trust has pretty largely demoralized the relation between supply and price, but it is optimistic to make the most of any shadow of hope that appears.

It was Paul Cornoyer who got this one off. Invited by an intimate artist friend to dinner on Thanksgiving Day, he asked: "Going to have turkey?" "No," said the friend, "duck." "Sent anything to the Academy?" "Yes." "Well, don't hurry about buying your Thanksgiving dinner," quoth Paul, "you're likely to get your canvas back any time, you know." Yet the invitation was not withdrawn.—New York Sun.

Stellman's

Vanished Ruin Era

San Francisco's Classic
Artistry of Ruin

$2.50

One of the beautiful art gift books of the year—the one art gift book of intense local interest. Wonderful pictures of that ephemeral modern Acropolis, which the Fire God created, and of the new city which man's courage and energy rebuilt. A gift book de luxe, generously made and proportioned, bound in strong boards, inclosed in a box and finished throughout in a style both elegant and unique. Price $2.50, by mail $2.78.

This work and other books, booklets, cards and calendars are described in our illustrated catalogue entitled "PLEASANT PAGES," which will be gladly supplied without charge upon request.

A complete stock of gift books of all varieties, fiction, sets, Standard and antiquarian works and fine bindings is displayed in our BOOK ROOMS.

PAUL ELDER & CO.

Books and Art

239 Grant Ave.,

San Francisco

The California Weekly

IS PRINTED BY

Donaldson & Moir

PRINTERS

330 JACKSON ST.

Phone Douglas 1765

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

A GREAT DRAMATIST ON PLAYS

Henry Arthur Jones is, after Pinero, the greatest living English dramatist. When he has anything to say about the modern drama, it is worth listening to. An excellent interview with him was recently published in the New York Times. We reproduced part of that interview last week, but purposely held over the remainder for this week, because it goes more vitally into the theory of modern drama. That remainder is as follows:

"The Young Person has been the tyrant of the modern stage," said Mr. Jones. "Dramatists have been encouraged to write plays that do not tell the truth, but would form a suitable entertainment for matinee girls. Of all the preposterous situations this is the worst. There may be some very good plays written that the young girl would be better not to see. Any parent of ordinary intelligence can keep a girl from going to these.

"A man said to me recently that he had taken his young daughter to see a play the week before, and it had dealt with such and such a problem. I think it was Clyde Fitch's 'Woman in the Case.' The next night he took her to another play that had a similar scene, and the third night he struck a third drama of precisely the same sort. I told him that he was a fool not to have found out before he went to the theatre whether the play was the kind he wanted his daughter to see, and that he was doubly a fool after his first experience to go ahead and repeat it twice. There are always plenty of innocuous plays for girls, and will be as long as the matinee audiences go to the theatre.

"On the other hand I deny most strenuously that the average play that deals with the serious phases of life is not suitable for young girls to see. Some one has said that no play that is deeply conceived can be immoral, and I believe this to be true. I think that young girls would be infinitely better off if they were brought to see life as it really is presented in a serious way on the stage. They are allowed to read newspapers with all the latest scandal. They hear gossip on all sides. No girl can be entirely protected from it. Most shocking things come to their knowledge. Would it not be better for them to learn to see these things in their true perspective, as they are presented in good plays?

"This theory is not, of course, for the very young girl. Goethe put the matter very sensibly. 'What business have our young girls at the theatre?' he said. 'The theatre is for men and women who know something of human affairs.' The dramatist is not the guardian of the young girl, and certainly the censor ought not to be. Let her parents take heed to what she should see.

"I should say that until she is 17 or 18 years old, she should not be taken to plays that portray life in a deep and searching way—I may say in a sincere way. There is plenty of entertainment for her outside of the theatres that give such plays. Then at the proper age, as she is entering life, I cannot only see no harm, but I think it would be extremely beneficial for her to be taken to the theatre to see life portrayed with sincerity.

"If a system of absolute innocuousness is what people want in the drama, I do not see why theatres should be built at all. Any shop that sells wax dolls can give a better presentation of perfect propriety than the theatre. A visit to the theatre costs time and money, so if immaculate behavior is what one wants, it would really be better to go to the toy shop, where a perfect system of morality is pointed out to a Providence which neglected to put it in the world of living men and women.

"On the other hand, please do not take me as meaning that the dramatists should hurl their opinions at the world and expect people to pay their hard-earned money for the privilege of being bored. I think the young dramatists are perhaps a little too concerned with opinions and not enough with ideas. Besides, it takes time to learn the technique of a play. The tendency seems to be rather for those who have strong opinions to attempt to set them forth on the stage without having taken the trouble of learning how to write a play.

"One must give the public what it wants first and foremost in order to make it take what you want it to take. The public is very good-natured. If it is interested it will come and hear your story and take your ideas along with it. The greatest dramatists, we cannot forget that, were hack playwrights. Shakespeare was a hack, Moliere was a hack, in spite of the philosophy we get from both of them. And, by the way, Moliere knew well enough that he must interest the average man and woman in his audience as well as present his ideas to the elect few. He used to read all his plays to his housekeeper, and see to it that she liked them before he put them on the stage.

"There is no question, of course, about indecency on the stage. Nobody wants that, but the point I make," (the vigor of Mr. Jones at this moment would have startled even the British censor out of his official calm) "is that by taking from our stage the power to discuss morality and immorality we have not stopped indecency in the slightest. The deepest vulgarities and most disgusting shows are permitted. An Englishman of a good family said to me the other day, 'When I go to the theatre I like to see legs,' and an English woman of the same class said, 'Oh, I hope, Mr. Jones, you are not going to write any more of those problem plays. I like to go to the theatre and see a nice love story where it all ends happily.' That is the public that dramatists have to fight against.

"As to indecency, it is distinguishable by every citizen. Everybody knows it when it shows up. It is not so with morality nor immorality. The average citizen says that he knows what morality is, but does he? 'Hamlet' is held in reverence. It is given to young girls to study, and the most proper parents will take their daughters to see it. If the average playwright today dealt with incestuous marriage, no matter in what manner he treated it, would it not be boo-ed from the stage?

"Every Sunday morning in church people hear read from the Bible tales of life as it really is, not one in ten of which would be permitted on the stage. Suppose we dramatized the story of David. Suppose we showed him as an adulterer and a murderer. Suppose we followed him through his career and showed his courage and loyalty and love and joy in God, all mixed with his sins as it is in the Bible. What would people say? If the story of David happened in the suburbs today, how do you think the hero would be treated? As it is he is made a hero and a saint and quite rightly—that is what he was, with all his sins, but if we tried to show such a thing on the stage it would be called the grossest immorality.

"I feel very deeply on this subject," said Mr. Jones, subsiding a little, "because I feel that the drama is the one great needed art of the day. Think of the toil and uninspiring routine of work in which most people spend their lives. Think what it means to them to be taken out of that rut and transported to another world, interested, thrilled.

"For myself, outside of the great permanent concerns of the government, the defense of the country, the care of the national finances, and the enforcement of law, I don't think there is any question that is more important than this of the drama. I don't think there is anything to the encouragement of which the government could better turn its attention than the drama. Compared with a living national drama, if we could raise it, even the arts of painting and sculpture, which are so rightly honored, would seem mere playthings. In a dim way we already feel this in the veneration we pay to Shakespeare.

"Nine-tenths of our people work at labor that deadens the mind, in routine work, concerned with engines, and shops and mines, and offices. To shape a piece of machinery, turning out the same thing incessantly, to add up column after column of figures must wither what I will call our spiritual nature, and by that I mean the power whereby we apprehend eternal things. It is only in two or three evening hours that most of our people can be said to live at all. When I think of the possibility of conveying to these people all the emotions of life, of giving them for a short time a rich and full existence, then I feel how great is the mission of the stage.

"If you felt as I feel," said Mr. Jones, subsiding for the last time, "you would feel strongly too, wouldn't you?"

"LAVENDER AND OTHER VERSE"

Dr. Edward Robeson Taylor, former mayor of San Francisco, is widely known for his achievements in verse, and especially to a body of discriminating readers about the bay the news will be received with pleasure that a new volume of poems from his hand is now off the press of Paul Elder & Company.

The poems included in "Lavender and Other Verse" are divided into cycles: "Musings by the Way," "Sonnets Suggested by Paintings of William Keith," "Some Leaves of Bay," and "Translations from the French." The dedication is a key to the appreciation of the volume:

To My Wife

"This harvest of my later days
Gathered beneath thy words of praise,
And when thy fond, irradiant smile
Beamed on my labors all the while,
I humbly lay, though incomplete,
Before thy heart and at thy feet."

Maturity of style marks the poems, distinguished, like all of Dr. Taylor's verse, by the technical finish of the verse forms. Especially capable is Dr. Taylor's handling of the difficult sonnet. In "The Gjoa in Golden Gate Park, San Francisco," is an especially fine blending of technical skill, music of tone and aspiring imagination—altogether, to our mind, probably the best thing in the volume.

"At last I rest in peace where never more
The waves shall whip my stout-resisting side;
Ignobly rest, and swell with bitter pride
As casual eyes all lightly scan me o'er—
"Me, that have dared the Arctic's awful shore,
And with the bold Norwegian as my guide
Sailed the dread Pass to other keels denied Where we shall dwell with fame forever-more.
"Ah, it is pleasant here with birds and trees,
With laughter-loving children, and the sea's
Keen winds that romp upon my orphaned deck;
"Yet, mid this fatal peace at times I yearn
To face again the dangers of a wreck,
To see once more the great Aurora burn."

The volume itself is a most satisfying specimen of the bookmaker's art, done in antique black-face type on Italian hand-made paper and bound in brown boards.
(Paul Elder & Co., San Francisco, $2.00 net.)

REAL "THREE MUSKETEERS"

It appears that the real name of Dumas's hero D'Artagnan was Charles de Batz-Castellmore, and he was of noble Basque descent. He was born in 1623 at Lupiao. His assumed name was derived from his mother, who was a Montesquieu d'Artagnan.

When he was 17 he set out for Paris to seek adventure mounted on a miserable nag, and in his doublet pocket he carried ten ducats and a letter of introduction to M. de Troisvilles, commandant of Louis XII's Musketeer Guard. The boy fell among thieves, but luckily on his arrival in Paris he found in the musketeer commandant's antechamber his fellow countryman Porthos, who gave him a warm welcome.

Porthos's real name was Isaac de Portau of Pau in the Pyrenees. He was a man of humble birth.

FACTS VERSUS TRUTH

By E. FRENCH STROTHER

"Facts versus Truth!" I hear you exclaim. "Why, they are the same thing. What do you mean?"

Well, we mean exactly that: they are not the same thing. A fact is a fact, we'll admit; but a fact is not necessarily true. For example, death is a fact, hideous and awful, but it is not truth—humanity, with one voice and from immemorial time, has cried out against it, and rightly, as a hideous and monstrous lie. It is a fact that we die, but it is not true that we die.

Right here is where modern science has unintentionally led astray many men of little imagination but great industry. Darwin not only discovered a great scientific truth but he originated a great scientific method. The trouble with many of his followers is that they see and can use only the method, but have not the imagination to apply the results of the method to the search for truth. Darwin's method was that of infinite research. But, after he had learned all the facts he could, he stood off at a distance and looked at those facts to see where they pointed. They pointed to the theory of evolution, which is a great truth. The facts were nothing to Darwin except as they led him to truth.

But, we repeat, many of his followers have neither his imagination nor his purpose. They do not care for truth, they care only for facts. And so they spend their lives gathering facts, cataloguing facts, indexing facts, dividing the world and its marvels into species, genus and variety, and there they stop. You will see a "scientist" who knows the Latin name of every race, tribe and color of mankind, but who hasn't the remotest idea of the reason why a small boy likes to paddle in the mud. And yet he is a "scientist," proud of his "knowledge." What does he know? Why, facts. Yes, but facts are not important. Truth is important—and he knows it not.

John Muir hit these people off admirably the other day. "Naturalists! Yes," he said, "I know them. They go out into the woods with a gun. When they see a bird, they shoot it. Next they measure it, lying there dead, measure the spread of the wings, the length of the bill, the length of the toes. They count the number of feathers. They skin it, and put alum on the skin, and file the poor dead thing away—it's a 'specimen.' They have done something wonderful, they have found a new 'variety' of a rare 'genus.' They think they know something. But what do they know that really counts? It isn't the measurements of a bird that count, it's its life, its habits, its thoughts. Suppose you asked me, 'Do you know this man Smith?' and I should answer, 'Why, yes, I shot him yesterday, skinned him, measured him'—what would you think of me? That tells you nothing about Smith. But these 'naturalists' think exactly similar things mean something about birds."

Isn't that vivid? Isn't it apt?

Facts are dead; truth is living. The dictionary is full of facts, but nobody thrills over the dictionary, nobody's life is affected by it. The Bible is full of things that seem reasonably certain not to be facts, but it also contains enough truth to have set the world aflame and to have wrought a million miracles of the spirit. You don't browse around Shakespeare for facts, but the ages find him full of inspiration for living and a Ruskin declared that the intellectual measure of every man since has been gauged by his appreciation of him. How that assertion must have jarred some of our plodding, self-glorifying scientists!

Suppose I tell you that Mt. Diablo is more than 5,000 feet high. "Very well," you say, "that's a fact." But suppose I tell you again tomorrow that Mt. Diablo is more than 5,000 feet high. Probably you would answer, "You said that yesterday, and I knew it already, anyhow. It's a fact, but what of it?"

But suppose I quote this from Shakespeare, "There's a divinity that shapes our ends, rough-hew them how we will." Probably you will say nothing, but your mind will leap from little things to musing on great things. And if I repeated that quotation tomorrow and the day after it would lose none of its freshness, its vitality, its beauty. What it says may not be a fact—God only knows—but it is truth, that is, it is what we "throw," or believe with conviction, and have multitudinous good reasons to believe, too.

Facts merely define and classify things. Truth gives a meaning to life in terms of living. Facts inform the mind, truth informs the spirit.

But, you protest, what of all this, anyway? Well, just this. The scientists have the upper hand in the world of thought these days, in the world of education and in the world of letters. And mighty few of them are Darwins or Muirs, who seek for truth by way of facts. Most of them are plodders who seek for more facts by way of Darwin's method. They are filling the world with dusty museums and libraries of dry and meaningless facts. They are burying the intelligence and the life of students under the ashes of Darwin's method without the fertilizing imagination of Darwin. Our age is coming to believe in facts, to disbelieve in everything but facts. And mere facts are as useless to the life of a people as ashes are useless for food. We are coming to deny the existence of the spirit. I don't mean merely the spirit to which religion appeals, but the spirit to which poetry appeals, or art appeals, or even the vision of great material achievements appeals. All great men have been dreamers. "Except the people have a vision, they perish." Socrates was a dreamer, Caesar was a dreamer, Newton made his greatest discovery day-dreaming, Luther shook the institutions of the world by dreams, Napoleon changed the map of Europe and the course of history with his dreams, Edison has revolutionized industry with his dreams. Kipling, searching for the highest terms of praise to laud Cecil Rhodes, the empire builder, could find none higher than "dreamer devout, by vision led."

Now it isn't possible that we should all be Newtons or Napoleons or Edisons. It isn't even desirable that we should be. If we were all Newtons nobody would be left to do the dishwashing and scrubbing of the world. If we were all Napoleons, the world would be a chaos of broken heads.

But it is extremely desirable, and necessary, and possible, that we should all be able to see beyond the length of our noses, that we should all be able to know where facts cease to be useful and truth becomes all-important, that we should all be able to know when we have washed enough dishes and not only can afford to, but cannot afford not, go out and look at the stars and dream.

The schools and colleges used to perform this service. They used to be run for that and that only. The professors taught subjects that were not useful, in fact, they scorned subjects that were "practical." They did not attempt to supply the demand of the trades for skilled mechanics, nor the demand of the factories for skilled "hands," nor the demands of "business" for skilled merchants and clerks. Industry, said these old fogies—God bless 'em!—industry will take care of its own. Dishwashing will attract dishwashers. We feed the spirit—and even dishwashers have souls. Let us feed it the best that there is, Greek and its philosophy, Latin and its government, history and the life of mankind. After we have set burning the lamp of the spirit, let our young men go out into a practical world but let them go with tempered souls. Their hands and eyes will soon be trained.

Isn't this where our modern ideal of education is weak? We say, away with the impractical stuff; train the boys' hands and eyes, sharpen their wits for business, send them out into the world harnessed for the struggles of industry. Well, we admit it can be done. It can be done with boys. Also, it could be done with monkeys. There is a horse in Germany today that could get a job as a book-keeper, so well does he know his figures. But are we training our boys to be monkeys—or men? Are we training them to be horses—or heroes? Are we training them only to use facts—or to seek truth? Is life all "business"—or is there a "spirit" within us, potential for higher things than mere grubbing for food and scurrying for coin?

Bless me, we're in danger of being taken seriously. Mind you, we promised that you should find no information on this page. That's a fact, anyhow.

TOLSTOY PARADOX

A great soul went out when Tolstoy died—a Christian so Christlike that the church excommunicated him; a citizen so patriotic that he would have been hanged for treason if the law had been permitted to take its equal course; a man so kindly that he estranged his family by his harshness; a writer so great that he turned to cobbling shoes, as a worthier occupation; a philanthropist so benevolent that he sought to still the peasants' hunger by eating worse food than they; an ascete so rigid that he lived in a hut, only allowing himself a palace, a secretary and a great library for diversion; a man so humble that he died in a shed by the roadside, attended only by the medical faculties of the universities, with the chief bishops outside imploring the honor of receiving him back to communion, and the newspaper correspondents of the world rushing in a field telegraph equipment to spread the news instantly to all mankind. He will be buried under Poverty Oak, clad in a rough smock, in a gold-studded casket, with a simple service by the village priest, and an emperor's army standing as guard of honor. Surely never was human paradox more startling!

Only in Russia could such things be—Russia, where by reason of tyranny thought is free, where public illiteracy has stimulated a great literature; where the unworthiest government commands the most fanatic loyalty; where rebellious tribes guard all the frontiers, keeping safe the nation they hate against the enemies they love; where historically a drunken people adopted Christianity as the only religion which does not object to drinking; where the only people trusted to exercise self-government are the illiterate peasants; where a prince may be a beggar and the village station-master is ex officio a noble; where a luxurious aristocracy, jaded with the ennui of an already effete culture, boasts that the nation is still barbaric—there alone could a great man, having the ear of the nation and the world, seriously believe that his best service, in alleviating the economic condition of millions of peasants, was to go barefoot, and help dig potatoes, in his poorest neighbor's field.—Fresno Republican.

The earth gradually—very gradually—grows cooler, and evidences of the fact are numerous. For example, far up in ice-bound Spitzbergen are found fossil remains of plants which today grow nowhere except within on close to the torrid zone. There is a species of swamp cypress that long ago made Spitzbergen beautiful in some degree; now cypress of the same kind grows in Florida and in no colder region. This old planet was a great deal warmer than it now is in the days when the mastodon and pterodactyl formed a striking part of its live stock.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

"God Bless My Bairns," She Prayed

Sometimes among the pictures that my Memory paints for me

When the twilight hides in darkness and the evening shadows fall,

Is a little Eastern cottage, and its cheery lights I see,

Beck'ning me to seek its comfort as in days beyond recall.

There I see my tiny sister, fairy maid of airy tread,

And that malcontent, her brother, over whom the years have crept;

And my sweet-faced mother murmurs, "It is time to go to bed,"

And I hear the prayer she whispered for her "bairns" ere they slept.

In that cottage there was riot when my sister played with me,

And my grandma often muttered, "Can't you keep those children still?"

And I really fear that sometimes, when we "kids" could not agree,

There were even signs of warfare and, indeed, the battle's thrill;

But our mother e'er was patient—heaven knows that there was need—

Till the bedtime brought the peace-time, with its flag of truce displayed;

Then she bore us, haply struggling, to the realm of warfare freed,

And our baby heads were lowered while, "God bless my bairns," she prayed.

All forgotten is the warfare, and the foolish childish strife,

And a flag of peace seems waving o'er that cottage far away,

And, amid the disappointments and the weary stress of life,

I can see my mother kneeling, hear the words she used to say:

"Father, let me bear the burden, or, if these, my babes, must bear,

May they bear it to thy honor and with loyal hearts and true;

In the prize of those who conquer may they win their human share."

Oh, my mother, o'er the spaces I would reach my hands to you!

You and I, my errant brother, have gone straying to and fro,

And our scars are sad reminders of the places where we fell;

We have learned unspoken lessons it were better not to know,

In our hearts a mea culpa that our lips will never tell;

Yet there's none has strayed so widely but a prayer his mother spoke

Yet shall reach him where he wanders, till his eyes are moist and dim,

And there's none so bowed and hopeless 'neath the weight of folly's yoke

But he yet may find his heaven through a mother's prayer for him.

* * *

Found the Only Woman of the Kind

One day the ministering spirit came upon the angel who looks after the affairs of women on earth, and he was glad to observe that the latter was smiling as if a great content were hers.

"You look as if you were happy," he remarked.

"I am," was the cheerful answer.

"What is the reason?" he asked.

"Why, I—but perhaps you won't believe me."

"Oh, yes, I know that you are truthful."

"I have found a woman who—are you sure you will believe me?"

"I wouldn't think of such a thing as doubting you."

"Well, this woman is absolutely satisfied with her averdupois. She admits that she wouldn't care to weigh either a pound more or a pound less, and—"

"Say," the ministering spirit interrupted, "I've known you a long time, and I don't like to doubt you, but you must remember that I have met a good many women, too, and I was last in Missouri, and—well, where is the woman to whom you refer?"

It was a terrible blow to the other angel to learn, on investigation, that the woman was dead and that it was the approach of that event which had made her appear so unnatural, and of course she regrets that the ministering spirit has lost faith in her, but, not the less, it is a great consolation to her to feel that she really has known one such woman, for this is the only case of the kind on record.

* * *

The Opinions of Rufus

It's a blame sight easier to sing, "He's a jolly good feller," at 1:45 a. m. than 'tis to lend the jolly good feller a ten the day after.

Josh Bings says the advantage of a charity ball is it gits charity out of them that never felt any.

The man that says he can't be influenced by flattery is tickled 'most to death when somebody ans'ers that he's noticed it.

Did you notice that the man that's most opposed to pugilism hesitated at the sportin' page long 'nough to find out whether Battlin' Nelson licked or got licked?

The center of every man's universe is himself, but I've known cases where I should have s'posed the center would have petitioned to be moved.

It's a great an' splendid thing to be a pop'lar hero, an' if you don't b'lieve me I wish you'd ask Admiral Dewey.

One of the main differences 'tween Success an' Failure is that the first is the most likely to see that its name always is printed in capital letters.

Ezry Pennick says some girls are like chrysanthemums: Mighty nice lookin', but lackin' sweetness.

The Almighty made men an' women, but I can't find a word in the Bible that tells how to account for suffragettes.

P'raps votin' 'll unsex women, es some say, but I've lived where they voted, an' I never knew one that didn't want to know if her hat was on straight.

Eb Miller said the constitution was the palladium of our liberty. So I asked him what a palladium was, an' he's gone after a dictionary.

Seems to me that it's a mighty curious thing that the dog fennel don't have any bark.

* * *

Wish That I Could Wadin' Go

Wish that I again could go

Wadin' puddles like I did

When the rain or melted snow

Gave me bliss that's now forbid;

Wish that I could wade right out,

Sayin', "Shucks! Who minds the wet?"

While some boy that's 'fraid would shout,

"Betcher ma 'll make yer sweat!"

Shoes an' stockin's, pants an' all—

Never stopped to shed my gear

When I heard the fellers call,

"Say, the wadin's bully here!"

Then we waded in pell-mell,

Water cold as Greenland's ice.

If our sisters said, "I'll tell,"

We would give them good advice.

Ma would shake her head an' say,

"You've been wadin' 'gain! You're wet!"

And, in childhood's guileless way,

I'd reply, "No, that there's sweat."

Never fooled her, I allow,

Fact I mention with regret;

Said, "You must be warmed right now!"

And I feel that warmin' yet.

Feel that warmin'? Ghosts of woe!

Yet the urchin's joyous phiz

Tempts me till I'd wadin' go

If it wan't for rheumatiz;

And I'd even feel, I guess,

Mother's switch, and cry, "Amen!"—

Though her lips in love I'd press—

If I just could wade again.

They Had Different Questions in Mind

"Ethel," the young man said, "there is a question, a question of vital importance to me, which I long have yearned to ask of you."

Slowly a roseate blush (blushes usually are roseate, but it is good usage to refer to them thus)—a roseate blush mounted through the talcum powder to the fair maiden's snowy brow, for who could doubt what the question would be?

"You must have realized," the young man continued, "the faltering timidity with which I approached your presence nightly; my palpitating heart could not have been all unnoted by you. To you alone I must turn to relieve my prolonged suspense, and so—and so—"

"Proceed, Augustus," the maiden whispered, for she was not averse to encouraging the hesitating youth.

"And so—and so, Ethel, can you—that is, do you think your father's bulldog would bite if he were to get loose?"

The youth still is wondering why the maiden answered him coldly.

Unexpected moral: By the cold logic of events our fondest hopes often are "whipped to a frazzle."

* * *

Compulsory Vaccination

Years ago Great Britain repealed her compulsory-vaccination law. Have you heard that she has had more than her share of devastating epidemics of small-pox since then? You have not.

Not long ago, in a southern coast county of this state, a child died, and physicians admitted that the death was due to blood-poisoning resulting from vaccination. This was but one instance of a kind that recurs fairly often. Do you think the parents of that child would have grieved more if its death had been due to small-pox rather than to the horrors of blood-poisoning? You do not.

About eight or nine years ago, in a little New Jersey town, between twenty-five and thirty children died of lock-jaw within a few weeks, and in every instance the children had been vaccinated immediately before the tetanus seized them. Some physicians said that there was not necessarily a connection between the vaccination and the fatal disease, but as no one not just vaccinated had the lock-jaw one might smile at the doctors' assertion were it not for the heart-breaking tragedy underlying it.

In view of the foregoing, and many similar facts which might be adduced, I contend that I should have the privilege of deciding whether I would sooner have my child, who attends a public school, take her chances on small-pox, on the one hand, or on tetanus or blood-poisoning, on the other. I claim this particularly, as, under our sagacious law, if she attends a private school there is no compulsion that she be vaccinated; and yet, I take it, there is as much danger of starting a small-pox epidemic from a private as from a public school.

This is but a personal opinion, but I am glad to know that there are a goodly number of others who share it with me—a goodly number composed of those who, on due consideration, have preferred that their child should risk small-pox rather than lock-jaw or blood-poisoning.

* * *

No Hope

"There is no use," the turkeys sigh,

"Of roosting in the trees so high;

That subterfuge is all in vain

Since Rastus got his aeroplane."

(Chicago Post.)

But if they're roosting in a store,

At thirty cents a pound or more,

Why, Rastus' hopes are all in vain

Unless he sells his aeroplane.

—Yonkers Statesman.

E'en if 'twere sold 'tis safe to bet

Poor Rastus could no turkey get

At present rates, for—thought accursed!

He'd have to pay the mortgage first.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

The Atmosphere At Washington

No squalls in sight at the national capital. The President is exceedingly pacific, quite willing to forgive all those whom he has done any thing to and ready to welcome the insurgents back to the reservation, although he has been off it while they remained on it. He is to consult them; whether as to the kind of sauce with which they are to be eaten, or as to whether they are to be eaten at all or not, the future alone can determine. All that we know for certain is that the presidential smile is broader than ever, the glad hand is outstretched and has been accepted in the spirit in which it was proffered. Nor have the Democrats yet shown signs of being obstreperous. They know that it is not their innings yet and nothing has so far occurred to suggest their intention to block the way of progressive legislation asked for by the President. The chances for a productive session seem good.

The Presidential Talk to the People

Our daily press has not felt it worth while to lay the whole message of the President to congress and people before us, but the excerpts printed indicate a restrained and unimpassioned document. It is progressive, and yet not militant, and it assures The Interests that they will not be harassed with additional legislation until time has given them opportunity to see whether or not they can render valueless the remedial legislation already enacted. The big stick is not in evidence. Our President is no stormy petrel. He loves tranquility of mind, repose for the soul, peace for everybody, and his daily prayer is: "Lord, spare us that which is unpleasant."

The Schedule by Schedule Idea of Tariff Revision

The President is doing his best to take the tariff issue out of partisan politics and, in so doing, he is doing well. He has come around to the commission idea of revision rather than that by a tariff board, and it is to be hoped that congress may be brought to a similar view, although the protected interests will be up in arms against it. They do not want an honest revision measured unrelentingly even by the overly liberal rule announced in the last Republican national platform. They prefer to log-roll. It gets them more protection than they ought to have and that is exactly what they are after. The President rightly affirms that public objection is not to the protective principle. It is to its practice without principle. It is significant, too, that the President failed in his message to wave the red flag of justification of the Payne-Aldrich measure in the faces of the people, except as a revenue producer, and it is a revenue producer chiefly because the straitened finances of the country following the panic of 1907 deferred extravagant importations until the worst of it was over. Since the new tariff went into operation we have been importing regardless of consequences to our balance of trade. However, that tariff commission should report to congress and people instead of to the President alone. We all want to know all that is to be known and want nothing covered up or pigeonholed for the sake of executive tranquility or political expediency. Congress will do nothing not exacted of it by public sentiment and public sentiment cannot effect much without publicity as to the facts.

Ship Subsidy vs. Naval Auxiliary

All that the President says in his message about the need for a rehabilitation of the American merchant marine is as true as can be, but ship-subsidy sticks in the American throat every time an attempt is made to swallow it. It simply will not go down, but if Uncle Sam himself wishes to buy or build vessels for an auxiliary navy, upon which to train able seamen and to be ready for war at a moment's notice and if, pending that necessity, Uncle Sam will himself operate those carrying vessels between the ports of North America and South, doing a general carrying trade, The Watchman has an idea that public opinion, although not financial opinion, will back his enterprise with all its credit. It is not that the nation craves the thing that is Socialistic, but that it fears the thing that is a special privilege may become a graft. We want our share of the over-sea carrying trade, but as a nation our common carriers have proven such common robbers that we distrust everything they seem to favor. The President has another guess at a remedy.

To Fortify Or Not to Fortify

This is an issue, raised by the President, that will be much discussed before it will be acted upon by congress. It is bluntly true as our President bluntly puts it that the canal is our property and we should take care of it, but we ourselves have relatively little commerce for it. If it have not the commerce of the world to patronize it it will be much of an elephant. Our national influence is for the peace and confraternity of the world. What a splendid opportunity is here afforded to enhance the comity of the world by putting this great property into the world's keeping through its agreed neutralization by the powers. There is little doubt that the powers would jump at the opportunity and the moral effect of such a step would be tremendous. On the other hand the cost of its fortification and defense against the world will be enormous and never ending and, when we shall have done the best we can to defend it some airship may sail over it, drop a ton or so of dynamite into a lock and put it out of commission for a year. The belligerency of our Man of Peace appears to have manifested itself in the wrong place.

Commendations On Conservation

The President's utterances on the subject of conservation are fine and if conservation work shall come up to his conservation standard all will be well, but how can it with a Ballinger at the head of the Department of the Interior with a reluctant operating force solely in his charge? Nothing not fit for a farm should be disposed of in fee, and nothing fit for a farm should be held for any other purpose, excepting that, as the President points out, patenting of lands for agricultural purposes may well be made subject to mineral rights reserved to the government or leased to third persons. It is time to put the leasing system into operation, not so much for revenue (although the revenue should defray the expense of administering the public lands department) as for purposes of control, such a control as will prevent the exploitation of the consumer. The only fault to be found with the leasing idea in general is that it is overdue by fully fifty years. How it will work in detail depends on how the details are worked out.

Pork Barrel Headed Up

Nothing could be more obviously true than that the method of making harbor and river improvements, and constructing public buildings, by log-rolling methods is immoral, impolitic and grotesque, and the stand the President has taken against it is vastly to his credit, the more certainly since it has been out of that barrel that executives have, from time immemorial, paid for the votes and influence of uncertain members in support of administration measures. Millions have been spent on useless creeks and hundreds of thousands on public palaces where structures of the quality of cottages would have served every purpose. The people have been robbed of improvements that should have been made in order that those that should not might be afforded, and it palliates the offense but little that good measures were thus bought through congress that otherwise might have failed of enactment. The President is right, but his position would have been made the stronger had he served unequivocal notice upon congress that he would sign no more pork barrel bills. His argument lacks clinching.

Wants Rural Parcels Post

This is something that should have been had as matter of course as soon as the rural free delivery system was established, but it may be doubted if even an eleven pound limit as to weight will yield much revenue unless the rate be reduced to one or two cents per pound. The haul is short and the charge may easily become more than the traffic will bear, but it is absurd to permit the rural route wagons to go empty when all along the line are persons who wish things fetched out from town.

Ballinger Didn't Do Anything Real Bad

It is not creditable to American statesmanship that the report of the Ballinger investigating committee should be made on a seven to five basis, nor that the nature of the majority and minority reports, together with the line-up, should have been accurately foretold before the investigation was half concluded. However, such is the fact, seven exonerate and five condemn. It was never charged that he had broken the law, except in the matter of acting as attorney for the coal land claimants within two years after leaving public office, but only that he was intending to, that he was inclined toward, and was playing into the hands of, coal land claimants. The asseveration of the majority report, that Mr. Ballinger is not now and never has been an enemy of nor hostile to a "reasonable and judicial policy of conservation," does not strengthen the case of Ballinger. Neither are any of the opponents of the Pinchot policies opposed to a "reasonable and judicial policy of conservation," but whatever stands between them and what they want they straightway denounce as unreasonable and injudicious conservation. Mr. Ballinger construed the power of the government to conserve with great strictness, Mr. Garfield with great liberality, and the difference between strictness and liberality of construction would have made the difference between spoliation and conservation. If Ballinger is in fact a reliable conservationist, discharging the duties of his office faithfully, he owes the fact to Pinchot, Garfield and Glavis. They made him so and nothing the seven members of that committee can say will convince the nation to the contrary.

The Last Of The Mohicans

In resigning from the assembly, a wholly superfluous proceeding inasmuch as his term will expire with the expiring year, it is probable that Grove L. Johnson took that method of signifying his withdrawal from public life. In his withdrawal the state loses one of its most alert minded men, but a man who has reached the time of life when he is constitutionally against things and in favor of nothing. Like other men affiliated with the corporate interests, Grove L. Johnson has no faith in democratic government. He questions the integrity and despises the intelligence of the common man and looks upon the citizenry as fickle to the last degree, in testimony whereof he cited the fact that in 1882 there was a popular uprising to drive the railroad from politics and yet, in 1884, Leland Stanford was elected to the United States senate. Mr. Johnson's citation was not happy. Leland Stanford was not elected to the office of United States senator. It was open and notorious at the time that he bought the office outright and common report placed the cost at $700,000, the people consenting because they would rather have a responsible mogul in office than an irresponsible satrap. It is true, as Grove L. Johnson avers, that the people are often whimsical, sometimes heedless or ill advised, but it is not often that they are wilfully and premeditatedly unjust. But what are we to do since we reject the divine right of kings to rule? Shall we relinquish popular government to the corporations and their retainers who are always premeditatedly unjust, rapaciously greedy and incapable of being filled? Mr. Johnson's prediction that Mr. W. F. Herrin will, by popular vote, be elected to succeed George C. Perkins in the

POLITICAL TABLE TALK---Continued

United States senate, implies that by that time, Mr. Herrin will have made himself as able to manipulate the electorate of an entire state as he was able to manipulate the delegates in a state convention. Sweet faced old man! In your retirement from legislative life the legislature will lose a piquancy that surely will be missed.

Board of Equalization Much Needs Expert Help

It is not going to be easy for the incoming State Board of Equalization to put the new state system of taxation into operation. With the exception of the State Controller, who is member ex-officio only and has as much to do in his own office as any public official ought to undertake to do, there is not a man on the incoming board who can lay claim to any considerable knowledge of, or experience with, taxation, and it is asking too much of that board to put the new system into operation unaided by expert help of the highest quality. There is one man in the state who does know the subject of taxation, Prof. Plehn of the state university, and the legislature should constitute him special expert for the Board of Equalization, at any rate for the next two years, to the end that order may be brought out of chaos. Senator Curtin also knows the law well, but he is in the senate and can render good service from that point. We are on the right road now, but bad driving, even on a good road, may easily result in a wreck. The thing to do is to equip that board with a driver competent to handle the reins without either muddling or losing his head. Prof. C. C. Plehn is such a man.

Why Not Consolidate Those State Boards?

Secretary of State Charles F. Curry is of opinion that California should have a public service commission similar to one of the two that New York lately created. There is work for such a body to perform, but need it be one more? The State Board of Equalization does not require the services of its members half the time and, after the new system of taxation is put into operation, the time of its members will be still less treasured upon. The railroad commission has, heretofore, permitted the public service of its members to encroach little upon their private activities in gainful pursuits. It is not now a good time to touch that commission because, at last, we have a good commission; and honest and earnest commissioners, with a law so strengthened as to make that commission an active rather than a passive body, will doubtless find all their time taken up, but it would appear that the Board of Equalization might properly be constitutionally amended out of office and an appointive public service commission be entrusted with its duties as well as with the duties of a general corporation supervision.

The Contest For The Speakership

So far only two aspirants for the speakership of the assembly have flung their gauntlets into the arena, A. H. Hewitt of the eighth district and Milton L. Schmitt of the fortieth. Fortunately for all concerned the issue joined by these two candidates is perfectly clear. Mr. Hewitt represents the progressive element in the Republican party and Schmitt represents the old "organization" or Herrin-dominated Republican "push." The line-up on the vote for speaker may define the line-up of the assembly, that is if the Herrin men have the nerve to stand up and be counted. Mr. Hewitt is an entirely fit man for speaker. Mr. Schmitt is an entirely fit man to represent the old guard. A bit of an effort is being made on the part of Schmitt to utilize the plea that it is San Francisco's turn to have the speakership. If The Watchman knows anything about it it is California's turn to have that office filled in its interest, and it will be so filled if Mr. Hewitt fills it. His election should be decisive.

San Francisco Loses In Reapportionment

One of the jobs before the coming legislature will be to reapportion the state as to assembly and senatorial districts in accordance with the returns from the census of 1910. And the legislators are suddenly going to come up against some startling and unsuspected facts when they tackle this job. For instance, the San Francisco delegation will have the painful pleasure of assisting at the burial of four deceased assembly districts in that city and of two senatorial districts. The pain of this pleasure will be heightened by having, at the same time, to assist at the birth of seven (maybe eight) baby Los Angeles county assembly districts and of three baby Los Angeles county senatorial districts. The fiendish joy of Mama Los Angeles can only be imagined, not described. The rest of the state will not mourn, either. The less representation San Francisco has in the legislature, the better reputation she will have, judging by the character of the delegation she has been in the habit of sending.

The Case of Imperial

Another surprise that is going to strike the legislators is the advent of another midget in the assembly family to match in size the San Benito and Kings county dwarfs. And the joke is, that this is going to be compulsory. San Benito and Kings could be tacked on to other districts, but Imperial, the new midget, cannot. The law is plain. Section 6 of Article IV of the constitution says: "For the purpose of choosing members of the Legislature, the State shall be divided into forty senatorial and eighty assembly districts, as nearly equal in population as may be, and composed of contiguous territory, to be called senatorial and assembly districts. * * * In the formation of such districts no county, or city and county, shall be divided, unless it contains sufficient population within itself to form two or more districts, nor shall a part of any county, or of any city and county, be united with any other county, or city and county, in forming any district."

The two noteworthy points in that quotation are the indivisibility of counties and that counties must be contiguous to be included in one district. Now the basis of population for the reapportionment of assembly districts is 29,719 population for each district. The only counties contiguous to Imperial are Riverside and San Diego. The present population of Riverside county is 34,496, so it is, of itself, entitled to one assemblyman. The present population of San Diego county is 61,665, which entitles it to two assemblymen for its own (a gain of 1, by the way). Neither county can be divided to make up Imperial's lack of population. Therefore, Imperial county, with only 13,591 people, will have to be granted an assemblyman in the new apportionment.

How San Francisco Loses Legislators

To return to the sad case of San Francisco: In 1900, the population of California was 1,485,053. Dividing that figure by 80, to obtain the ratio for assembly apportionment, gave a requirement of only 18,563 people to each assembly district. The population of San Francisco was then 342,782. Dividing that figure by 18,563 gave San Francisco 18 assemblymen. But in the decade from 1900 to 1910, California increased in population 60 per cent., while San Francisco increased only 27 per cent. Now California has 2,377,549 population. That figure, divided by 80, gives the assembly ratio as one assemblyman for each 29,719 population. San Francisco's population is now 416,912. That figure, divided by 29,719, gives San Francisco only 14 assemblymen in the new apportionment, a loss of four.

San Francisco loses, by a similar computation, in her senatorial representation. The old senatorial ratio was one to each 37,126 people. The new ratio will provide for one senator for each 59,438 people. San Francisco's present population, divided by that figure, gives her only seven members of future state senates.

Los Angeles' Gains: Other Surprises

There will be similar losses and gains in other counties. Los Angeles county. That county will certainly gain seven and possibly eight assemblymen, and three senators. She now has 9 assemblymen and 5 senators, so in future, she will have 16 or 17 assemblymen (against 14 for San Francisco) and 8 senators (against 7 for San Francisco).

But it will probably surprise most people to find that Sacramento county, which has hitherto enjoyed the services of 3 assemblymen, will in future be entitled to only 2. It will be hardly less of a surprise to find that Fresno county, which was confidently expected to earn 3 assemblymen instead of her present 2, falls 13,500 people short of enough to do it. Alameda county will have 8 assemblymen instead of 7, but she has not increased enough to earn any addition to her present senatorial delegation of 4. Another surprise, which will probably re-echo throughout the state as soon as the spring freshets open the Eureka bar to travel and let the angry natives out, is the fact that Humboldt county, which has boasted 2 assemblymen in the past will have to make 1 do hereafter. Sonoma county, also, will find it hard to prove her right to retain 2 assemblymen. San Bernardino has only 1 assemblyman, but by the new apportionment she will be entitled to 1.9 assemblymen, which is so near to 2 that, if the precedent of some apportionments of 1900 be followed, she will probably get the 2.

This brings up an interesting point. In the apportionment of ten years ago, San Francisco had just such a large fraction toward another senator and another assemblyman, but the country members evidently deliberately outvoted the city on the proposition of giving her the benefit of the fraction. This is emphasized by the fact that, at the same time, Humboldt and Sacramento counties were given the benefit of such fractions in a liberal way. Now, in figuring on the next legislature, it is safe to assume that the country members will do the same thing again. It so happens that it will make no difference to San Francisco this time, because the ratios divide almost evenly into her population. But the question will undoubtedly be raised by Los Angeles, which, by exact figuring, is entitled to 16.9 assemblymen, so near to 17 that she will claim the odd one. The country members will, however, probably give some country district the benefit of the difference.

Certainties in Apportionment

There are a surprising number of assembly districts whose apportionment can be determined without waiting for the legislature. Some, like San Francisco, offer merely sums in arithmetic. Some others are certainly entitled to 1 assemblyman and no more. Some others are in much the same position as Imperial, certain to get an assemblyman because their neighbors are. Bunching these three classes, we have the following practical certainties of the next apportionment of assembly districts:

Solano, 1; Marin, 1; Contra Costa, 1; San Francisco, 14; Alameda, 8; Santa Clara, 1; Santa Cruz, 1; Monterey, 1; Santa Barbara, 1; Ventura, 1; Kern, 1; Los Angeles, 16; San Bernardino, 2; Orange, 1; Riverside, 1; Imperial, 1; San Diego, 2.

These figures account for 54 of the 80 assembly districts. Most of the uncertainties are in Northern California. Several districts there, notably the 5th, 8th, 9th, 12th, 15th and 16th, are now away too small. Such rearrangements as the combination of Mendocino and Lake County and Yuba and Siskiyou suggest themselves. The rapid growth of Stanislaus, and the slow growth of Merced and Madera, suggest a separate district for Stanislaus and a combination of San Benito (population only

FAIRNESS OF VARIABLE RATE

By J. D. GALLOWAY

Editor California Weekly.

Dear Sir: In a recent editorial you take exception to the fact that the Pacific Gas & Electric Company has a variable charge for electric current. The general manager, Mr. Britton, has stated that the maximum rate is 9 cents per kilowatt hour and the average between 5 and 6 cents. Your comment on these rates contains the statement that electric energy should be sold in a manner analogous to the sale of postal facilities by the government where a uniform charge is made for a service that may be large or small.

There is an inherent difference between the two and also very clear and definite reasons why the small consumer of electric energy should pay more for his current than the large consumer. The large sender of letters and the small sender are equally interested in having the postal facilities extended everywhere. Although the cost is borne principally by the large sender he is not interested in having the small sender charged a greater rate. Their interests are mutual as each may at times make use of the same facilities. In the distribution of electric power no such common interest exists. A, with the factory down town, is not interested in B having electricity in his home in the Mission. The facilities are not mutual although they have a common source.

There are several reasons why the small consumer of power, the householder, should pay a greater rate than the large consumer, the man with a factory. It is assumed that each should pay a rate based on the cost of furnishing him with power. The small consumer is hard to reach. The long pole lines which disfigure the streets represent an investment that is large as compared with the total revenue received from a small consumer or group of such. With the large consumers the reverse is true as they are generally located in a constricted district where they are reached by short lines.

Again there is a constant loss due to electric losses in a widely extended system of distribution which may reach twenty-five per cent. of the power distributed. On the short line to the large consumer the losses are much less.

The principal reason, however, for a higher rate for lights in a house is the low load factor. The load factor is the ratio that exists between the average consumption of power and the maximum. It may be a daily or a yearly load factor. If a man burns the lights in his house one hour in twenty-four his daily load factor is 4 1-6 per cent. If two hours the load factor is 8 1-3 per cent. If another man has a factory running eight hours a day his load factor is 33 1-3 per cent. assuming a uniform demand for power. The demand for electric power passes through a complete cycle every day and the curve of demand has a definite place where the maximum demand occurs called the peak of the load. This maximum demand occurs in the early hours of the evening when lights are on.

It is obvious that the power company must have machinery on hand to meet the maximum demand and conveying and distribution systems also, all designed for the maximum output. This all represents a cost upon which a revenue must be earned.

The meter rate of payment which has superseded the old flat rate requires the customer to pay for what he receives. If the lights in his house require one kilowatt to make them burn and they are burned one hour he is charged for one kilowatt hour. Now from the fact that the power company must have on hand a full equipment to supply the maximum demand it follows that while the householder is not burning his lights, some machinery is lying idle. The fixed charges on the investment and the operating charges do not stop, however.

As noted above, the load factor of lights in a house where lights may be turned on at any time in twenty-four hours is very low. In summer they may burn from 8 o'clock until 10 o'clock or two hours, giving a factor of 1 12 or 8 1-3 per cent. During the remaining 92 1-3 per cent of the day the entire system which supplies the light must be idle to that extent. In winter the lights may burn from 6 o'clock until 10 o'clock, giving a factor of 16 2-3 per cent. As a matter of fact, the factors are lower than this, as all the lights are not turned on all the time. It must also be recognized that night comes to all at the same time and that the demand for power is simultaneous. Compare this with the day time factory load of about uniform power demand over eight hours or a load factor of 33 1-3 per cent. Elevator service in buildings runs from 6 o'clock until 12 o'clock or eighteen hours. Hence the load factor is high. A stamp mill at a mine runs all the time and may have a 100 per cent. load factor. Again the day time factory is running at the time of peak of load and hence the machinery which carries the factory load during the day may carry the lighting load at night.

These are the reasons for variation in rates. The small householder is hard to reach, the investment is relatively high, there are power losses in the system, and losses due to the small load factor a large part of the day or year. A correct adjustment of rates must always take into account these variations in demand and the small consumer must always expect to be charged a high rate. He is really paying the interest on the cost of the idle machinery which must be provided to supply him when he demands power.

This principle runs through all public service of any character and must be taken into account. A freight car carrying a load from Chicago to San Francisco may immediately be given another load and thus be kept in use. The same car going from Chicago to some Nevada point can find at the latter point no return load and must be hauled away empty and at a cost to the company. Hence the Nevada rate may be as high or higher than the California rate. The principle applies everywhere.

The writer makes no comment on the equity of the rates charged. The only point advanced is the fairness of a variable rate. The subject is one of increasing importance and should be discussed with a clear understanding of all the various factors, that enter into the problem.

San Francisco, Cal., Dec. 5, 1910.

IN DEFENSE OF THE PUN

A witty man once said that the pun is of the lowest order of wit. The witty man had merely heard too many too bad puns just before he made the remark, and, if we may venture, undertook to pun-ish the tormentor who had inflicted them on him by a bit of stinging epigram.

But the pun, even in its baldest forms, has some obvious merits, and we must not forget that men so rich in ideas and words as Shakespeare and Lamb have not disdained to use the lowly pun with evident zest for their own enjoyment and the entertainment of the public. But we propose a defense of the pun on even higher ground than that of mere precedent, upon grounds philosophic and general.

Our point is this: a pun is a play upon words of like sounds and diverse meanings. But in a larger way and a more general sense and in the most acute practice of the writer's art, punning is constantly used so cleverly that hardly the most discerning critic observes it. For example, "The Raven," by Poe, is remarkable for a haunting verbal quality and for an equally elusive but persistent effect of weird sadness. Sift that poem to its elements and you will find only the slenderest of ideas. And yet it startles, thrills and saddens. Why? Because, in a highly skilled way, Poe has used the method of the pun for other purposes than mere amusement. He has played upon words, not to suggest laughter but sorrow. Iterated and reiterated throughout the poem are words which, by themselves, express only the slender idea of the poem's theme. But taken in their sequence, by their sound, they suggest far more than they literally say. They suggest sadness. That is, they suggest one thing and say another. So does a pun. The ordinary pun is obvious. The artistic pun is subtle. It plays upon words in a delicate and carefully concealed way, but it is a play upon words, just punning, in short.

The Christmas Question

Best solved at
The Emporium

San Francisco's Shopping Headquarters

A store full of merchandise best fitted for gifts. Substantial money's worth goods backed by the most powerful Pacific Coast buying organization and your money back if not satisfied.

A Store Noted for its Books

Every wanted book at prices invariably less than publishers. Ideal Christmas gifts.

A Store Famous for its Toys

the world over, because of the largest stock and lowest prices always and novelties not to be found elsewhere.

The Thousand and One Other Things

for gifts or every-day needs always to be found at The Emporium at prices the lowest, quality considered.

If in Doubt as to the Gift

buy a merchandise or glove order. Most acceptable and worth its face value to the recipient. Satisfaction assured.

NEEDED LABOR LEGISLATION

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY AND INJUNCTIONS IN LABOR DISPUTES

By WALTER MACARTHUR, Editor Coast Seamen's Journal

It is a truism that the chief concern of government is the happiness of the people. That condition is determined by the circumstances under which the people live and work. Hence the conclusion that the chief concern of government is the enactment and enforcement of labor legislation.

It is true that in the broadest sense the interests of the people are involved in certain general conditions, and that those interests can only be served by legislation of a general character. The subjects of transportation, education and taxation, for instance, are of the highest importance, ultimately affecting every individual. However, upon the principle that fundamental conditions demand first attention, there can be no dissent from the proposition that the first duty of government lies in the intelligent and comprehensive treatment of those matters which constitute the basis of all social and industrial activity.

The "life of the people" is the foundation of the state. The means and circumstances by which the people "make their living" determine the stability and progress of society.

A government which contents itself with regulating the larger and more general affairs of state, leaving the personal relations of the citizens to be determined by chance—that is, the chance of the weaker against the stronger—must be pronounced a failure. Under such a government we must expect to find, and in fact do find, a society in which the majority of the people are subjected to conditions unjust to themselves and injurious to the common wellbeing.

Paternalism is, of course, to be avoided, as detrimental to the spirit and exercise of personal liberty, upon which society must depend for its fullest development. Upon the other hand, the doctrine or policy of "let-alone" is no less prejudicial, no less a violation of the ethics upon which free government is founded and upon the observance of which it must depend for justification in its own sight and for support at the hands of the people.

Where Legislation Properly Begins

Government ought not to restrict or interfere with the relations of the citizens in so far as these are purely personal and limited in their effects to the individuals concerned. Neither ought it to permit absolute freedom in those relations in so far as the results thereof are likely to affect others. In a word, the government ought to extend a regulative and protective influence at that point at which personal interest ends and public interest begins.

It is not proposed that the government shall assume to regulate the wages or work day of labor, except in so far as the public employees are concerned, or in the case of private employees as may be required by considerations directly affecting public health or morals. Considering only those matters falling well within the latter category, there is need of laws to protect the workers, to safeguard their lives and limbs, to insure prompt payment of wages, to defend women and children from the necessity of undue or premature labor, and to insure adequate compensation for injuries. Legislation upon these and kindred matters should be the concern of government equally at least with any other duty devolving upon it.

The labor legislation most needed in California is suggested by a series of questions recently addressed by the San Francisco Labor Council to candidates for public office. The questions are as follows:

1. What is your position on the question of Koreans, Hindus, and other Asiatic laborers whose standards of life are incompatible with ours?
2. What is your attitude toward the demand for direct legislation, which by means of the initiative, the referendum and the recall proposes to put into practice the theory that sovereignty resides in the people?
3. What is your position on the question of electing United States senators by direct vote of the people, and on the question of a state-wide advisory vote for that office until such direct vote be permitted by an amendment to the constitution of the United States?
4. What are your views concerning the demand for an employers' liability law that will abolish the fellow-servant rules, leave questions of negligence, contributory negligence, and assumption of risk to the jury, and which should contain other modifications of the existing laws that bear unjustly on the toilers in cases of injury during the course of employment?

5. What are your views on the subject of abolishing the evil practices connected with the salary loan business? What remedies can you suggest to check the nefarious methods of these loan sharks, as they are deservedly termed?

6. What is your attitude toward private employment agencies? And how can this disgraceful system of plunder be abolished?

7. What is your position on the demand for establishing by law regular pay days at least twice a month for work and labor performed for private and corporation employers?

8. What are your views on the subject of interference by courts, by police, by military, and by executive officials in strikes and industrial disputes?

9. What are your views on the question of extending the right to vote to women?

10. What is your attitude toward labor legislation, such as regulation of hazardous, excessive and unhealthy working conditions, effective inspection laws, abolition of convict labor in competition with free labor, and such other legislation as will better the economic and social conditions of the toiling masses?

A subsequent report by the Law and Legislative Committee of the Labor Council states that "the replies came to hand in surprising numbers, and were duly published in four consecutive numbers of the 'Labor Clarion,' beginning with the issue of September 30 and ending with the issue of October 21." Concerning the nature of the replies, the report says:

The character of the replies received merits fullest acknowledgment, both as to sincerity and the completeness of the views entertained by most of the candidates; and if declarations before the day of election are to be afterward lived up to by those chosen to fill high public office, as organized labor will ever demand, there are the most promising indications before the working men and women of this state that the officials we are going to elect on the coming 8th day of November will be a set of men better informed of the demands of labor and more willing to grant them than any previous administration inducted into office in the state of California.

A number of candidates were non-committal in their replies to certain questions, especially those dealing with woman suffrage and direct legislation. With these exceptions, the following, submitted by one of the candidates, may be regarded as typical of the views generally expressed:

I take pleasure in replying as follows to a request for my views upon certain legislative matters:

(1) I favor the full maintenance of the present Chinese Exclusion Act, and its extension so as to exclude all classes of Asiatic labor.

(2) I favor the initiative, referendum and recall.

(3) I favor the election of United States senators by direct vote of the people.

(4) I favor an amendment to the employers' liability law which shall guarantee compensation to injured employees in all cases other than culpable negligence on the part of the person injured.

(5) I favor such legislation as may be necessary to protect borrowers on salary warrants or other forms of security from usury, by the establishment and enforcement of a low rate of interest.

(6) Private employment agencies should be limited by law in the matter of the amount charged for service.

(7) I favor the establishment of regular pay days at least twice a month.

(8) The courts and other authorities should not interfere in industrial disputes except when violations of the law occur, and then only in the manner provided by law and to the extent necessary to preserve the peace.

(9) I favor extending the full right of franchise to women.

(10) I favor the enactment of legislation regulating the conditions of employment in hazardous, excessive and unhealthy labor; effective and comprehensive factory inspection laws, and the prohibition of prison-labor competition with free labor.

Generally speaking, I favor all measures designed to better the economic and social conditions of the workers, believing that in so doing the interests of the whole people may be best served.

If elected, I shall do everything in my power to secure the passage of legislation in accordance with the views herein expressed.

So far as pre-election statements go, there is a good prospect of intelligent and effective action upon these matters by the coming session of the legislature.

Experience proves the necessity of concentrating effort upon the more important measures, thus avoiding complete failure by attempting to secure the passage of many bills. The question of relative importance is not an easy one to decide. Each of the matters dealt with in the foregoing list is important in itself. Other matters might be mentioned which in the judgment of many persons are still more important. In such a situation perhaps the safest rule to follow, at least for the purposes of this article, is to select those measures of most direct and yet most general bearing upon the welfare of labor. Regarded in this light the matters of employers' liability and interference by public authorities in strikes are entitled to precedence.

The law of employers' liability is the subject of an increasing degree of public attention, as appears not only from the appointment of commissions to study the whole subject but from actual legislation as well. During the past two years eight states (Minnesota, New York, Wisconsin, Illinois, New Jersey, Ohio, Washington and Massachusetts) have created commissions for this purpose. The federal government, by virtue of an act of congress, has also taken action of the same kind.

In a number of states legislation has recently been enacted restricting and modifying the customary defense of employers, i.e., "fellow service," "assumed risk," and "contributory negligence." The doctrine of "comparative negligence," under which the contributory negligence of the employee is compared with the primary negligence of the employer, with a corresponding award of damages, has been incorporated in the laws of Texas, Iowa, Ohio and Georgia.

In Ohio and New York the employers' liability laws have recently been greatly modified in favor of the injured, and for the first time in this country we now have a law which provides compensation, in more than one industry, for accidents, regardless of fault. In this law New York included eight extra-hazardous employments, and has worked out a definite scheme of compensation for injuries. The injured man has a choice of accepting compensation according to a given schedule or of suing under the existing law. By another New York act employer and employee may agree voluntarily upon a compensation when for those industries not included in the compulsory law.

Defects in Law

The defects in the existing law of this state are well known. These consist chiefly in the extreme slowness of legal process, the great, and in fact prohibitory, expense to the claimant, and the character of the defense permitted. As matters stand, the injured employee and his dependents are practically without redress. The law is to all intents and purposes a nullity. It is notorious, too, that even when compensation is awarded the injured person must suffer the deduction of a large proportion as legal fees, etc. The recent report of the New York Commission on Industrial Accidents states that in 151 cases investigated 22.7 per cent. of the damages paid went for fees. Records of the ten insurance companies investigated showed that out of $100 paid in less than $37 goes to injured workmen. On this subject, the New York Post recently said:

"The lawyer of the 'ambulance-chaser' type and the employers' own high-priced counsel are the chief beneficiaries. We have been unable or unwilling to see that injury by accident in industry is really not accident so far as the entire body of labor is concerned. It may be accident that A and not B is injured in the course of a year. But that either A or B or one of their hundred fellow-workers will be injured or worse in the course of a year is not accident, but as sure a thing as the natural death rate in any community. And like the insurance company's life risks the accident rate can be calculated and made the basis of a decent system of insurance compensation."

With the example and experience of other states before us, the legislature of California should be able to enact an employers' liability law which will afford a practical means of relief to the injured, and thus place the state in line with the progressive sentiment of the country. Care should be taken, however, to

(Continued on Page 30)

("Political Table Talk"—Continued)

8,041, but now a separate district) with Merced and Madera.

For the use of our readers who may care to calculate these possible rearrangements, we reproduce from the newspapers the clipping they probably forgot to clip, showing the population, 1910, by counties:

Alameda, 246,131; Alpine, 309; Amador, 9,086; Butte, 27,301; Calaveras, 9,171; Colusa, 7,732; Contra Costa, 31,674; Del Norte, 2,417; Eldorado, 7,492; Fresno, 75,657; Glenn, 7,172; Humboldt, 33,857; Imperial, 13,591; Inyo, 6,974; Kern, 37,715; Kings, 16,230; Lake, 5,526; Lassen, 4,802; Los Angeles, 504,131; Madera, 8,368; Marin, 25,114; Mariposa, 3,956; Mendocino, 23,929; Merced, 15,148; Modoc, 6,191; Mono, 2,842; Monterey, 24,146; Napa, 19,800; Nevada, 14,955; Orange, 34,436; Placer, 18,237; Plumas, 5,259; Riverside, 34,696; Sacramento, 67,806; San Benito, 8,041; San Bernardino, 56,706; San Diego, 61,665; San Francisco, 416,912; San Joaquin, 50,731; San Luis Obispo, 19,383; San Mateo, 26,585; Santa Barbara, 27,738; Santa Clara, 83,539; Santa Cruz, 26,140; Shasta, 18,920; Sierra, 4,098; Siskiyou, 18,800; Solano, 27,559; Sonoma, 48,394; Stanislaus, 22,522; Sutter, 6,328; Tehama, 11,401; Trinity, 3,301; Tulare, 35,440; Tuolumne, 9,979; Ventura, 18,347; Yolo, 13,926; Yuba, 10,042.

Senate Puzzle The Watchman frankly gives up the senate reapportionment problem until he has had more time to study it. Only Los Angeles, 8; San Francisco, 7; Sacramento, 1, and Alameda, 4, are certain. The other districts, so far as he sees now, may all be rearranged if the legislature wishes. If those districts which now have enough population are left as they are, Nos. 12, 26, 30, 32, 39 and 40 could continue. It may be noted, as a curious fact, that 30 out of the 40 senatorial districts, as now grouped, have now not enough population to make the required 59,438.

Congressional Reapportionment The congressional reapportionment offers an interesting field of speculation, with one practical certainty, which is, that whatever additions are made to California's delegation in congress, those additions will come from Central and Southern California. Those districts have far outstripped Northern California in growth in population. Under the present apportionment, the ratio is one congressman to every 194,182 people. Under that ratio, California has had eight congressional districts, roughly defined as follows: 1st, the northernmost counties and the tier of counties on the Sierra Nevada range as far south as Mariposa and Mono; 2nd, Coast and Coast Range and Sacramento valley counties north of the bay; 3rd, Solano, Contra Costa and Alameda counties; 4th, a portion of San Francisco; 5th, the remainder of San Francisco, and San Mateo and Santa Clara counties; 6th, San Joaquin valley and Coast counties south to, but not including, Tulare and San Luis Obispo; 8th, remaining San Joaquin and Coast counties and all Southern California except Los Angeles county; 7th, Los Angeles county.

Now congress will probably not increase its membership greatly. At present it numbers 391. The general opinion is that it will set 400 as the membership for the next decade. The census shows about 91,000,000 population. On that basis, the ratio for reapportionment will be one congressman for every 227,500 people. At that ratio, California will get 10 congressmen.

Los Angeles Gets Two Congressmen? Assuming this to be true, Los Angeles county, with her 504,131 population, immediately gets two congressmen, or one of the two additional congressmen. That leaves the disposition of the other the sole problem. Alameda county, with 246,131 population, is entitled to a congressman by herself. The 1st district needs more counties to reach the ratio, the 2nd has a few more than she needs. Adding Solano and Contra Costa (from the 3rd) to the 2nd and taking from the 2nd a row of northern counties will give the 1st about enough and leave the 2nd about enough. San Francisco and San Mateo, without Santa Clara, could take care of the 4th and 5th, with a little benefit of a small fraction for good nature. That would pass the slack of Santa Clara county on south to either the 6th or the 8th district. These two, combined, with the benefit of a similar small fraction, will then have enough to make three districts, accounting for the other additional district.

To show this fact even more vividly, note the growth in population by districts from 1900 to 1910:

1st to 5th, inclusive (37 counties), 312,000 (approx.)

6th to 8th, inclusive (21 counties), 472,000 (approx.)

From these figures, with Los Angeles sure of two and Alameda of one, it is a safe prediction that it will tax the ingenuity of the legislature to reapportion the districts in any way to deprive Southern California of the advantage of this growth. The population, 1910, of the districts as they now are, is as follows: 1st, 184,073; 2nd, 263,070; 3rd, 305,364; 4th and part of 5th (San Francisco), 416,912; remainder of 5th, 110,124; 6th, 246,973; 7th, 504,131; 8th, 346,691.

CAN'T TUNE OUT THE LADIES

Few are the steamer passengers who fail to visit the wireless office aboard ship to watch the operation of the instruments and to question the operator. Needless to say, the technical understanding of the well meaning visitors is a variable quantity.

The operator must listen to wondering exclamations, original suggestions for the improvement of the service, discourses on the relations between wireless telegraphy and spiritualism, and other doubtful topics with uniform courtesy.

At times, however, the strain is too great. According to the Youth's Companion, it was a woman with an eye for details who came to the wireless room and looked wonderingly in.

"Oh, here's the wireless! May I come in? Isn't it wonderful to think of sending those—those waves—you call them waves, don't you? How fascinating to work at this! Are those jars filled with water?"

"Those are condenser jars, madam, quite empty."

"Really? I don't believe I could ever understand it. That coil of wire looks like a bird cage."

"That is the inductance helix."

"What are those things over your ears?"

"The receiving telephones."

"Then you have telephone connection, too. One can hardly keep up with the times these days. What does that coil do?"

"That is the receiving tuner and interference preventer."

"Wonderful! Does it keep out all interference?"

"Not all," replied the operator, wearily. "Some kinds of interference can't be tuned out; we just have to stand it."

One Evidence of Genius

"I fancy that there is no doubt that he is a real poet."

"What makes you think so?"

"Why, I am informed that nobody is able to read his handwriting."

Apparently the automobile had passed directly over him, yet he picked himself up unscathed. "To what do you attribute your marvelous escape?" they asked as he stood dusting himself off in the middle of the pavement. "To the fact," he said, "that my name's MacAdam."—New York Times.

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

708 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD

The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital 300,000.00
Surplus 400,000.00
Profits 45,000.00

DIRECTORS James D. Phelan, President;
John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt,
Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph
Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R.
D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.

Attorneys J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy.
Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant
Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)
526 CALIFORNIA ST., San Francisco, Cal.

Guaranteed Capital$1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds 1,555,093.05
Deposits June 30th, 1910 40,384,727.21
Total Assets 43,108,907.82

Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co's. Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President and Manager, George Tournay; Third Vice-President, J. W. Van Bergen; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, A. H. Muller; Assistant Secretaries, G. J. O. Folte and Wm. D. Newhouse; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, George Tournay, J. W. Van Bergen, Ign. Steinhart, I. N. Walter, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Streets. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Heyer, Manager.

In reply to many letters inquiring whether I shall publish a review of the session of the California Legislature of 1911, along the same lines as those followed in "The Story of the California Legislature of 1909," I will state that I shall do so, if subscriptions for 1,200 volumes are received before the Legislature of 1911 adjourns. If you wish to be one of the subscribers, fill out and forward this card.

FRANKLIN HICHBORN.

191

Franklin Hichborn,
Santa Clara, California.

As soon as the Story of the California Legislature of 1911 is published, send me one copy, for which I agree to pay $1.50 on delivery.

Name

Address

IN the early seventies my people were living in Missouri near the old battle grounds south of Lexington. As a child, my mother often took me to visit the fiery, unconquerable Divers girls. The old Divers estate at that time was a great tract of land, gone wild for lack of help ever since the war. The great stretches of field were thick with sumac, polk weeds, docks and cockles rioting man-high where once the slaves had cultivated the orderly rows of corn. In the timber lands, where in the sixties the bushwhackers had found convenient hiding, nothing then roamed more dreadful than the wood turkeys and wild hogs.

In a desolate spot in the gnarled old orchard stood the blackened, crumbling chimneys and scattered foundation stones of what had once been the imposing Divers mansion. As children playing, we used to run laughing out of the "sparrow grass" and catnip tangles to come suddenly upon those fire-scarred ruins, and no matter how the sun might be shining on the rest of the orchard, there the light seemed chill and gray.

Mrs. Tee Jones was the first of the girls to marry. I do not recall her first name. The girls always called her Sistah. There was another married sister living on the far end of the estate. There were also two proud, high-headed, indomitable spinsters, Vivian and Fanny, who tried heroically to keep up the establishment to its old-time levels of respectability. These ladies did nothing more unladylike before visitors than sewing or sketching; but when the visitors were gone they would attack with a consuming bitterness of heart, yet admirable courage, the washing or cooking, or what not household drudgeries which their ante-bellum training caused them to consider as fit labor only for servants. Thus by their heroic, surreptitious labors they managed somehow to eke out a living on their untended acres.

They managed to dress fashionably and they went out in the best society of the near-by towns. Not that they had any particular matrimonial hopes for themselves—the terrible war had come just at the time to blast the roses of their girlhoods—but they kept up for the sake of the baby of the girls, dainty, delicate, yellow haired Lelia, whom, by the way, my uncle courted and married.

Mrs. Tee Jones, or Sistah, lived on her husband's farm only a few miles away on the prairie upland. She came down home often, bringing her brood of little children to lighten the days for her unmarried sisters in their gaunt white house built just after the war. There my mother and I often went.

There, while the Divers girls stitched endlessly on their fancy work through the long afternoons, they could talk of nothing but wa'times and the sufferings of that household of women during that awful ordeal. The wag of the neighborhood, speaking of the Divers girls, once said: "There's one disease worse'n smallpox that disfigures the face, and that's having money and losing it! That pockmarks a woman's soul forever."

Their parlor was a white, high-ceilinged room with a white board mantel shelf across one end. On this shelf was a prim assortment of articles, twigs and leaves covered with alum crystals, daguerreotypes of the father, brothers and uncles who "never came back," and, most tempting to my childish eyes, apples, peaches and pears of solid wax most naturally and temptingly colored. (I know they were only wax, because once when I was left alone in the room, I climbed up on the green brocade upholstery of a mahogany chair and sampled that horrid fruit!)

In one of the glaringly white corners of the parlor hung suspended a great cornucopia filled with pressed autumn leaves and dried grasses and seed pods, wondrously sprinkled with diamond dust. The gathering of those dead things was Fanny's annual autumnal task. Clad in her moth-eaten furs, she ranged the frost-seared, weedy fields and byways and gathered the prettiest of the dead, dried wildlings and the scarlet bittersweet for that winter bouquet. Poor Divers girls! Life for you in those desolate years hadn't much of cheer or living loveliness!

How could anyone be cheerful in such a house? On one wall hung a large, square

WARTIME RECOLLEC- TIONS

THE BLUE SILK SLEEVE

BY

RAY McINTYRE KING

shallow box, glass covered and framed in ebony. Inside was exhibited for the beholder's horriification, and the Divers girls' mournful contemplation, a great wreath of flowers, cunningly woven from the hair of the departed. It afforded the girls a deal of melancholy pleasure to point out to the visitor each particular flower of grey, or gold, or brown, and tell to whom the lock had once belonged. In other framed boxes were wreaths of zephyr flowers and all the long, long dreary years could not dim their gaudy colors. There were mottoes done in worsteds, and faded engravings framed at home in everything else but wood—corn, or shells, or seeds glued to pasteboard and varnished. There was a crayon sketch of a nude child sitting in a wash bowl. The poor thing was biting its underlip, which wasn't strange considering how chilly and tired and lonesome it must have gotten!

The Divers girls were divided in opinion about this picture, which was the work of Miss Vivian's boarding school girlhood. Most of the girls pronounced it highly immodest and improper, but the artist clung to it and hotly defended it, not only for reasons of true art, but because it was a precious relic of other and happier days.

One afternoon the little feminine gathering was assembled as usual in the parlor. Miss Fanny's withered fingers flicked daintily over a bit of embroidery. Her reddish hair was elaborately puffed and her withered face duly powdered. Not to powder in those days rendered a woman painfully conspicuous, and branded her as one indifferent to her personal appearance and to social usages.

Miss Vivian, as elaborately gotten up to hide the ravages of years, was busy at her easel at a north window. She was copying an impossible marine view, but as she had never seen a stretch of water larger than Dagget's mill pond she was quite happily ignorant of her "study's" shortcomings.

Lelia, the youngest and fairest, was day-dreaming over her fine sewing, scarcely heeding the clatter of tongues, a quiet smile parting her sweet lips now and then. When one is living one's own youth and romance, why should one be much concerned with the shadows and specters in the long-lost youth of older women? Mother and I looked on from our place on the slippery horsehair sofa.

At the marble-topped center table sat Mrs. Tee Jones, plump and rosy and busy, as became a mother, with small stockings. Marriage had diverted her needlework into most commonplace lines. She inserted a yellow gourd into a long black stocking and plied her darning needle vigorously.

"As I was saying," she continued in her rapid, mellifluous way—the easy, soporific tone of the woman who pours out reminiscences endlessly, "a detachment of Yanks or rebels would swing past, stopping perhaps to eat one meal. But one meal for fifty men would strip the place of eatables. Soldiers were always coming and going past our place and we had to pay tribute to both friend and foe. The negroes soon disappeared. The cornercribs were speedily emptied. The bacon vanished from the smokehouse. The cattle and hogs failed to come up from the pasture. Then there was the constant wearing anxiety about our men folks off at the front.

"To all this, was added the menace of the bushwhackers. Our local brand of bushwhackers were northern sympathizers and our neighbors, but they were too cowardly to join a regular command. They harrassed the lines of the Confederates, but chiefly they preyed upon the unprotected estates of those Confederates who, like my father, were off at the front. These outlaws were in the neighborhood all the time and likely at any hour to swoop down upon us and run off our stock or carry away our clothes and portables. We were never safe from them, except when the regular soldiery was passing, and then you may be sure the bushwhackers were nowhere to be seen. We had no one to protect us but old Tobe, and he was so old nobody knew his age."

"Old Tobe that died since we moved here?" queried my mother.

"Yes. About all he could do was to wind the clock. He used to do it every night, years and years, even back when our father was a boy. When the bushwhackers burned our house Tobe thought first of his precious clock and saved it. We set it up in this house, and he wound it every night regularly, even that night he went off upstairs and never waked up."

"Dear old Tobe!" sighed the two spinster ladies.

"I remember the first time we had to do the washing," continued Mrs. Tee Jones. "The negro women were all gone and we had arrived at the point when we just simply had to wash. We found a barrel of soft soap and began. Our hands were white and tender. The soap was strong with lye. Presently Fanny rebelled and went off to cry over her bleeding hands. Vivy rubbed awhile and quit, her nails eaten to the quick. I was standing by my tub, but the bitter tears were streaming down my cheeks—you can't understand what it meant to a southern woman to come down to washing—when old Tobe appeared.

"'Dat's nigger's work,' he cried indignantly. 'Freedom, or no freedom, I'se not gwine to see my young missus doing nigger's work. Clar out! I'se gwine do dis washin'."

"And he did till we learned the way of coming down to such work."

The narrator paused while she searched in her work-bag, a bulky sack of gay cretonne. She drew forth various articles, stockings, scraps, thread. Finally, she held up something for the inspection of us all. It was a blue silk sleeve, somewhat scant, elbow length, finished at the bottom with a graduated flounce of plaited silk. At the top, the turned seam and broken ravellings of thread showed that it had once been sewn in an armhole. It was a sheeny silk sleeve, scarcely wrinkled from wear, and of a most exquisite blue—the deep, glowing atmospheric blue so rarely seen in textile fabrics.

"What a lovely silk!" cried my mother.

"And to think I never had a chance to wear it!" There was a queer twist to the corners of Mrs. Tee Jones' generous mouth. "I ought to be ashamed of that sleeve, but I'm not! I'm prouder of that sleeve than of anything that happened to me since the wa'."

"Oh, Sistah was a girl of such temper!" interrupted Miss Fanny, admiringly. "Why, once the bushwhackers came here. Old Sam Timmons, the leader, had known us all our lives. He lived over on Knights Ridge, just poor white trash that we had never noticed before the wa'. Well, he and his men rode up and went through the house. They were taking everything they could carry, silverware, china, pictures and such. They went to the room where Sistah kept her new side saddle, but Sistah sprang ahead of them and as Old Sam Timmons reached for her saddle, she told him to desist. These were her very words: 'Desist, you thief! Vivy and I were cowering in the hall, expecting every minute to see the villain cut her down with his saber. Indeed, we did!'"

"Sistah was a girl of such fine spirit!" Vivian paused in her painting long enough to say. "She snatched the riding quirt and struck him a blow across his face. Fanny and I both screamed. We just knew he would kill her, but he only swore and called her a little rebel. But he took the saddle just the same. His family used our things for years after the wa'. Ah, Sistah had a fine temper in those days!"

"I couldn't endure that he, of all men, should take advantage of us lone girls," said

A Great Paper With Character

THE WEEKLY EDITION

—OF THE—

Springfield
Republican

MASSACHUSETTS

"The Morning Star of New England Journalism"

Only One Dollar a Year

Fifty-two Rich Issues at Less Than Two Cents a CopyBEST FAMILY JOURNAL IN THE COUNTRY

THE REPUBLICAN continues to hold its unique position in American journalism. As a discerning Massachusetts editor wrote the past year:

"It has a flavor, a conscience and a code of ethics all its own, and its literary quality is of the highest order. That it has gained this high distinction and upholds the lofty principles of its founder, without fuss, bluster or splurge, is a splendid story and an inspiring record."

With the world as its field, The Weekly Republican gives its readers a great variety of valuable matter—several pages of editorials in each issue, fearless, able and interesting comment on men and affairs; special illustrated articles of high quality, the news of the week intelligently arranged and condensed, while in the various departments, discriminating attention is paid to music, the drama, art, literature, religion, education, science, interests of women, sports and outdoor life, progressive agriculture and forestry. Special correspondence from Washington and other American centers, and also from abroad, keeps the reader fully abreast of the times.

The Weekly is made up of the best things appearing in The Daily and Sunday Republican, the favorite New England newspaper.

THE SUBSCRIPTION RATES ARE: For The Weekly, $1 a year, Daily $8, Sunday $2.

SPECIMEN COPIES of either Edition sent free on application. The Weekly Republican will be sent free for one month to anyone who wishes to try it.

All subscriptions are payable in advance. Address

THE REPUBLICAN
Springfield, Mass.

Mrs. Tee Jones. "Now, this blue silk sleeve—father bought the silk in New Orleans just before the wa'. I made the dress myself. The wa' came on and there was no occasion for wearing it. It hung in my closet with my other silk dresses. The bushwhackers came time and again, but I managed to keep my dresses. Then they burned our house. Old Tobe helped us girls carry out a few things, the clock, and the parlor chairs, and a few such things. Old Sam and his men swarmed everywhere picking up anything they fancied. Old Sam Timmons carried out an armload of my silk dresses, this blue silk among others, and I saw him ride away with my dresses flapping across his saddle bows.

"It was five years after the wa', and our neighborhood was quiet and law-abiding once more. Old Timmons had become quite prosperous and respectable. His daughters had grown up and they went out in company, but we always looked over their heads. We couldn't be expected to forget that they were the daughters of that old thief. And we didn't forget!

"We girls went to a Christmas ball at Marshalls, over on Clear Fork, and who should be there but that Timmons outfit. The dancing was well on, and Tee and I were waltzing together, when what should I see come waltzing toward me but my beautiful blue silk dress! I presume there was a girl inside of it, but I saw nothing but my stolen dress. Can you imagine my feelings?

"I just went crazy for a few moments. I bided my time, and then I sprang at her, like a cat, I suppose, and grabbed this sleeve. I jerked and jerked and I felt the threads give."

"Oh, it was a scene," interrupted Miss Vivian excitedly. "Such a scene for a Christmas ball, and us girls just glorying shamelessly in it. There stood Sistah like a tragedy queen, after she had ripped the sleeve loose, waving it in her hand. The Timmons girl fainted—there really wasn't much else she could do gracefully. Old Timmons sprang through the crowd and he and her partner supported the girl. Sistah stood there so tall and flashing, and she shook that blue silk sleeve in Old Timmons' face. 'You thief!' she cried, 'I dare you to let your daughter wear my dresses in public again!'—Those were her very words—her very words."

"Old Timmons was white, I can tell you," said Miss Fanny, taking up the recital. "But he never said a word, as he supported his daughter from the room. She was very limp and that one bare arm hung down most conspicuously. All the young men crowded around Sistah, for they knew what the Divers girls had suffered at Old Timmons' hands. And will you believe it? They gave the rebel yell that fairly raised the roof. And Sistah covered her ears with her hands and laughed, and everybody laughed, and tried to forget the late unpleasantness."

"A few days later," supplemented Mrs. Tee Jones, "the girl came to me crying and shamed. She said she and her sweetheart had talked it over and she hoped I'd forgive her and not blame her for what her father had done during the wa'. Really, she was very sweet and sad about it and I just had to forgive her. I just couldn't treasure up the sins of the father against such a dear girl as she is, now could I?"

"I wonder," she mused aloud, "if my daughters can ever believe that their mother was such a red-headed, hot-tempered miss as I was in wa' times."

"As all the Divers girls were," added Miss Fanny, boastfully.

Not While Technicalities Last

Lives of millionaires remind us,
While they're out on bail,
If we, too, possessed a million,
We need fear no jail.

Mrs. Harriet M. King is said to be the owner and actual manager of one of the largest farms in the world. Her farm is known as the Santo Gertrude Ranch and is near Corpus Christi, Tex. Its pasturage is reported to afford grazing for 100,000 cattle, 50,000 sheep and nearly 3,000 horses. Mrs. King is said to keep 2,000 employees busy on her ranch and to find no difficulty in managing them.

("Labor Legislation"—Continued)

avoid the "contracting-out" features which have vitiated so many otherwise good laws on the subject.

The question of official, especially judicial, interference in strikes brings us to the point involved in the so-called anti-injunction bills which have been pending before congress and other legislative bodies for some time past. The measure now before congress, and known as H. R. 25188, is as follows:

A bill to regulate the issuance of restraining orders and injunctions and procedure thereon and to limit the meaning of "conspiracy" in certain cases.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employee, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, or involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law; and such property and property right must be particularly described in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his, her, or its agent or attorney. And for the purposes of this act no right to continue the relation of employer and employee, or to assume or create such relation with any particular person or persons, or at all, or to carry on business of any particular kind, or at any particular place, or at all, shall be construed, held, considered, or treated as property or as constituting a property right.

Sec. 2. That in cases arising in the courts of the United States or coming before said courts, or before any judge or the judges thereof, no agreement between two or more persons concerning the terms or conditions of employment, or the assumption or creation or termination of any relation between employer and employee, or concerning any act or thing to be done or not to be done with reference to or involving or growing out of a labor dispute, shall constitute a conspiracy or other civil or criminal offense, or be punished or prosecuted, or damages recovered upon as such, unless the act or thing agreed to be done or not to be done would be unlawful if done by a single individual; nor shall the entering into or the carrying out of any such agreement be restrained or enjoined unless such act or thing agreed to be done would be subject to be restrained or enjoined under the provisions, limitations and definitions contained in the first section of this act.

Sec. 3. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, held at St. Louis, Mo., last month, re-indorsed this bill and recommended that it be introduced, with the necessary changes in terminology, in the respective state legislatures. Those familiar with the subject will note that the gist of the bill is contained in the prohibition of restraining orders and injunctions, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right. In a word, the bill maintains the power now vested in courts to issue injunctions against irreparable injury to property and property rights, but denies that power in matters involving purely personal rights—that is, in matters affecting the relations between employer and employee as such, and between merchant and customer as such, which relations are personal and therefore not properly subject to interference by the courts.

This measure would take from the courts no power now vested in them, but would check their present manifest tendency to confuse equity and law and to invade and destroy the liberty of the citizen. The matter is thus stated by President Gompers of the American Federation of Labor:

There can be no property rights either in the labor power of the employee or prospective employee, or in the patronage or possible patronage of the public or any individual member thereof. The thirteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States stands as a bar in either case. Within its proper field equity power is necessary and beneficent. Within its true sphere it prevents the immediate invasion or destruction of property or property rights, and within that sphere of usefulness and necessity its operation must be swift and certain. If, however, equity power is permitted to invade the sphere properly belonging to the courts of law, it will attract to itself and exercise all jurisdiction.

Governor-elect Johnson, in his reply to the Labor Council, expressed himself upon the subject as follows:

I have long been impressed with the abuses made possible by the reckless or indiscriminate use of the power of injunctions by the courts in labor disputes, and while I do not believe that the power of injunctions can be constitutionally taken from the courts, I think it should be so limited and defined as to guard against its abuse. Certainly these injunctions ought not to be used in labor disputes without notice and hearing, and even then only to prevent actually impending evils for which there is no remedy in the ordinary process of law.

There can be no doubt as to the need of legislation upon this subject, not only for the protection of labor in the collective exercise of its constitutional rights but also for the preservation of individual liberty. The bill here submitted is a carefully prepared measure, the result of much deliberation and experience, and its passage would do much to conserve the authority of the courts within their proper sphere.

Referring to the suggestion of Governor-elect Johnson that "these injunctions ought not to be used in labor disputes without notice and hearing," it must be noted that there is grave danger in any attempt to remedy the existing abuse of the equity power by providing that injunctions may issue only upon "notice and hearing." Such provision would in effect confirm the present practice. A bill containing such a provision is now before congress, and is vigorously opposed by labor as subversive of the whole principle involved. The only safe rule is to draw a clear distinction between those matters in which equity may and may not intervene—between property rights and personal rights—and then leave the courts free to issue injunctions at once wherever property rights are involved.

PERSONALIA

Mme. Curie, one of the discoverers of radium, is a candidate for admission to the French academy of sciences, which has never yet elected a woman member. There is a tradition of the academy that no woman shall enter the hall where the meetings are held.

Dr. Simon Flexner, the head of the Rockefeller institute, has called attention to the large number of antivivisectionists who are active sportsmen, and marvels at the sympathy with animals which inspires protests against the killing of rats for the good of mankind, and yet does not prevent the slaughter of beautiful and harmless birds for pleasure.

In becoming naturalized as an American citizen Prince Nicholas Troubetzkoy was informed by the court at Los Angeles that he must part with his title. He promptly assented.

A new Methodist hymnal has been compiled in England. The committee which selected the songs consisted of 40 persons, members of the Wesleyan Methodists, the united Methodists, the Irish Methodists and the Wesleyan reform union. The new book will include hymns written by Methodists, Catholics, high, low and broad Anglicans, Unitarians and members of other religious bodies. Marie Corelli, the novelist, has written one hymn, which begins:

In our hearts celestial voices

Softly say—

Day is passing, night is coming,

Kneel and pray!

Mr. S. D. Woods, a Californian who years ago in a rural school of the far west numbered Edwin Markham among his pupils, will publish this month, through Funk & Wagnalls Company, "Lights and Shadows of Life on the Pacific Coast," a volume of appealing reminiscences and anecdotes of a long life, beginning with many interesting stories of the gold rush of '49, and continuing with bright and compelling observations on the daily life and history of the Pacific Coast from that time to the present day.

Mrs. Mary S. Halladay of St. Louis is said to be the only woman railway president in the world. On the death of her husband a few years ago Mrs. Halladay became a member of the board of directors of a small railroad in which he had a large amount of stock of doubtful value. Mrs. Halladay investigated the railroad and was the means of making such changes in the management that today this same stock is said to be valued at more than a quarter of a million dollars.

The duke of Wellington never could have succeeded in American politics. In a posthumous article, printed in the Canadian magazine, by Goldwin Smith, it is related that the duke had a country house near the home of Mr. Smith in England. Attending church near by, one Sunday, "a worshiper went up to him and begged to be allowed to take the hand of the victor of Waterloo. 'Don't make a d— fool of yourself,' was the hero's reply."—Springfield Republican.

MODESTO'S NEW CHARTER

Modesto's new charter embodies many new features, and those versed in municipal affairs do not hesitate to pronounce it a model charter. Chas. E. Russell, the eminent writer on municipal affairs, has praised its novel features. The main defect of the old system of municipal government being division of responsibility, the new charter attempts to remedy this by centralizing power and responsibility, subject, of course, to the control of the people, lest this centralization result in the arbitrary reign of a few.

Articles I and II of the charter fix the boundaries of the city.

Article III contains a general enumeration of powers. Among the powers granted to the city is the power to acquire and operate public utilities. This provision is a great step toward municipal ownership. One of the subdivisions of the article, however, gives the city the right to lease public utilities owned by it. This provision might be used for the purpose of defeating the whole section. However, as the charter provides for the submission to the people of every grant of a franchise, there is no danger. The people are not subject to corporate influence. The charter committee rejected the proposition made by the writer to exempt improvements from taxation. It was feared that the legislature might reject the charter containing this innovation. When the people are better informed they will adopt this reform. This section also gives the city the right to acquire aviation landings. It is thus the first constitutional document recognizing aviation as a practical method of transportation.

Article IV deals with elections. They are non-partisan. Nominations are made by petitions signed by twenty-five voters. The Berkeley plan is adopted. Under this plan, a second election is held only in case none of the candidates receives a majority. When this happens the first election is considered a primary, and a second election, in which take part the candidates not elected at the first election equal in number to twice the number to be elected and who received the highest vote at the first election, is then held.

Article V deals with elective officers. They are five in number, a mayor and four councilmen, elected at large on a general ticket, for four years.

Articles VI and VII define the duties of the council and the mayor. The mayor is chief executive and president of the council. All ordinances must first be published in the official paper, and cannot be adopted until the expiration of five days from date of their introduction. The council cannot sell public property or grant franchises.

Article VIII divides the municipal government into four departments: 1. Finance; 2. Public Health; 3. Public Works; 4. Public Supplies. The council assigns a councilman to each department. The board preferred this to the Grand Junction system under which a councilman is elected directly to his duties. All other officials are appointed. A councilman is not permitted to be interested in any of the contracts and franchises granted by the council. All religious and political tests as qualifications for office are forbidden.

Article X establishes a labor day of eight hours on all municipal work.

Article XI, dealing with franchises, is very important. No franchises for the use of the streets can be granted for a longer period than twenty-five years. The application for a franchise must be published. The city reserves the right to assume ownership of the property of the grantee. The franchise cannot be assigned without the consent of the city. All franchises must be approved by the people at a special election.

Articles XII, XIII, and XIV deal with direct legislation. The recall provision in all other charters combines the recall proper with the new election. The Modesto recall separates them, thereby preventing the confusion resulting from combining the issues. The recall petition must be signed by fifteen per cent. of voters at the last election. The call for the election must contain the reasons for the recall and the official's justification, neither exceeding two hundred words. Referendum and the initiative petitions must be signed by the same number of voters.

The schools are taken out of politics. No teacher can be discharged without good cause.

These are the main provisions of the charter. The people showed their interest in civic reform by adopting it by a vote of six to one. Put into effect the charter will give us efficiency and democracy.

LEON YANCKWICH

Modesto, Cal., December 3, 1910.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

Department No. 3.

ERNEST H. CLARK CARY,

Plaintiff,

vs.
All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof.

Defendants.

ERNEST J. MOTT,

Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Ernest H. Clark Cary, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the northwesterly line of Brannan Street, distant thereon eighty-four (84) feet and nine and seven-eighths (97 7/8) inches southwesterly from the southwesterly line of Zoe Street; running thence southwesterly along said line of Brannan Street sixty (60) feet and two and one-eighth (2 1/8) inches; thence at a right angle northwesterly eighty (80) feet; thence at a right angle northeasterly sixty (60) feet and two and one-eighth (2 1/8) inches; thence at a right angle southeasterly eighty (80) feet to the northwesterly line of Brannan Street and the point of commencement: being a part of One Hundred Vara Lot Number 162.

Together with the appurtenances of each and every part thereof.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple as absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be met in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 28th day of October, A. D. 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By M. Kragen, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 11th day of November, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

City and County of San Francisco, a municipal corporation, whose address is San Francisco, California.

The German Savings and Loan Society, a corporation, whose address is Number 526 California Street, San Francisco, California.

Nov 11 1910

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of SARA JACOBS, deceased.
Notice is hereby given by the undersigned executor of the last will of Sara Jacobs, deceased, to the creditors of, and to all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers with 10 months after the first publication of this notice to the said executor at his office, Room 909 Kohl Building, Corner Montgomery and California Streets, San Francisco, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of Sara Jacobs, deceased.

LESTER H. JACOBS,

Executor of the last will of Sara Jacobs, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, November 18, 1910.

ISAAC FROHMAN, Attorney for the Executor.
11-18-61

TITLES RESTORED

TITLES RESTORED UNDER McENERNEY ACT, complete for $35.00. Burnt Records Title Co., 951-953 Monadnock Building, ninth floor. Market street, near Third.

JULIUS CALMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office,
30 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491

Residence,
1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4590

SAN FRANCISCO

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Establishment of Justice

There are in the world persons who do not wish to do right, but only to get all they can, giving for what they get as small a return as possible. There are in the world persons who mean to do right but who are swayed from right courses by passion, envy, pique or any one of a hundred temptations that beset the paths of men, and, finally, honest persons, persons who are not weak and who fully intend to do what is right, are nevertheless unable to come to an agreement as to what justice requires them to do.

For these and other reasons society early had to provide somehow for the establishment of justice between those who had fallen out. In early times it was the king, or some one acting in the name of the king, who heard the complaints and the answers and rendered summary decision from which there was no appeal. Rude and crude was the justice thus meted out and the king finally found it impossible to hear and determine, even in a crude way, all disputes that came to his knowledge and so appointed others to hear and determine in his place, although in his name, and so there came finally to be courts.

Under the feudal system every petty feudal chief held court, sometimes by his own right, sometimes in the name of the king, but not all men were fit to hold court and if they were not, and cared not to do it, they assigned the task to some one better qualified and there came to be judges. How all these courts were evolved makes an interesting history, but these lessons are not so much lessons in history as in how government, our own government, works in practice. It is sufficient for our present purpose to say that the establishment of justice is the highest function that human society undertakes to perform, and that that society which fails of establishing practical justice, equally and expeditiously, can lay small claim to civilization.

The constitution of California declares that: "The judicial power of the state shall be vested in the state senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, in a supreme court, district courts of appeal, superior courts, justices of the peace and such inferior courts as the legislature may establish in any incorporated city or town or city and county."

The inferior courts above referred to are such as recorder's courts in the smaller cities and police courts in the larger, such courts having powers and performing functions similar to those performed by justices of the peace, but they have mainly to do with enforcing city ordinances. If cities were given that measure of home rule that they should have they would constitute such inferior courts of their own as they feel are needed, and no more. As the law is such courts are established as interested persons can induce the legislature to establish, often greater in number than there is real need for, and a court out of business is more likely to promote litigation than to discourage it, and that is contrary to sound public policy.

Courts are divided into courts of record and courts not of record. A court of record is a court whose acts, decisions and proceedings are duly written out and verified as a perpetual testimony of what took place in such court. In California all our courts except those of the justices of the peace and the inferior special courts established in cities, are courts of record. Even those inferior courts keep records, but they lack the quality of being perpetual and are more for the convenience of the justice, recorder or police judge, to refresh his memory as to what took place, than as a history of judicial events that may be referred to a hundred years hence, perhaps, if there shall be occasion for it. The records of each justice of the peace are his personal property, but the records of a court of record are public property and must be cared for and preserved.

The proceedings in courts of record are therefore much more formal than in the inferior courts. The procedures which custom has devised and time has sanctioned come to have, in the courts of record, a very high obligation, so much so as to have caused most of the methods of transacting court business to be laid down in statutory form with the most intricate detail, so that if the court business is not done just as the codes of procedure prescribe cases are likely to be reversed on appeal and sent back for new trial "according to the rules of the game," as laymen are accustomed to speak of such procedures.

Herein lies one of the most potent hindrances to the establishment of justice. The manner of doing it too often comes to be judicially held to be much more important than the subject matter in dispute. The human mind is a queer instrument and all down the ages there have been technical judges, judges who were such sticklers for form as to sacrifice justice. That tendency is in human nature. It is one that Jesus of Nazareth complained of in his day and it has haunted the world ever since. The only remedy for it is to strive at election time to eliminate from the bench judges having technical minds of an exaggerated type. Order and system there must be in the conduct of trials in all courts, courts of record and not of record, but when the method comes to exceed in importance the issue itself it has gone quite too far and defeats justice more often than it establishes it.

Next week we shall begin at the foot of the judicial fabric and deal with the court of the Justice of the Peace.

Judge—You are privileged to challenge' any member of the jury now being impaneled. Prisoner—Well, then, yer honor, Oi'll foight the shmall mon wid wan eye, in the corner, theer ferninst yez.—Metropolitan.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE

A full line of Theosophical Literature from Point Loma, California, the headquarters of the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society, under the leadership of Katherine Tingley, is now on sale at A. M. Robertson's, 222 Stockton St., S. F., and at Smith Bros., 462 13th St., Oakland, California.

PUBLIC MEN USE

Allen's Press Clippings

to help them keep in touch with every publication in the State. Send your order to 88 First Street, S. F. IT PAYS TO KEEP POSTED.

Day School---Night School

Electrical, Mining, Civil
AND
Automobile Engineering

Architectural Drawing
Wireless and Morse Telegraphy

BOOKKEEPING : SHORTHAND

Our Graduates in Every Department Secure Good Positions

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
Invisible Bifocal Lenses
181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tels. Oakland 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

This Week: "A Public Service Commission Law"

By Percy V. Long

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY

DECEMBER 16 : '10
FIVE CENTS THE COPY

Vol. III Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH-GOOD COURAGE-GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six
Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, in Advance. No. 3.

An Equitable Division

SO FAR AS AVAILABLE INFORMATION warrants an opinion it would seem that in filling vacancies on the supreme bench President Taft has been entirely impartial as between contending factions, giving the progressives one member, the conservatives one, and elevating to the position of chief justice one who performed, in the Northern Securities case, one judicial act of signal conservatism, and one act of broad-minded liberalism in upholding the validity of the national income tax. In both instances Justice White's efforts were unavailing. How Taftian! A five to four bench assuredly! Which side gets the odd man? We shall know when the Standard Oil and American Tobacco cases are decided. The way the President parts his hair is significant.

A Tough Bunch

THE EXCUSE GIVEN for not appointing Charles E. Hughes Chief Justice of the United States is that he does not possess that tactfulness so necessary to the presiding justice of the most august court in the world. Are we to understand that our supreme bench is a tough bunch, contentious and hard to control, something similar to Lincoln's cabinet that only a Lincoln could manage? Justice Hughes could read the riot act to them, if nothing more, which also might prove salutary upon occasion.

What a Roar Was There!

DOES ANYONE REMEMBER what a roar was made when Franklin K. Lane was nominated to the Interstate Commerce Commission, how the patriots of California protested in high dudgeon? But Theodore stuck to his man, his nomination was confirmed and he has proven one of the very best members of that commission, so good a man that the whole country has been on tenterhooks through fear that he might be promoted to the commerce court. Probably there was little danger of it. He is not the type of man that the railroads would care to see so elevated. Franklin K. Lane has made good, but then he was not pushed upon the favorable attention of the President by the Federal Brigade of California! By the aid of a friend he slipped up the back stairs when the brigade was not looking.

No Logrolling With New Orleans

IT IS REPORTED FROM WASHINGTON that California may be able to eliminate New Orleans from competition for the Panama Pacific exposition if our people will help the Crescent City to hold onto her navy yard which Secretary Meyer has condemned as not being necessary to the nation's defense. Whether or not New Orleans should retain its navy yard is a question of strategy and engineering, and to settle it upon other issue would be an act of moral treason to which California should be no party. Whoever would make merchandise of the nation's defense is no better than the naval committee of the United States senate.

Now

IT WAS LEFT for the Springfield (Mass.) Republican to call public attention to the significance of the little word at the head of this paragraph in the President's recent message where he says, "The great body of those men who are responsible for our country's commercial development now have an earnest desire to obey the law." Are we to understand that this unwonted readiness to now obey comes from having been under conviction for sin or because of offices friendly to those interests exerted by Payne and Aldrich, Cannon and Hale, whereby laws designed for their control were made to their order? What meaneth this word "now?"

Which Prayers?

REVEREND JOSEPH TWITCHELL stated at the Twain memorial meeting lately held at Carnegie Hall, New York, that he had traveled much with Twain at home and abroad, that they usually slept in the same room and the same bed and, hundreds of times, had joined in saying their prayers together. If the reverend gentleman also joined with Mark Twain in those short, pithy, pungent prayers which it was his custom to utter unceasingly from rising in the morning to retiring at night with surpassing unction and zeal, he can lay as little claim to piety as the "minister from Hawaii" who once scandalized the guides in the Maine woods by the stories he told, in that they had never before heard such language come from the mouth of any minister.

Of Interest to the Antiquarian

LOS GATOS HAS A CHURCH and the church has a pastor in the person of Rev. Robert Whitaker whose parishioners have caught him in the act of doing some independent thinking, with the result that heresy charges have been preferred against him. Knowing nothing of the points at issue this paper merely observes that Los Gatos should be a most interesting place for antiquarian investigators to visit and that it must be a real pleasure to a competent phrenologist to fumble the cranial developments of the persons who have filed these charges. There are few trained, Protestant theological professors in this or any other Protestant country whom existing pre-Adamite communicants in small churches would tolerate in their pulpits, and yet if the results of the researches of these professors were taken frankly to the people half the infidelity of our time would dissipate like a mist before the sun.

Brandeis

AN INCOMPREHENSIBLE FELLOW that Louis D. Brandeis, as incomprehensible as Heney, for instance. For why should a great lawyer despise fortune, eschew the smart set, live in a flat furnished with twenty-year old wedding presents given by friends to set the young people up in housekeeping, when, by hearing the call of duty coming from the same direction that comes the big fee, he could become a millionaire as well as not, and live abroad half the time off the earnings of his industrious and poorly paid professional underlings; in short, be a gentleman among gentlemen? An incomprehensible man, but a man who is opening the way whereby other men, of great abilities and professional skill, may see the interests of the poor as ably supported at the bar of justice as the interests of the rich, the public interests as well protected as special interests. Honor to Brandeis! Such a splendid example of unselfish service cannot fail of inspiring many imitators.

With One Foot

THERE WERE THOSE WHO EXPECTED that, seeing themselves with a majority in the House of Representatives, the Democrats would forget the horrors of one-man-rule and insist on giving Champ Clark, as Speaker, the same power to appoint committees that Cannon has had, but recent events assure us to the contrary. Committees in the next congress will be constituted by a committee, but those who looked for Democrats to move forward a peg on the tariff issue and stand for "all the protection that is needed without a dollar for monopoly," will be disappointed. The Democrats are harking back to the tomb of "tariff for revenue only." They are progressing with but one foot, not both, and so will quickly lose all they have gained.

The Arizona Idea

Whatever we may think of the prudence of the makers of the constitution for Arizona we must admire their intrepidity in making the judiciary subject to the recall provisions of their organic law. The bench is horrified at it, the bar murmurs because of it, and the President stands aghast that any common-wealth could dream of such an innovation.

But wherefore?

The concept of a truly independent judiciary has, in practice, proven an iridescent dream. The bench is as certainly, if not quite as much, influenced by the power that puts its members on the bench as honorable senators are influenced by the power that makes them senators. A judge may, for conscience's sake, stand out against the power that made him a judge, but so may a senator and, whether judge or senator, each instinctively knows that the day of reckoning will come.

Our judges are scarcely less in politics than are our senators, and in partisan politics at that. The supreme bench of California is impaired by the presence on it of a man notoriously known to be a principal lieutenant of the head of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, a man who has exerted a potent influence in determining to whom judicial honors shall be open and to whom they shall not. The supreme bench is also unadorned by one who has made petty politics his diversion, if not his occupation, throughout his career and it was by that ladder that he climbed to his present high station. The memory of the really great Justice Stephen J. Field was rendered execrable on this coast as much because of his injurious political activities as because of his decision that the Southern Pacific Company is a negro and therefore deserving of the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment.

This paper is not much impressed with the recall provisions in the new charters and constitutions that are being adopted. It is fearful of the injudicious indulgence in popular waves of feeling that sometimes sweep over a community carrying the people off their feet. It prefers government by the sober second thought of the citizenry, that ripper judgment that comes of having cooled off, but so long as our benches are mainly filled with politicians, why should not the recall apply to them as certainly as to their political confederates, the sheriffs, legislators, mayors, commissioners, or what not?

The reconstitution of the supreme court of the United States is not of less partisan concern than the reconstitution of the United States senate and House of Representatives. Will the reconstructed bench prove progressive or conservative? Will it be radical or reactionary? Will its members line up on the side of human rights or rights of property to the infliction of human wrongs? These questions are being asked by all thoughtful citizens all over the nation and the answer will be awaited with profound concern. "Whose man is he?" is just as much an issue with reference to judges as with reference to legislators or commissioners, and proprietorship is as frequently determined by type of mind as title deed.

A contemporary declares with piousunction that, "The judiciary is the bulwark of personal and property rights." It is the bulwark of property rights, of huge and dominating financial interests which have the power to designate who shall be judges, but rarely of those human rights that place mankind above property, the body above the raiment, the soul above the body.

In testimony whereof may be cited the decision of that federal judge in North Carolina who interposed the corpse of state rights between the majesty of justice and white slave traffickers dealing in the bodies of young fe-

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage. Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application. Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

male immigrants enticed over from Europe; or that Mississippi judge who held with the obnoxious Grosscup that the number of offenses committed by the Standard Oil Company against the interstate commerce law was not to be determined by the number of orders filled and shipments made in contravention of that law, but by the number of settlements, although the corporation might, under that construction, do an unlawful business every day for a year and yet be subject to a single fine; or that court of Pennsylvania that found no harm in a combination of the anthracite railroads to keep up the price of coal to the millions of consumers along the Atlantic seaboard.

Some effective way is needed for making public officials answerable to The People—the source of all law. Perhaps the recall may serve for the want of a better, but so long as government is by a plutocratic oligarchy, instead of by The People, not even the recall will be very effective to that end. The point sought to be made is this: That in very truth, however repugnant to theory, there is no reason having its root in human experience, why the recall should apply to other officials and not to judicial officers. They feed on the same meat and get to their positions by the same road of advancement, and if there be no other difference what's the difference?

For the Peace of the World

The setting aside by Andrew Carnegie of $10,000,000, the interest from which is to be used for fostering the peace of the world, tends to reconcile one to the existence of fortunes amounting to $10,000,000, although the world could and should, and probably will, attain permanent peace by other and better methods.

It is not clear just what the twenty-five persons selected to be trustees of the fund will be able to do with it. There is little need of educating the public mind in favor of international peace, except that public sentiment may force its will upon a reluctant class, chiefly engaged in manufacturing and selling munitions of war, and so overcome that source of international friction, but half a million a year, scattered over Europe and America, will hardly accomplish so much as that. Perhaps it were better to expend the whole ten millions in the next ten years, or in five, making a hurrah campaign for international tranquility. Good will come of this benefaction, but we must not look to it to solve the problem.

The Socialists are likely, in their pestiferous ways, to accomplish much more for international peace than the Carnegie fortune could accomplish were it all devoted to that one end. Their comradeship transcends international boundaries and involves in one brotherhood men of all the nations of Europe who can scarcely be hired, coaxed or forced to fight each other.

Those international brotherhoods of men who gain their livings by their hands are, next to the Socialists, the most effective force now working for the peace of the world, unless we hold that the Asiatic is not of this world. Millions of men can do much more than millions of money.

The greatest obstacle in the way of universal peace is the ancient fraternity of war-tax eaters. There is no important agency that can be put to use for the dissemination of war scares, and false fears for war, that they do not corrupt and subsidize. There is not a peg upon which can be hung a rumor of impending war between Great Britain and Germany, the United States and Japan, that is not made the most of to incite those very suspicions and fears of war which are most likely to produce war. If those rumors could be run down scarcely one of them would be found that did not emanate from some beneficiary of the war fund, some person or corporation that must profit by war but which by no means could be induced to go out upon the firing line. Pressing private business would unavoidably detain them at home.

Perhaps no better service can be performed by this committee than to run to earth and expose the source of those rumors, giving true news in place of false news that the people of no country need be deceived. The shadow of impending conflict hovering over Great Britain and Germany blights Europe like an evil eye, and there are many reasons for believing that it is wholly generated by industrious press bureaus financed by shipbuilders and gun manufacturers. Suffer this benefaction to be devoted to dispelling the menacing war clouds that overhang Britain and Germany, the United States and Japan, and as great good may be hoped for from it as is to be hoped for from any use that can be made of that particular conscience fund.

After the Loan Sharks

It is good news that Senator Stetson of Alameda is preparing a measure to limit the atrocities of the loan sharks that take extreme advantage of those whom extreme necessity brings to their counter. All over the world "Uncle Isaac" has his place, and his function is one necessary to be performed. In some cities, during hard times, the homes are fairly stripped of everything portable to be retrieved when times get better, but minus a defalcation, for it is nothing less, for the service performed, that would bankrupt anyone who was not bankrupt already. Ten, twelve, fifteen per cent. a month is a devourer whose appetite increases in proportion to what he consumes, but so far legislation has had hardly any other effect than to make it the more difficult for the very needy to secure any help at all at any price. The best palliative yet found is to establish loan offices through either private or public philanthropy where such rates are charged as are reasonable and yet profitable. However, all good people will wish all possible good fortune to attend Senator Stetson in his laudable endeavor.

Fresno's Relapse

There is that in the I. W. W. that is dangerous if corked. With the stopple out so that it may freely effervesce it is only disagreeable and, at the worst, exasperating. The law of "birds of a feather" has differentiated this organization from other labor organizations and has drawn to it the militant enthusiasts that were formerly in the amen corner of other labor organizations. It was a good riddance for unionism when the men took their departure. Being goaded, they may easily become criminals. Being set upon and mistreated, they may be made into martyrs and call to their aid men of high character and broad sympathy. Being denied justice, they may easily resort to the use of matches and petroleum if not to the infernal machine and dynamite. The one remedy that can be applied to them with any hope of a cure is justice, such patient, fair treatment as will leave in their hearts no sense of malice. Bid them say what they please to anyone who cares to listen, but beware what they do. The men of Fresno who assaulted them and burned their camp resorted to those elemental resources of raiding their enemies which befitted a tribal relation. They lost their heads. Fortunate Fresno if it lose not more as a consequence of that aboriginal act!

Kicked Up Stairs

At New York, some weeks ago, Chairman Knapp of the interstate commerce commission addressed an assemblage of railroad supply men and, in advance of the hearings and findings of the commission, virtually committed himself to the increase in freight rates for which the railroads are contending. That very night blood spots were observable on the face of the moon. His associates on the commission protested that he should get off it. He is off it. The President has given him the long term on the bench of the new court of commerce to which must go all appeals from the decisions of the interstate commerce commission, where he can be of greater service to the railroad interests than where he was on the interstate commerce commission. He has been kicked up stairs when he deserved to be kicked down and out.

Ought He To Have Done It?

On his recent visit to Richmond, President Taft, in open carriage, was driven by the bronze statue, in heroic mold, of Jefferson Davis, and as he passed under its shadow he saluted it by uncovering in its presence, whereat the Richmond assemblage was overjoyed. Did he do right? The issue is not easy. In rendering judgment sentiment is not unlikely to sway the best of us from a due course. We may, and should, forgive those leading spirits who took up arms against their country's flag and precipitated the greatest and most bitterly contested civil war in all human history. Their retribution was terrible, but unless human standards of right and wrong are to be abandoned as not to be depended upon the precipitation of that war was the monumental crime of the nineteenth century and Jefferson Davis was one of the greatest and most persistent among the precipitants. To forgive is a duty, to love is a pleasure, to forbear from all that can open old wounds is a patriotic obligation, but not while the world stands should the right and wrong of an issue that cost so much in blood and treasure be permitted to become obscured. The dead in half a million graves cry out against the impiety of such an act. The Virginians love Davis and we love the Virginians, but it does not follow that we also must love Davis or do honor to his memory. Without injustice to those who died that the nation might live we cannot.

James N. Gillett

A number of his admirers have arranged to tender a banquet to retiring Governor James N. Gillett. To be sure, the enterprise emanates from those who are aboard the same political toboggan with himself, but, prompted by the spirit of good fellowship, not a few others will attend from motives of sheer magnanimity.

A proper study of the subject of this article requires that he be viewed as man, as governor and as politician. History, if it concern itself with him at all, will so view him.

As man he is up-standing, courageous, money-honest; rough and ill disciplined, but not unkindly; able to give and take hard blows; not a student, not reflective, inclined to act first and consider it afterward and, unless swayed by passion, very much preferring to do a good deed rather than a bad one. We know no reason why, as private citizen, anyone would not willingly overlook the foibles of James N. Gillett and rank him a royal good fellow, a typical American who has hewn his way through life by force of will and manly courage.

As governors come and go James N. Gillett has not made a bad governor. The machinery of government has not run with more of friction or less of efficiency than in the cases of many of his predecessors. He disturbed in their official positions relatively few who were really expert in their work. While his appointments have not been made with eye as single to the good of the service as in the case of Governor Pardee, they have been more promptly made. He has not procrastinated. Indecision is not one of his faults. Rather is he chargeable with deciding off-hand, wholly without deliberation, and, afterward, reconsidering his determination and deciding the other way. That is temperamental and characteristic of his gubernatorial career. He is, as we have said, money-honest and he has given California as monetarily-honest an administration as was possible with the men he had to work with.

The political phase of the career of James N. Gillett is the one that will fix his place in the history of California and not all the perfumes of Araby can make that career smell sweet. Starting out with a laudable ambition, and with loyalty to the public interests as it was given him to understand those interests, he made an honorable record in the state senate and, on the strength of that record, was sent to the congress of the United States where, at this distance, his record appeared to be unobjectionable at the worst, if not positively good.

But during his congressional career he learned that political advancement in California lay along the lines of subservency to the Republican "organization" and that the Republican party "organization" was the private property of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. He was ambitious. The devil, taking for the occasion the form of the late E. H. Harriman, took him up in a high place and showed him all California and, metaphorically, said to him: "If you will conserve our special interest and be dutiful and obedient to our desires we will make you governor." "It looks good to me," Gillett said, and it was so.

Then followed the Santa Cruz convention, the infamy of which not a co-conspirator of them will ever live down, the stentorian bawling of George A. Knight up and down the length and breadth of the state that "Jim Gillett is no man's man," and his election by something like 60,000 less than a majority of the votes cast.

There is this to be said for the native integrity of Mr. Gillett's character, he "stayed bought." Not once in his gubernatorial career has he disobeyed the power that made him governor, and the humiliating spectacle of so strong a man's subservency aroused the populace to an indignation that would content itself with nothing short of the destruction, both root and branch, of the system of government by and for special interest.

And is it to be supposed that a banquet more or less will disinfect that attainer! Not one among those co-conspirators will survive to live that deep damnation down. He emptied the gubernatorial office of all the honor it had contained.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

A ball and chain securely locked to the ankle, and the key lost, is a serious impediment to locomotion, although it is possible, by picking up the ball and carrying it, to make considerable headway. The Oregon boot was a finality. No man who had one of those clasped about his ankle ever got far from where he then was until relieved of that burden.

However, these obstructions to getting on in the world were applied by authority of law for the reason that he who had thus to be restrained of his liberty had been found unworthy of it; but what shall we say of the folly of one who handicaps his own progress by locking about his own ankle a ball-and-chain or Oregon boot?

The brain is as necessary to getting on as are the legs and feet. Indeed there are diseases of the brain that make the feet useless. It is somewhere in that wonderful cavity of the cranium that we live, from it that we move and by it we have our being. There is a great deal that is not yet known about the brain, what gives to one power of mind leading unto greatness and to another imbecility that leads unto folly and destruction. Neither dissection nor the microscope discloses and essential difference and yet the difference is spanned by the distance between Shakespeare and the town fool.

The nerve element is as mysterious as the element of which the brain is formed. The microscope has little to tell of it, and yet one person is iron nerved and the nerve element of another is as unstable as gelatin. Every joggle sets it of a quiver. The ball of the eye is not more susceptible to injury than brain and nerve. The slightest lesion in either case may easily be the equivalent of ball-and-chain or Oregon boot as a hindrance to getting on in the world, to doing one's life work. How careful, then, should each of us be lest harm come to brain or nerve, either in our own case or in the cases of those whom destiny or circumstance has put in our custody?

But how commonly do we see a young man, just fitting himself for that service in life where excuses for failure, however good or bad, are never the equivalent for having made good—how often do we see such an one going about contentedly sucking a short stemmed pipe! It is the mental equivalent to the physical impediment of the ball-and-chain and, if stuck to constantly and sucked hard, it can be made the equivalent of the Oregon boot. Ralph Waldo Emerson used to liken it to a crowbar with which to pry among those wonderful brain convolutions whose texture is so delicate and ramifications of nerve fibres and blood vessels so intricate as to defy dissection and baffle computation.

There are scientists who defend the moderate use of alcoholic beverages, claiming that the consolation afforded may overbalance the injury, but not a scientific investigator in the world denies the injury or will question the fact that the presence of even the smallest quantity of alcohol in the blood blunts the mind, clouds perception, impairs the understanding, reduces the efficiency. It may be true enough that one person, steeped in alcohol and saturated with nicotine like a ham cured with salt and smoke, may perform services more efficiently than another not so handicapped. If the purpose of the social order were to so overload the capable as to make a race with a slower but lighter loaded person interesting, it might be different, but society has no such purpose. It demands of each one the best there is in him and imposes no handicaps. Why, then, at a stage in the world's history when the rivalries of life are keener than ever before, should any sane person shackle his own powers, chain his intellectual aptitude or bolt around the ankle of his own opportunity an Oregon boot? Cigarette stained fingers afford so conclusive evidence of the existence of such a fool that the Santa Fe railroad will take into its employ no more young men with fingers so stained.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

How Woman Suffrage Works in New Zealand

Lady Stout, wife of the chief justice of New Zealand, recently had published in an English magazine an article dealing with the effect of the votes of women in New Zealand. Some of her assertions are of interest in any state which, like California, is not unlikely to give women the right to vote in a not distant day. Lady Stout assures us that the proportion of women to men voting is as 79 to 80. That is, the women practically take as much interest in voting as do the men. Moreover, she asserts that "the statement that women do not exercise the franchise is only applicable to that class who spend their time in amusement." She admits that there are few women office-holders, and adds, "We seem to be able to get what we want by our vote." Since women began to vote, women in prisons, jails and hospitals have been safeguarded as never before, and the welfare of children receives a new consideration. With all the rest, Lady Stout says that, "instead of becoming addicted to masculine habits as a result of suffrage, New Zealand women have developed a much higher standard of womanhood and the duties and obligations of motherhood." Which should be vastly consoling to the good men who have gravely feared that the mere act of voting would convert woman into a cross between a man and the unguessable What-is-it. On the whole Lady Stout's report is both reassuring and—what might have been expected.

Effect of Use of Tobacco

If a young man, or boy, desires only to cultivate himself physically he may use tobacco, for it will not injure him in that respect. If, on the contrary, he desires to cultivate his mind he should not use it, for it will injure him mentally. Such are the conclusions at which Dr. George L. Meylan, head of the Columbia university gymnasium, has arrived after making a test which must be admitted to be fairly thorough. He examined 223 students, 115 of whom were smokers. As the result of his investigation, he determined that the smokers averaged slightly better physically than did the non-smokers, although he attributes this difference to chance rather than to the smoking habit. On the contrary, the non-smokers averaged noticeably better mentally than did the smokers, and as this is a condition generally found to exist, he thinks the inferiority is due to smoking. He sums up his conclusions as follows: "All scientists are agreed that the use of tobacco by adolescents is injurious; parents, teachers and physicians should strive earnestly against its use. There is no scientific evidence that the moderate use of tobacco by healthy, mature men produces any beneficial or injurious physical effects that can be measured. There is an abundance of evidence that tobacco produces injurious effects on certain individuals suffering from various affections, persons with an idiosyncrasy against tobacco and all persons who use it excessively. It has been shown that the use of tobacco by college students is closely associated with idleness, lack of ambition and application and low scholarship." These are Dr. Meylan's ultimate conclusions, but it is to be doubted whether any young man anywhere will refrain from smoking on account of them. Why should he? The use of the weed, it appears, may not injure the body, and mental development is a matter that a large number of us overlook.

The First Aeroplane Union Recognized

For the first time in history an agreement has been made and entered into between the manufacturers of ships to fly in the air, on the one hand, and the men who construct such ships on the other. The agreement is signed by representatives of the Aerial Navigation Company of America and by those of the International Association of Machinists. The minimum wage agreed upon for a nine-hour day, is 42½ cents an hour, with pay and a half for overtime, which, as it allows $3.82 a day to the poorest of the workers, will be recognized as fair compensation. Yet it certainly will not be considered excessive when it is understood that, by the terms of the agreement, an apprentice must prepare himself by four years service at the trade before he will be recognized as a properly instructed mechanic. And so another trade has been added to the multitude of them, a trade which would have been undreamed of a decade ago. All of which undoubtedly suggests again that the world really "do move."

What They Want to Know in Germany

The German census, which now is being taken, and which is expected to show a population of 65,000,000 for the Kaiser's realm, is particularly interesting because of the little, intimate, personal facts the census officials desire to know concerning the lives of citizens. To illustrate the idea, here are some of the questions the census blanks contain:

"Were your babies nursed on their mother's breast, or by wet nurses, or from the bottle?"

"Are you subject to epileptic fits?"

"How many of your house windows look out on the street?"

"What are the names of the various rooms in your dwelling?" (Apparently no provision is made for people who neither name nor christen their rooms.)

"What is the religion of your servants?"

"How many bath rooms have you?"

"Do you cook with gas or other fuel?"

"What rent do you pay?"

What a social, friendly interest is displayed in such questions! And yet they seem to fall short. For instance, just as the officials are interested in the hired girl's religion, so should they be desirous of knowing her parents' theological status. And why should interest be confined to epileptic fits? Is not appendicitis, for example, just as fascinating? There are so many other questions which, in their answers, would entertain the neighbors that it is impossible to avoid a suspicion that the Kaiser's paternal government either has gone too far or not far enough.

The Hobble Skirt Gets Busy

It was at Eli, Nebraska, that the hobble skirt made what probably is its best record to date. The skirt was worn by a Mrs. Brayton, and she was happy in the thought that it was the first one introduced into Eli. She wore it to a dance in order to properly display it, and all went merry as a marriage bell until, in dancing, she attempted to make a turn too hastily and got into a controversy with the hobble which resulted in laying her upon the floor. Her partner lost no time in falling over her, and thereafter every couple that came along fell over all who had fallen before them. The result was a sadly mixed pile of struggling humanity, one broken leg, one broken ankle, and cuts, scratches and bruises innumerable. Since then the physicians of the town have been quite busy, but it is gratifying to be able to report that the hobble skirt was uninjured; others who were there are moaning and groaning, but it merely awaits new worlds to conquer.

American Dollars in England

When the British Unionists protested against the use of American dollars to advance the Liberal cause, contending that it should be beneath English dignity to look to American coin for assistance, the Liberal papers came back at them with a hilarious ha ha combined with a reference to recognized facts. They published such tables as the following: The Duke of Marlborough married $10,000,000 and Miss Consuelo Vanderbilt; the eighth (late) Duke of Marlborough married $3,000,000 and Mrs. Lillian Hammerslev; the Duke of Roxburghe $10,000,000 and Miss May Goelet; the Duke of Manchester, $2,000,000 and Miss Zim-mern; eighth (late) Duke of Manchester $1,000,000 and Miss Consuelo Yznaga; Earl of Craven, $1,000,000 and Miss Bradley Martin; Earl of Strafford, $1,000,000 and Mrs. Cora Colgate; Earl of Donoughmore, $500,000 and Miss Grace of New York; Lord Curzon, $5,000,000 and Miss Mary Leiter. All of the brides were American women, and all of the millions were American millions. More such facts have been presented by the Liberal papers, but the foregoing are enough to make that protest against the importation of American money sound like a voice from the tombs, or perhaps one should say, like a voice from the bridal chamber. Probably it is unnecessary to add that the Unionists showed a disposition to drop the subject.

The Latest Device for Killing

The latest thing in the way of a projectile is a rifle bullet which might be described as a small bomb, inasmuch as it explodes when it is shot against any object. If it proves to be as successful in operation as is anticipated, it is expected that it will be highly destructive to airships of all kinds, so destructive, indeed, that if not ruled out of the war game by the Geneva convention it is thought not improbable that it will render the employment of airships in war impossible.

The hostess at a tea once said to a beautiful sad-eyed woman: "Are you fond of sports, Mrs. Blank?" Mrs. Blank smiled. Her sad eyes twinkled a moment. Then she sighed and answered: "Well, I suppose I ought to be; I married one."—Washington Star.

Stellman's

Vanished Ruin Era

San Francisco's Classic
Artistry of Ruin

$2.50

One of the beautiful art gift books of the year—the one art gift book of intense local interest. Wonderful pictures of that ephemeral modern Acropolis, which the Fire God created, and of the new city which man's courage and energy rebuilt. A gift book de luxe, generously made and proportioned, bound in strong boards, inclosed in a box and finished throughout in a style both elegant and unique. Price $2.50, by mail $2.78.

This work and other books, booklets, cards and calendars are described in our illustrated catalogue entitled "PLEASE ANT PAGES," which will be gladly supplied without charge upon request.

A complete stock of gift books of all varieties, fiction, sets, Standard and antiquarian works and fine bindings is displayed in our BOOK ROOMS.

PAUL ELDER & CO.

Books and Art

239 Grant Ave.,

San Francisco

The California Weekly

IS PRINTED BY

Donaldson & Moir

PRINTERS

330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

"CELEBRATED CRIMINAL CASES"

"Celebrated Criminal Cases of America" is the title of a recently published book of which Captain Duke of the San Francisco police department is the author. The volume, which contains 657 pages, doubtless is the most complete history of notorious crimes committed in this country that has been published. Its matter is presented concisely, lucidly, entertainingly, and one of its best features is that it leaves to the morbid reader no opportunity to enroll himself in the list of those abnormals who render their hero-worship to monstrous criminals. As Captain Duke depicts it, crime is crime, and is not admirable, nor is it possible for the reader to carry from his book any impression that it is.

The volume, which is extensively illustrated by pictures of detectives, criminals, etc., is divided into three natural divisions, as follows:

First—Celebrated criminal cases of San Francisco;

Second—Celebrated Pacific Coast cases;

Third—Celebrated eastern cases.

In the first division, which follows a brief history of the San Francisco police department, are included the story of the Vigilantes, of the duel between Judge Terry and Senator Broderick, the Denis Kearney riots, the record of such early bandits as Joaquin Murieta and Tiburcio Vasquez, and the concise details of every noted crime which has written its portion of dishonor in San Francisco's story.

The second division gives the details of all notable crimes committed up or down the Pacific Coast, and in the third are included the histories of the James and Younger brothers, the story of presidential assassinations and a host of other tales of crime.

Straight to the mark goes Captain Duke's narrative. There is absolutely no attempt at histrionic effect, and a most laudable feature of the book—it has been said, but it deserves emphasis—is that it is so written that it cannot possibly leave any taste for crime on the palate of the reader. Concerning the book, Mr. William Pinkerton, the celebrated detective, says:

"I want to congratulate you on the complete and concise manner in which you have gotten this book up and for the accuracy of the enormous amount of data it contains. It is an extremely interesting encyclopedia of facts."

And Madison Bentley, professor of psychology, Cornell university, expresses the following opinion of the book:

"The author has been at great pains to collect and arrange a mass of material which is of intense interest to the criminologist and psychologist as well. I shall be glad to recommend this work."

To the foregoing let us add that the ordinary reader undoubtedly will be as deeply interested in the book as will be the more recondite criminologist and psychologist.

(The James H. Barry Co., San Francisco, $3.)

"I RULE THE HOUSE"

Among the recent offerings for the holiday trade—or, for that matter, for any other trade—few will be found more dainty or desirable than Edmund Vance Cooke's latest volume of poems, and the author's many admirers will give it a cordial welcome, for the readers of "Impertinent Poems," "Chronicles of the Little Tot," and other similar books are not likely to overlook their author.

"The name of the little volume, 'I Rule the House,' is suggestive of the character of its verse, for what one of us does not know who it is that rules the house? Who is it who does not know that the family despot who will be obeyed is he (or she) who nods and chuckles and issues orders from that high chair of which Mr. Cooke writes:

"Of all the chairs of church or state,
Bench, woosack, throne, or what you will,
'Tis written in the book of fate
The high-chair is the highest still."

Very delightful and decidedly clever is the child-verse in this little book, as, coming from Mr. Cooke's pen, it was certain to be. From its rich variety of daintiness it is difficult to choose, for while one reader would be pleased by the quaint humor of some poem, another would find greater satisfaction in some verse revealing the more tender secrets of childhood. On the one hand, read how:

"The coppersmith man said a wicked word,
When he hit his thumb that day,
En I know what it was, because I heard,
En it's somethin' I dassent say."

From such a touch of humor turn to this from "The Baby Who Never Cried":

"Little lamp quenched in the lighting,
Little bud blighted in bloom,
Little star lost in the sighting,
Little thread snapped in the loom,
Little ship wrecked in the launch into life,
Sunk ere you started to sail,
Knowing no whit of the calm or the strife,
Unhailing and hearing no hail,
Passed, and so swift was your fleeting
There came not the sound of a sigh,
Neither a token of greeting,
Nor a symbol of sad good-by."

So Mr. Cooke's verse runs the gamut from tears to laughter, but with far more of smiles than of sighs. The volume is so bound and decorated as to be worthy of its contents—an unusually dainty gift, whether for the holidays or some other season.

(Dodge Publishing Co., New York.)

SOME HOLIDAY BOOKS

"The Potato Child," by Mrs. Charles J. Woodbury, is one of the most appealing stories about children we have ever read. Little Elsie, boarded out to the cold but just Miss Amanda, starves for the love she does not receive and finds an outlet for her emotion in endearments lavished upon a doll made of a potato. The miracle wrought in her life and in that of Miss Amanda, on Christmas, she ascribes with true childish naivete to the "good one sweet, loving, contented potato-child can do in a house." The author of this winning story, by the way, is a resident of Berkeley. (Price, 35 cents, net.)

"Love and Friendship," by Lillyan Shaffner, is one of those small books that make companions of themselves for a long time because of their compact epigrams. Every time it is re-read a new angle of truth or suggestion shows up what was not seen before. A few samples, picked at random, may whet the appetite for the full course:

"The One who made hearts,—only He can unite them."

"Years make the man; love the woman."

"Love was created so that man might understand women; friendship, so that man might understand man."

"Man's best friend is supposed to be a dog—dogs never talk back."

The little volume is bound in wine colored cover-paper, a very attractive style. (Price, 35 cents, net.)

"Sonnets from the Portuguese, with Lyric Interludes," is a limited edition of this classic sonnet cycle, arranged as Robert Browning liked to read them, with the interspersing of lyrics in the same personal key but in different meters. The edition is an exquisite piece of art, set in Caslon italic old-style type, with marginal decorations, and bound in Ancona boards. This is one of the happiest experiments in gift books we have seen. (Price, $1.75, net.)

All the books reviewed above are published by Paul Elder & Co. of San Francisco.

Rehearsals have begun for "The Boss," the new play by Edward Sheldon, author of "Salvation Nell" and "The Nigger," in which Holbrook Blinn will be presented by William A. Brady.

"UNCLE REMUS'S" SECRET

Not only did "Uncle Remus" have his enthusiasms, but he had a little literary secret of his own, which he died believing that no one had discovered; and out of which he managed to get a great deal of mild amusement, says the New York Times.

When the magazine which he had founded came to consider the inauguration of a book-review department, it was discovered that there were very few people who could write just the sort of book reviews the editor cared for. His assistants presented a dozen or more aspiring candidates, but only one or two turned out the sort of work Mr. Harris wanted. Finally he came into the office one day with a rather triumphant air and announced that he had discovered a book reviewer who almost suited him.

She was an old maid, he said, a woman of nearly sixty; and she lived in London. He had known her in Georgia before and during the war, and had always wondered why it was that she had never written anything. And he had lost track of her, only to resume an interrupted correspondence a year or two before. She had agreed to do book reviews and forward the copy from London. Her name was Anne MacFarland, and she had a rather sour temper, and he preferred to edit her copy himself.

The office force noticed that Mr. Harris had always copied off Miss MacFarland's reviews on his own typewriter before sending them or bringing them to the office; and they also noticed in the first installment that she had a style very like that of Mr. Harris himself. When the managing editor ran across the word "pestered" in Miss MacFarland's "copy" he began to suspect that she was Mr. Harris himself.

But he did not tell "Uncle Remus." He waited for further and more conclusive evidence; and finally he got it, but even then he did not unmask the villain. He merely formed the habit, as did the rest of the staff, of sneering at Miss MacFarland's literary views in Uncle Remus's hearing, just to see how he would take it. He took it with a chuckle and a chew of tobacco to hide the chuckle, as a rule; but he would be finally driven to a mild defense.

"Well, she's an old woman," he would say, "and she's soured a little on the world. These old women get a little caustic you know. But I think she can write. Of course her style doesn't have the go to it that you young fellows like. I've read better stuff, and I've read worse stuff. She's not one of these rapid-fire performers you young fellows admire—but maybe she knows what she's talking about, after all, just as well as they do."

We never admitted to like Anne MacFarland's style, and continued to stick up our collective noses at her work. "Well, you know, she's just an old fogey—just an old fogey like me," he would say with a chuckle; "you can't expect her to please real literary critics like you young fellows." And with this shot he would go out chuckling.

Gradually Anne MacFarland assumed a more and more tangible form in Mr. Harris's imagination. She became the heroine of a whole serial story which he built up around her. She was a "buxom lass" when he last saw her, he said, and sighed sentimentally. Finally we accused him of an early romance with her; and he denied it in such a way as to show that the idea pleased him, and that he would not care if we believed it. And bit by bit we got the story of Anne's life and adventures out of him. He did it all so naturally and so casually that in spite of our positive knowledge that Anne never existed, there were times when we believed in her.

We planned a denouement for the little comedy; but it never worked out. Mr. Harris fell ill and the Anne MacFarland copy stopped coming in. She was the last character he created.

THE CATHOLIC HUMANE ASSOCIATION

ITS BENEFICENT WORK FOR CHILDREN AND WOMEN

The Catholic Settlement and Humane Association has been in existence for only three years, but in that time it has been an instrument of incalculable service to 1,600 children and of very great service in another way to another 500 children and to sixty or more mothers. And in other ways, to be described in this article, it has been of much use to many young women. It is, altogether, one of the most significant and successful charities in San Francisco.

The association was founded in January, 1908, by the Rev. Hannigan of St. Mary's parish. At that time it was designed wholly as a work for the rescue of wayward, neglected, abandoned or orphan children. In spite of the existence of other charities of similar purpose, a large field of usefulness at once opened before the association. The method adopted by the association was one commended by the experience of the Associated Charities and other organizations, the method of "boarding out" the charges. By this method, instead of maintaining an institution for the care of the children, with all that such an institution implies of great expenditure, high maintenance charges, and the depressing "institutional" atmosphere about the child—at best a poor substitute for family life on even the worst terms—the child is placed with a reputable family in moderate circumstances, the family receiving a small monthly remuneration for caring for the child—enough to pay for its keep and a small profit besides.

The big mill of life rapidly ground out its grist of charges for the association. First came the wayward children, who had run the gauntlet of the Juvenile Court and by it been committed to the care of the association. To commit these children to an institution is useless, for they may not be kept there after they are fourteen, when they are turned adrift to learn again the lesson of the streets. But to place them in homes, under the watchful eye of sympathetic family heads, is to place them in the midst of hopeful and uplifting influences, where they may be kept while character forms and until a committee of businessmen belonging to the parish have found them work at which they may have the right sort of incentive to steady and honorable living.

The abandoned children are another class, and a problem of themselves. Most of these are foundling babes, offspring of illicit passions, whom the mothers wish at once to lose sight of as reminders of shame. Even where the maternal instinct has grown strong enough to make the mothers wish to keep their children, the influence of the mother's family is usually brought to bear to have them put out of sight. In dealing with such cases there is a compensating advantage for the charity workers, for such children are released absolutely from all claims by the parents, and may at once be placed out for permanent adoption. This was the method pursued by the association until the recent formation of a committee of the Native Daughters of the Golden West to handle such cases, since when the association has turned over all such cases to that committee.

Another class of abandoned children is that in whose cases the parents have separated and the mother has married again or has drifted into an immoral life, and who has, in consequence, left her children to the care of chance. These children are handled in much the same way as wayward and orphaned children.

The neglected children offer probably the most perplexing problem, because the parents are constantly interfering with their proper care. The fact that the parents retain some interest in the child prevents any effort toward adoption, and interferes with all other arrangements for its care. And yet some of the most remarkable successes of the association have come from such cases. For instance, one neglected child committed to its care by court order was the child of a young woman who was a confirmed dope fiend, the mother's mother, in turn, being also a dope fiend. But both mother and grandmother, when in their right mind, were devotedly attached to the child, completely wrapped up in it. The association workers so worked upon this mother love in the two women that they finally effected their release from the drug habit so completely that now not only has the child been restored to them but they have justified the association in boarding out with them several other of its charges. Other notable rescues from the abandoned life, especially in the cases of women addicted to drink, have been effected by this playing upon the mother love.

From child rescue work the association branched out into other fields of usefulness. Attention was turned to the girls who work in the factories. To try out the idea of the association's leader, arrangements were made with the management of the American Biscuit Company by which that company turned over to the association an unused portion of one floor of its factory on Battery street. Here, after hours, the male employes fitted up partition walls and made other necessary alterations to make a clubroom for the girls. The association supplied a piano and other accessories and the Swastika Club was formed. Here the girls eat their luncheons in cosy surroundings, and here, away from the untoward influences of the street, they spend the noon hour in social intercourse and the enjoyment of music. The association sends daily a pianist, who is at the call of the girls to play what they want to hear, whether accompaniments to songs or music for little impromptu dances. Several times a week a woman from the parish gives the girls little conversational talks on books. Once a week a trained nurse gives a lecture on personal hygiene and on the first aid to the injured and on the proper treatment for the minor injuries received in the routine of the factory work. Once a month an evening entertainment is held, where music, amateur theatricals and dancing are indulged in. And in the summer the home of a woman's order affiliated with St. Mary's parish is thrown open to the girls at San Mateo for two weeks, so that they can take their vacation in the country.

This club has been of enormous benefit and pleasure to the girls, and the superintendent of the factory, at a recent businessmen's banquet, strongly endorsed it for the moral effect upon the girls and for its practical usefulness to the management in the improvement of discipline and in the increased efficiency of the workers. Negotiations are now under way, looking toward an extension of this girls' club work to other industrial plants in the city.

Still another enterprise of the association concerns the children again, but as a preventive rather than as a curative function. In the districts where working people live, especially the Potrero and parts of the Mission, the problem of caring for the children after school hours is a serious one. Where both the father and mother work, children are left to run the streets from the closing of school at 3 o'clock until the parents come home at 6. Some of the evils of this freedom of the streets are simply appalling, some of them too disgusting to repeat. To combat these evils, the association has founded two settlements, one at 18th and Potrero, the other near Market and Guerrero. Five hundred children are enrolled at these settlements, where they are entertained at games and other amusements and taught such things as can be taught in a diverting way.

At one of the settlements there is also now in existence a mothers' club. At first the materials to be used for light sewing at its meetings were supplied by the association, but for the last several months the women, by the sale of garments made there, have paid all expenses of the maintenance of the club besides the expenses of numerous entertainments and of several outings. About sixty women now belong to this club, one woman coming all the way from Ingleside every Thursday to attend the weekly meeting.

Still another enterprise of the association is its free clinic, maintained at the headquarters at Oak and Webster streets. This clinic is held every Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, from 10 in the morning until 12:30. Two doctors and a trained nurse are always in attendance. Ten other doctors are at call, most of them specialists in various diseases, especially diseases of children. The "foster mothers," or women with whom association charges are boarded out, are required to bring their charges once a month to this clinic, and, in case a child is ill or affected by a chronic complaint, at least once a week and sometimes twice, as long as treatment is necessary. Probably no children of equal economic station in life have so good care as these charges of charity. Not only are they regularly examined by the doctors, but the trained nurse devotes every afternoon to a tour of inspection of the homes in which they are placed, so that each charge is visited on an average of once a week. There are now under the constant care of the association about 360 children.

TOLSTOY ANECDOTES

"Is it true," was one of Tolstoy's questions to an English visitor in talking about conditions in America, "that there are men in the United States with as much wealth as they say?"

The reply was in the affirmative and Tolstoy then asked: "What religion do these men profess?"

His visitor told him he believed they were all Christians. Tolstoy remained silent for a minute or two, then remarked:

"I think the social revolution will break out first in the United States."

Not long ago the following anecdote went the round of the Russian papers. Tolstoy, noticing a policeman taking a drunken man in a somewhat forcible manner to the police station, stopped him and asked:

"Can you read?"

"Yes," was the reply.

"And have you read the Gospel?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then you ought to know that we should not offend our neighbor."

The policeman looked the Count up and down, noticing his shabby appearance, and asked:

"Can you read?"

"Yes," said Tolstoy.

"And have you read the instructions to the police?"

"No."

"Very well, then; go and read them first and then come back and talk to me again."—New York Sun.

Those who recall Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" will remember that the peaceful spot where "the rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep" is identified with St. Giles's, Stoke Poges, Buckinghamshire. In the prosaic pages of last night's Gazette there appears an order in council providing that ordinary burials are henceforth forbidden in the churchyard.—London Standard.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

Christmas Eve in Babytown

On Christmas Eve in Babytown the bairnies all are glad
As out they sail for Sleepyland, in tiny nighties clad,
But ere they sail their voices shrill must die
to cheery hum,
For, oh, it is so hard to sleep when Santa
Claus may come!
If he should come and—just suppose the chimney were too small,
Or that a reindeer broke a leg—oh, thought that must appal!
But still the Restland breezes blow, the web of dreams to weave,
Till e'en the brightest eyes must close on blessed Christmas Eve.

On Christmas Eve all mystery is vibrant in the air,
For how can Santa drive his team and visit everywhere?
And little eyes are bright, so bright all other lights seem dim,
And little hearts are light, so light they're like a song to Him;
And we whose feet are journey-worn, whose days at times are sad,
Look on the bonnie babes and smile to know that they are glad,
And low we whisper: "Unto them the soul of childhood leave,
That they may never quite forget the joy of Christmas Eve."

On Christmas Eve—oh, heart of mine, why do you whisper me
Of bairns who know not Santa Claus nor e'er his Christmas see?
The babies of the tenements, the tiny ones whose ways
Lead on through paths devoid of cheer to trouble-haunted days—
Oh, heart of mine, why trouble me? I would be glad tonight
As Christmas Time comes down the world, to set its woes to flight;
And yet I pray: "Dear Santa Claus, forget not those who grieve,
But bring thy comfort first to them on blessed Christmas Eve."

Little Things, But—

You arose in the morning feeling very well,
thank you, and the world looked good to you,
but soon you fell over the cat, and you said,
"Blank that cat!" (although the word was not exactly "blank," either), and you then uttered burning words to your dear girl which caused a feeling of gloom to steal over her. A cat is a little thing, but—

After that last experience, you said that never, never, NEVER (the last word in the most awesome capitals) would you take another drink of the stuff that inebriates, but you met Brown, and he was feeling so convivial that he said, "What'll you take in yours?" and—well, one drink never hurt anybody, anyway, and when you went home that night you were a sort of an intermezzo between tragedy and farce-comedy, and Mabel felt dreadful. One drink is a little thing, but—

You know very well that Ethel is the best and finest girl in the world, but when she appeared in that new hobble skirt you expressed the unalterable conviction that it looked like thunder, and she said it was perfectly lovely, and bad led to worse, and before long she returned the ring to you, and it was almost four days before she would receive it back again, you having assured her in the meantime that you just doted on hobble skirts. A hobble skirt is a little thing (frequently too little),
but—

These are but a few instances selected from a large museum of them, but they suffice to indicate that it is the little things which knock us out in the first round. Really, the big things do not amount to much, for, generally speaking, they do not arrive, but we do well to keep an eye on the little things, for in the long run, and the short, it is they that succeed in making a hurly-burly of trouble of life.

* * *

The Opinions of Rufus

I don't say that no man ever done it, but I never happened to know a man that got rich by cultivatin' his better an' tenderer feelin's.
I've known men that was 'flicted with the microscope eye, the kind that sees little things easy 'nough but ain't wuth a whoop fer seem' big things.

Both in religion an' politics they's sech a thing es bein' so partisan a feller can't see the truth even if the Almighty goes out of His way to set it 'fore him.

It's said that praise is perfected out of the mouths of babes an' sucklin's, but I never was able to 'preciate sech praise 'bout 3 a. m.

They's sech a thing es havin' so many ideas that each one butts another out of the way
'fore it gits to be useful.

Josh Bings says one of the hardest things he knows of in this world is to git men to put money into plain righteousness without any promise of finanshul returns.

The diff'rence 'tween some politishuns and a slight of hand performer is that you usually suspect how the slight of hand performer does it.

I don't claim that there ain't men that always tell the truth, but that don't pervent me frum sympathizin' with the poor, lonely fellers.

I know a doctor that never gives an emetic.
He jest has his patient read the words of a popular song, an' that's enough.

They's jest two things I know of that make a speshulty of presentin' things all broken up.
They're a kaleidoscope an' life.

They's a hero in 'most every crowd, but unless something serious happens we never find it out, an' like es not we're talkin' with the coward an' he's talkin' with one.

If pretence of merit didn't go 'bout es far es the reel article some of our best-known clubs would go out of business.

I'm goin' to have more faith in our school system when I strike more high school an' university graduates that can read reel intelligently.

* * *

An Allegory of Pessimism

Once upon a time a Being who was capable of enjoying and of suffering was suddenly set down in a land that he knew not, where many mists hid the light of the Sun of Knowledge.

The Being knew not whence he came.

He knew not whither he was going, nor what should be attained when he had gone;
he knew only that soon he would be forgotten
after he had passed on.

He knew not the purpose of his passage through the strange land of darkness and mystery.

It was given to him to love, and he knew that those he loved soon must be engulfed and lost in the mists that surrounded him.

He had intelligence enough to appreciate in part the gloomy mystery that enwrapped him, but not enough to solve it.

Other Beings like unto himself ran to and fro about him and set up signboards which always read, "This is the only way to Truth," and the signboards pointed in many directions.

And he knew that those about him who thought least of the whence and whither of the journey were happiest, as the shellfish for whom the kettle awaits is the happiest in knowing it not, yet he could not entirely forget the mighty question that confronted him.

Is the foregoing a picture of hell and one of its unfortunates?

Not so, for the Being is Man, and the country in which he wanders is that of this Earthly Existence.

Pessimistic? Yes, and too much so.

But if the picture is untrue in a single color or shade, wherein does the error lie?

The Old, Old Love

"There is no love like the young, young love."—From an old song.

There is no love like the old, old love,
The love that the years but strengthen
As hand in hand down the vale we rove,
While the eastward shadows lengthen.
The wrinkles will come and the hair turn gray.

For Time will forget us never,
But he knows no art that shall make his prey
The love that endures forever.

The form may stoop, but the heart bows not,
And it knows no gyve or fetter
While whispers one who has blessed your lot,
"I love you each year better."
On tremulous lips we print a kiss
So true that the gods might cherish—
Ah, the love of youth, it may die of bliss,
But the tried love ne'er shall perish.

I sing no song to the young, young love,
But to her who has shared my losses,
Who urges me still to the heights above,
Though knowing the weight of crosses;
To her I sing, 'Tis a love grown gray
In fields of the world's endeavor,
But I thank the Giver of good away
For a love that endures forever.

Why the Good Partisan Went Below

The Wicked Man who had died and gone below was greatly surprised to find the Good Partisan warming his feet by a super-heated furnace.

"What! You here?" he cried. "I am surprised. I supposed that, of course, you went up stairs. How did it happen?"

"It happened because I chose that it should," the Good Partisan responded, with much dignity.

"Yes, but—would you be willing to tell me about it?"

"Certainly. I first went to the pearly gate, and I said to the gentleman in attendance
there, 'Is this Heaven?'"

"That's what it is," he responded. "Walk right in."

"Will you kindly tell me," said I, "just where I will find the Demopublicans after I get in?"

"The Demopubli—who?" says he.

"The Demopublicans," says I.

"Never heard of them," says he. "Are they good people?"

"You've been deceiving me," said I. "This is not Heaven." With that I turned and walked away, and, as this was the only other place I could find I came here. There are lots of members of my party here, and I feel perfectly at home."

Moral: If many Good Partisans do not make that sort of choice in the next world it will be because they have changed greatly,
for it is certain that they do here.

* * *

The Universal Hypocrite

The hypocrite, my thoughtful friend,

Is one who teaches what

The soul of him proclaims is true,

And yet doth live it not;

And, judging all men by this test,

To me 'tis clear, I trow,

The hypocrite is you, and I,

And all the skies below.

* * *

In the Latter-Day Style

"Did Augustus really propose to you?"

"Yes, he did."

"And did you reject him?"

"I certainly did."

"Oh, poor Augustus! What did he say then?"

"Very little, but he looked broken-hearted."

"Of course, but what did he say?"

"He said, 'Stung!'"

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Board of Control Mr. George H. Van Idea of Government Smith, in the Call of Sunday, with that forty-rows-of-apple-trees standard of nearness to the truth which characterizes so much of daily journalism, announced with flaring headlines that Mr. Clyde L. Seavey, assistant secretary of the State Board of Examiners, has in preparation a bill proposing to abolish local boards for the governing of institutions, except in relation to the state university and state prison. Mr. Seavey's measure contemplates nothing of the kind.

By the way this Clyde L. Seavey is one whom Mr. Johnson should retain where he is. Although a progressive Republican Mr. Gillett retained him because he had made himself indispensable to the auditing work of that office. Nothing can make him stand for the thing that is not right and his brain is so clear that he discerns the right from the wrong unerringly. If his board overrules him, as it sometimes does, he takes his medicine, but he always stands up until he is thrown down by superior authority and is just as ready to make another fight for the right as though he had not been beaten in the last one.

Mr. Seavey has a thorough understanding of the state's business. If the measure he has in preparation does not go the length he would like to have it is because he doubts the readiness of the legislative mind to go so far at one bound. His measure will be prepared for submission to Governor Johnson at the right time.

What Seavey's Bill The government of Cali- Does Contemplate fonia is inexpert, inefficient and costly beyond all need and everyone who thinks he knows a way to better it does right in bringing his views to executive, legislative and public attention. Mr. Seavey's service will, we feel sure, be appreciated.

The Board of Examiners is composed of the governor, attorney-general, secretary of state and the secretary of the board itself. The first three members have duties of their own that occupy all their time, their signing of the claims is perfunctory, wholly guided by Mr. Seavey's heliograph denoting that the claim has been audited. Often more than two of these members are out of Sacramento and the allowance of claims is delayed.

Mr. Seavey's bill contemplates a board of control, of three persons, to be appointed by the governor, to take the place of the State Board of Examiners, do all the work they do and a great deal more that needs to be done.

It is proposed that this board have a general supervision over the financial and business policies of the state and, upon its own initiative or by direction of the governor, make such investigations into state affairs as the good of the service requires.

It is also to examine into and approve all contracts for supplying the state or its institutions before such contracts can be validated. Constitute a purchasing department for the state with a fiscal agent of the board in each considerable state institution to the end that supplies may be bought in quantity and more cheaply than now with a reduction in the likelihood of petty speculation.

Institute a department of public accounting, with a superintendent thereof, and needed assistants, to outline and enforce a uniform system of public accounts and audit the accounts of all state institutions, as the bank examiners are presumed to expert the books of banks, at an hour when the institution knoweth not of their coming. These are the main features of Mr. Seavey's outline now in preparation, subject to such changes as further counsel and consideration may advise.

It is a good measure and if nothing more can be done at least this much should be.

What the State There is not less need for Really Requires simplifying, co-ordinating and fixing of responsibility in state than in city government, and the governmental machinery of California needs a thorough overhauling, but not all that needs to be done can be done at the next session of the legislature. Those institutions that are provided for in the constitution of the state must remain as they are until the constitution can be changed and that cannot well be done for two years.

Meantime, the services now perfunctorily performed, if performed at all, by the State Board of Examiners, State Lunacy Commission, State Advisory Board of Engineers and State Board of Forestry, should all be concentrated in Mr. Seavey's State Board of Control, with the personnel so changed as to admit the right men to membership on that board. If The Watchman were commissioned to prepare such a measure it would be something as follows:

1. A state examiner, under whom should be,
 - (a) An assistant to act as auditor of claims with a force of four clerks to be by him selected.
 - (b) A superintendent of public accounting with as many assistants as experience shows that he needs, but at least two.
 - (c) A superintendent of the state dependent children's fund with power to employ a dentist to go from institution to institution to put the children's teeth in order; a male and a female examining physician to strip every child to the buff to ascertain and, if possible, remedy those physical deficiencies that hang about children like millstones; a competent person to oversee and establish manual training and domestic science and art courses at all the orphanages with state aid therefor.
2. The general superintendent of the state hospitals with about the office force he now has, except that the experting of accounts should go to the superintendent of public accounting.
3. A superintendent of the state purchasing department with such assistants, clerks and fiscal agents as experience may demonstrate that he requires.
4. The state engineer under whom there should be,
 - (a) An engineer in charge of the department of highways.
 - (b) An engineer for the department of rivers and harbors.
 - (c) The state architect.
5. A superintendent of a state department of agriculture having under him,
 - (a) A commissioner of horticulture and viticulture.
 - (b) A state veterinarian.
 - (c) A dairy inspector supplanting the present cumbersome state dairy bureau, with such deputy inspectors as may be needed.
 - (d) A superintendent of state and district fairs using state money, aiding and encouraging but holding to a strict accountability for expending public funds.
 - (e) The state forester.

Right of appeal should lie from each department to the head of the department, from the head to the board of control, from the board of control to the governor and from the governor to The People. Every head of department should hold his place at the pleasure of the governor to the end that, being responsible to The People, nothing shall stand betwixt the governor and a plenary power to discharge that responsibility.

Misplaced The Watchman has been led to Confidence look upon the page in the Sunday

Call, edited by "The Candid Friend," as really candid, but appearances indicate that in its zeal to have California represented in the United States by a sporting man the Call has caved that page down the bank with the rest. With a candor comparable with its friendliness, and a friendliness comparable with that which Richard Achilles

Ballinger may be presumed to cherish for L. R. Glavis and Gifford Pinchot; Mr. Cahill, in last Sunday's Call takes The Watchman to task by charging him with the following offenses against political good faith: Advising legislators to "welch" on the obligations imposed by the advisory feature of the direct primary law; that in making a distinction between "mandatory" and "advisory." The Watchman is guilty of a dishonest play upon words; that he plays fast and loose with principle; that the editor of this paper "entered an elaborate defense" of the "scaly trick" employed by the Good Government League in the "postage stamp primary." The Watchman denies the allegations and defies the "allegation."

Where The Watchman The Watchman has Takes His Stand made his position with reference to the advisory vote provision of the primary law as plain as his aptitude with the English language will permit, but no harm can come of restating it with the purpose of meeting the requirements of the indolent mentality of "The Candid Friend." The advisory provision is advisory only and can be made nothing else save and excepting that the legislator himself may have made it mandatory by his personal promise to be bound by it. In the article criticized by Mr. Cahill it was specifically stated that, "If any legislator has promised his constituents that he will be governed in his voting for United States senator by the advisory vote he must make his promise good." Again, "If the event shall prove that personal pledges to abide the advisory vote have been given in sufficient number to elect Mr. Spalding he must be elected. We can better do a foolish thing than a dishonest." Is there in these quotations any suggestion that legislators should "welch" on their obligations? Or was "The Candid Friend" very much less than candid when he made that charge?

The district provision of the advisory law being, as made plain a fortnight ago by an analysis of a decision of the supreme court of Wisconsin, beyond the power of a legislature to legislate, is null, void and of no effect, and the law is to be read as if those sentences were not in it, thus relieving legislators from all obligations not imposed upon themselves by themselves through pre-election promises. Those provisions are, of themselves, without moral, legal or any other sanction or obligation, and to disregard them is not to "welch."

The free legislator will accept the advisory vote at its advisory value and that value is not great. Speaking in a language which "The Candid Friend" will probably understand the senatorial race was a dead heat. Judge Works, who stood first in the race, received slightly less than 36 per cent., of the total advisory vote, which did not indicate any overwhelming public sentiment even for him. Had Chester H. Rowell been the candidate there would have been something really advisory in the vote.

Instead of making an "elaborate defense" of the "scaly trick" employed by the Good Government League in the "Postage Stamp Primary," the editor of this paper, July 2, 1909, under the title, "The Right to Make a Mistake," characterized that incident as a mistake, tainted with bad faith, concluding with the declaration that, "If the Good Government League learn from this incident that not the smallest departure from the most perfect good faith can be tolerated the lesson will be worth the price."

To be sure we did not denounce that incident with the same wrathful indignation which characterized the denunciations of that political scoundrelism that hesitates at nothing from rape to robbery that will help to gain its ends, but we made our disapproval perfectly plain, albeit in a spirit of sorrow rather than hatred.

In making the false allegations above cited, "The Candid Friend" of the Call has put in question either his intelligence, his candor or that integrity of industry which requires every honest man to be reasonably diligent in verifying his statements before he prints them. Mr. Cahill's intelligence is not to be impugned.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK---Continued

A General Scramble For Good Roads Money That eighteen million dollar good roads fund, "hung up" through the unwise activities of Governor Gillett, and mistakenly approved by the people, is likely to afford this state such a tug-of-war as it has not witnessed for many a year, and all over where that road is to go. Shall it go down (or up), an issue never settled, on the east side, the west side or through the middle of the San Joaquin valley? On which side of the Sacramento river shall the state road go? Shall it go up the coast, along the coast or back of the coast range of mountains? Shall it go down the coast, along the coast or up the Salinas valley? Shall it make its royal progress by way of the orange belt, the oil belt or the alfalfa belt? These be mighty issues. It was adroit of the automobilists that they kept these issues in the dark until after the votes were cast else the two routes not selected would have beaten the one that was to a frazzle. If Governor Johnson be as wise as we take him to be, and the legislature as prudent as we hope for, haste will be made slowly in the expenditure of that eighteen millions of good roads money. The clamor will be great, the decision, whatever its nature, will have two against it to one in its favor, and we do not yet know how to build good roads anyway, that is, roads that will stay good with automobiles whisking over them at anywhere from thirty to sixty miles an hour. We should learn how before expending more than one thirty-sixth of that authorized credit of $18,000,000.

Mr. Brubaker's Suggestions The Watchman is in receipt of a communication from Mr. Ray P. Brubaker, of Shandon, Cal., under date of December 8th, containing suggestions for a revision of the election laws in such a way as to promote non-partisanship in voting. The Watchman commends this communication to the thoughtful consideration of readers:

"It may be hoped that with the new era of more sanity in things political, a relatively perfect system of selection of public officials may be evolved out of the present unsatisfactory system. In securing such a system there are three problems entering for special consideration.

"(1) The unrestricted opportunity for the registration by each and every party of its full party strength.

"(2) The selection of officials as nearly as may be made possible, by a majority of the electors.

"(3) The creation of a system which reduces to a minimum the opportunity of the small clique or partisan machine to manipulate the choice of public officials.

"With a system devised that secures these results and then added thereto the recall, nothing further is required save an appropriate interest of the average voter to secure and retain the full benefits of government by the people.

"To secure this relatively perfect system the present primary election should be developed into not only a nominating contest for the various parties but into an elimination contest for all the parties as well. Under the improved system as proposed no party declaration for voting at the primary would be required. But one ticket would be provided and upon that, under the respective party heads, would appear all the names of those who had properly qualified for the contest. In addition to the party columns would be one for those seeking the independent or non-partisan nomination. This election would constitute the partisan contest for the two places on the final ballot.

"In the count of votes those candidates of the various parties receiving the largest number of votes would be credited with the party nomination and a credited with the entire vote cast by that particular party for that particular office. Then for the final contest all nominees would be eliminated except those two receiving the largest number of votes in the primary or partisan contest. These two names would appear in the final contest without any party designation whatsoever.

"The sole requirement for voting at the primary would be that an elector vote in one party (or independent) column only.

"It will be readily seen that this proposed system secures at once: full opportunity for party development; an approximate responsibility of the elected official to a majority of electors—the reduction of the power of the small clique or partisan machine to a minimum of power by bringing into positive force in the final election the whole mass of the voting population.

"Finally the danger of the growth of the extreme partisan sentiment would be made impossible. This is actually the thing most needful of accomplishment. It is behind this monstrosity of ignorance and foolishness that the whole corrupt system of state and nation has grown to such huge proportions.

"The voter must be trained toward mobility of thought in matters political. He must be induced to consider in the final selection of public officials, the qualification of character and fitness above everything else. The system here proposed seems to the writer best calculated to secure the largest proportion of permanent results along the desired lines."

Mr. Brubaker's idea of eliminating from the final election all but the two strongest parties at the primaries is a valuable one. It would tend to bring out a full vote at the primaries and would prevent a recurrence of the experience of the last election, when Democrats, with no contest to decide in their own party, either ignored the election or jumped the party fence to help settle the Republican contest.

A Good Place For Detrick The Watchman had entertained the hope that Governor Johnson might find it to his advantage to make Charles R. Detrick his private secretary. The patient enthusiasm, untiring energy, unflinching courtesy and executive capacity of Mr. Detrick, attended as they are by that quiet and moderation and tact that relieves the other qualities of every suggestion of brusqueness, especially fits Mr. Detrick for such a position. He could make the paths of the Governor smooth as few others could.

But The Watchman hears that the position of Secretary of the State Railroad Commission has been tendered him and that he has accepted it. Mr. Detrick is not a little acquainted with rate-making, having had some years of experience in railroad work, is thoughtful and discerning, clear headed and accurate and, apart from anything due him for services rendered to reform politics, and alone on the score of fitness, no better selection could be made. He will be of great service to the new members of the commission in familiarizing them with the intricacies of rate-making and other functions appertaining to their new duties.

Counting Votes On Amendments A careful scrutiny of the votes cast for and against the constitutional amendments does not swell the heart with pride over the interest or discrimination which the electorate displayed. Scarcely more than half the electors voted at all on the constitutional amendments and nearly as few as one-third voted on some of them and those who did vote did not at all times manifest a wise discrimination. In this year of grace the people were voting for amendments. Two years ago they were inclined to resent amending the constitution.

But the trouble is not with the intelligence or interest of the voting population, but with the means for making known to them in proper season the nature of the amendments proposed and the good arguments pro and con, and that fault lies with the legislature. The Oregon way is the only way. In that state, months before the election, a pamphlet is mailed to each voter, which pamphlet contains, not only the amendments, but arguments pro and con written by the friends or opponents and signed by the persons furnishing them. Then follows a general discussion among the people and, whatever the people talk about, the newspapers will take up, with the result that, by the time voting day arrives, only the utterly indifferent, which are few, and the intellectually imbecile, which are not as numerous as popularly supposed, go to the polls unequipped to render an intelligent if not always a just or impartial verdict. The coming legislature should adopt the Oregon idea. It is great.

Charities and Corrections Efforts are making to have the law for the State Board of Charities and Corrections recast. The first law violated the constitution in giving the members longer terms of office than the constitution permitted. The redrawn law will remedy that defect and allot the membership to terms that do not all expire at one time. As none of the members have been confirmed the board can easily be re-constituted, as it needs to be, and in this the legislature should certainly have a hand. Indeed, we are not certain but that the legislature should constitute this board by election without the participation of the governor and for the reason that the State Board of Charities and Corrections pre-eminently represents the interests of the whole people. Its fundamental function is to stand between the public and officialdom to report to the public, through the governor, the legislature and the press of the state, concerning the conduct of the institutions of the state. The principal value there is in the board comes from the publicity given to institutional information. It will not do to have any institution a law unto itself. It will almost inevitably stagnate. It does the public institution good to be held to account by the executive department of government, but it does it even more good to know that its achievements and its deficiencies are, with impartiality, to be laid before the general public. By that means reputations are made and lost. And every institution that receives state, county or municipal aid should be thrown open to the visitations of members of this board and its accredited representatives.

In the Case Of B. Grant Taylor Some little time ago it was bruited about that B.

Grant Taylor, lately elected Clerk of the Supreme Court of California, and nominated on the Lincoln-Roosevelt League ticket, had definitely promised to retain all and singular the clerks and attaches of Clerk Frank Caughey. This report is not to be credited except upon the most positive assurance for, to credit it without such assurance, would be a serious reflection upon Mr. Taylor. Mr. Caughey, himself, might prove a valuable man to retain, and there may be one or two others, but to take the whole bunch en bloc, well, that would be hazardous a most doubtful fortune for Mr. Taylor. It is well known, for instance, that the "organization" put on Caughey men whom Caughey did not want, but he was too obedient an organization man to resent the intrusion. Has this bunch also been conveyed to the clerk-elect?

The Watchman holds that these rumors are injurious and, being injurious, must be unfounded and Mr. B. Grant Taylor should be given the benefit of the doubt. Besides, it is yet time for him to recede from any tentative arrangement he may have made, making irrevocable decision in a matter of such importance he should consult with, and avail himself of the advice of, his friends and associates in reform politics. He would do well to resist all effort, if any such effort be made, to dictate what he shall do, or whom he shall do, but only consider with his friends what ought to be done and then, having given a full hearing, use his own best and soundest judgment.

He should not allow the advice of honorable justices to overmaster him. There are politicians on that bench who would betray him into the hands of Herrin with as little compunction as would Jere Burk or Johnny Lynch.

AN IMPROVED LABOR COMMISSION

By J. J. TOBIN, Former State Labor Commissioner

In last week's issue of The California Weekly, commenting on the excellent article of Walter Macarthur on "Needed labor legislation" the editor expressed a desire for more specific information regarding labor legislation at the coming session and stated, "There is in existence a State Commissioner of Labor with an office force of seven and a salary list totaling $14,000 annually besides incidental expenses. This commission has its uses but it is not of the use that it might be made." Correct, and with this object in view I have prepared amendments to the law creating the labor bureau which will greatly extend its usefulness and so regain its popularity with the working classes.

I have submitted these amendments to many who take an active interest in the welfare of wage earners who not only approve of them but will use their best efforts towards securing their passage by the legislature. The only probable opposition will come from those who are self-interested in keeping the commissionership as one of the plums of the victors at the polls.

The amendments proposed will enhance the value of the statistical features of the labor bureau. The work outlined will be of special benefit to the army of unemployed who are classed under the head of "unskilled labor." No fee, commission, or charge of any kind is permitted.

Why Bureau Is Unpopular

The bureau was established March 3, 1883, on the model of the labor bureaus in operation in New York, Massachusetts and other states. Generally speaking, the men who were appointed commissioners in California were not selected on account of their qualifications but on account of their political services. The few who made good records were not retained in office after the expiration of their term and the bureau has become a political football. Most of our labor commissioners rendered no adequate service for the liberal salary allowed to them.

In several eastern states capable men are retained in office without regard to politics. They have won the esteem and confidence of wage earners and citizens generally because of their impartiality and devotion to duty.

The present labor commissioner, Mr. John D. Mackenzie, capped the climax of our bureau's unpopularity by his one-sided report on the influx of Chinese, Japanese and Hindus. The state senate unanimously repudiated this report on September 9 last at the special session of the legislature by declaring that it misrepresented the views of the people.

Objects of Proposed Labor Bureaus

The chief purpose of the labor bureau is the collection of labor statistics. The United States department of labor statistics, with its great resources, now covers the entire field and the statistics of special value are those relating to our various industries in California which should be collected and widely distributed by the state labor bureau.

Besides this work it can do excellent service by affording facilities for the employment of those out of work and diffusing information relating to the wants and requirements of wage earners. Employment agencies have acquired a bad reputation on account of their petty exactions, misrepresentations and frequent dishonest practices. Wage earners would welcome the change. A great number of them cannot pay the fees demanded by these agencies. The present labor bureau has its offices in the second story of the Ferry building at the foot of Market street in San Francisco. It is not, therefore, centrally located and is not easy of access. It is visited by very few people and the working classes, for whose benefit it was established, give it a wide berth. Not many of them are aware of its existence and those that are have long since given up hope that it can be made of service to their wants and interests.

Three Bureaus Instead of One

The proposed amendments to the present law provide that the governor shall appoint a board of three directors, in each of the cities of San Francisco, Los Angeles and Oakland, whose duty it shall be to establish and control a labor bureau in said cities. They shall serve without salary and hold office for the term of four years. They shall appoint all employees.

It is provided that these bureaus must be centrally located and easy of access to those in search of work.

Agencies of this kind have been lately established in Great Britain and have proved most successful. Sacramento has had one in successful operation for the past seven years. San Francisco failed at the late charter amendment election to get authority to establish a free employment bureau. It is evident, however, that municipal labor bureaus must be circumscribed in character. A state bureau can obtain statistics and other useful information about labor conditions in all parts of the state which should be made known to all interested. The National Employment Agency of New York was started less than two years ago at the suggestion of Jacob H. Schiff. It has now three branches which have proved so successful that more are about to be established. As its name implies it issues bulletins giving labor conditions all over the country.

Inspectors of Factories and Workshops

There are several labor laws on our statute books which at present are a dead letter on account of the want of officers to enforce them. These laws provide, "It shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics to enforce the provisions of this act." How can he do so unless the law provides him with the means? Some commissioners have made the attempt with only indifferent success.

The amendments to the present labor bureau laws provide for the appointment by the boards of directors of inspectors of factories and workshops whose duties are to carry out and enforce the labor laws, including those relating to the sanitary conditions of factories and workshops, the protection of workmen in hazardous duties, the treatment of minors and female employees and the regulation of employment agencies.

Why Not Such Inspectors in California?

Besides these duties, the inspectors can be of great service in procuring statistical information required by the board of directors. This is the only reliable way to get the facts as testified to by several labor commissioners in their reports. The staff of each bureau will consist of a manager and clerk or assistant, inspector of factories and workshops, and messenger who is also to act as janitor.

One statistician is provided for, who will take in hand all the reports from the inspectors and other employees of the three bureaus and put them in shape for publication and distribution together with other useful information, relating to the various industries in all sections of the state.

The proposed amendments will take the labor bureaus practically out of politics because the duties of employees are onerous and salaries moderate. Besides, they hold their positions subject to removal at any time by the board of directors.

From the estimate of expenditures given in all the amendments, the entire cost to the state of maintaining three labor bureaus, including $3,000 for rent of premises, will only be about fifty per cent. higher than the cost of the present bureau.

Thomas Hardy was honored in the borough of Dorchester, England, in October. The great novelist was presented with the freedom of the borough, and a play, "The Mellstock Quire," adapted from the novel, "Under the Greenwood Tree," was acted in the corn exchange.

Judge Lindsay says in a newspaper article that he believes for every woman voter who takes a bribe there are 50 men who would do so, and he believes a larger percentage of women voters to possess high ideals and a keen sense of justice than of men. "A man," says Judge Lindsay, "has a sense of justice, but he's apt to let his sense of comfort push it out of sight."

The Christmas Question

Best solved at
The Emporium

San Francisco's Shopping Headquarters

A store full of merchandise best fitted for gifts. Substantial money's worth goods backed by the most powerful Pacific Coast buying organization and your money back if not satisfied.

A Store Noted for its Books

Every wanted book at prices invariably less than publishers. Ideal Christmas gifts.

A Store Famous for its Toys

the world over, because of the largest stock and lowest prices always and novelties not to be found elsewhere.

The Thousand and One Other Things

for gifts or every-day needs always to be found at The Emporium at prices the lowest, quality considered.

If in Doubt as to the Gift

buy a merchandise or glove order. Most acceptable and worth its face value to the recipient. Satisfaction assured.

A PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION LAW

DEFINITE SUGGESTIONS TO BE LAID BEFORE THE NEXT LEGISLATURE

By PERCY V. LONG

The most important need of the day is securing a fair and reasonable control to the public of those undertakings conducted by individuals and corporations, and known as public service enterprises.

Through the greed of promoters and the ignorance and indifference of communities, vast public service enterprises have been launched without the investment or risk of much capital and the public has given away valuable privileges in order that the growth of these communities might be boomed. This improvidence of the past and the example of some of the European countries, notably Switzerland and Germany, in owning and operating their own utilities, have awakened the people of this land to the necessity of exercising such measure of control over public service corporations as will prevent extensive watering of stock and the consequent inferior service, in order to pay dividends on inflated capitalization.

Need for Regulation

Much of the time of the courts—both state and federal—throughout this country, is being occupied in litigation between public service corporations on the one hand and communities and official bodies on the other hand over rate fixing and various other phases of public service, wherein the community and the public service corporations are arrayed against each other.

The regulation of street railway systems, lighting and water rate problems, etc., is, in some states, taken out of the hands of the legislative bodies and given over to commissions created to especially consider such matters.

As the needs of the communities increase and the inclination of rate fixers to reduce rates becomes crystallized into a determination, communities are met with the refusal of water and lighting companies to improve or extend the service. This condition confronts more than one municipality in this state, in many instances resulting in a partial retarding of the growth and development of such municipalities. The situation is being met in other parts of this country by the creation of public service commissions to whom is committed the arriving at a valuation of the plant of a public service corporation; the proper income to be allowed on such valuation; the supervision of increase of indebtedness; the control of the increase of capital stock and the right to require complete and full reports of the affairs of such corporation and access to the books and records to the end that the public may be fully informed as to all phases of the affairs of the public service corporations; and the power to compel companies to improve the service.

Pioneer Public Service Commissions

The first state, to my knowledge, creating such commission, was the state of Massachusetts, which, by legislative act, fixed a valuation upon the plant of the gas company operating in the city of Boston, and then, by providing for a complete scheme of publicity of the affairs of that corporation and the control of its indebtedness and increase of the capital stock, exercised a complete supervision over its affairs. This act provided for a sliding scale in the matter of income and rates to be charged to consumers. As the dividend was increased so must the rate charged the consumer be decreased.

The state of New York in 1907 adopted legislation which created a public service commission. This legislation divided the state of New York into two districts—one for New York city and one for the rest of the state. This commission has in hand the matter of regulating railroads and other public service corporations. The New York plan, to my mind, is not so complete as the Wisconsin public utilities law adopted by that state in 1907.

The Wisconsin law provides:

1st. For an inquiry into the present structural value of the property of public service corporations.

2nd. For a complete system of uniform accounting with special precaution as to depreciation and construction accounts, to the end that every person in the state might know at the end of each fiscal year the rate of profit which each company or municipality has made on its actual property invested. Each municipal legislative body in this state, as well as associations of citizens, is given full power to require the state commission to investigate and act.

3rd. Provides for the sliding scale profit sharing and other devices that may increase the profits on condition of reducing the prices. The commission is authorized to investigate and sanction such devices if reasonable.

Wisconsin Law Admirable

This makes the law elastic enough to afford opportunity for ingenuity and experiments that may combine the principle of state regulation with that of private initiative. The law also requires depreciation to be made good by means of the charges to consumers and gives full credit for construction out of new capital. The law also, after giving complete protection to capital legitimately invested, seeks to base its tenure on good behavior. This is done through another feature of the law—the substitution of indeterminate permits for limited franchises.

The law defines an indeterminate permit as the right to continue in business until such time as the municipality exercises its option to purchase the property at a just compensation determined by the state commission. Any corporation operating under an existing franchise is permitted to surrender it and to receive by operation of law an indeterminate permit, agreeing thereby to sell to the municipality as provided and to waive the right to insist upon the fulfillment of any contracts regarding rates or services which might be set up as a defense against the orders of the state commission. The corporation gets, in return, protection against unnecessary competition, to be decided by the commission, on the part of either another corporation or a municipal plant. This does not apply to telegraph or telephone companies.

The indeterminate permit seems to be the logical outcome of rate regulation.

On the other hand the legislature sought to protect the rights of municipalities by enlarging their powers of purchase, ownership and operation.

Absolute Rate-Making Power

In the regulation of rates, fares and charges the Wisconsin legislation makes an important advance on that of New York and other states in the fact that the commission fixes the rates absolutely and not merely the maximum rates. It is as much an offense for a corporation to charge less as it is to charge more than the rates set by the commission. This is designed to prevent discrimination, but the commission is required to make a comprehensive classification of the services of each utility in which it may take account of the quantity purchased, time of use and any other condition that reasonably justifies, and deals in, the rate per unit of service. This discrimination was authorized, but it must be open and reasonable and must be established only after public investigation. By the enactment of this law the board becomes a public service commission to the fullest extent. Every public utility in the state, except streets, highways and bridges, is brought within its jurisdiction. It becomes also a local government board, for it regulates towns, villages and cities in their management of its undertakings. Its authority is great and far reaching, and while effective and a distinct advance in the matter of regulating, employs experts and agents and fixes their compensation, and can draw on all of the unappropriated money in the state treasury. It enters into the daily life of the people more than all other agencies of the government combined. Under its control is placed the development of the numerous water powers of Wisconsin, which virtually, through electricity, will light the streets and houses and furnish motive power.

Californian Republicans' Pledge

To give all of the powers that such a commission should have would require a constitutional amendment, and the Republican party in California, at its last convention, held on September 6, 1910, adopted a plank in the party platform which reads as follows:

"15. Public Service Commission—We recommend the submission and adoption of a constitutional amendment providing for the appointment of a public service commission which shall have general supervision of all public service corporations and fix the rates to be charged by them, such commission to be similar to those now in existence in other states where experience has demonstrated their usefulness."

In order to keep the promise contained in that plank the legislature will be called upon to submit constitutional amendments, to be voted on in 1912. In the meantime it is possible, under the constitution as it now stands, to create a public service commission vested with power to do most of the things necessary to carry out the purposes of a public service commission, except rate fixing and control of railroads.

League of Municipalities' Resolution

With this thought in mind the California League of Municipalities in its last annual convention, unanimously adopted a resolution which reads as follows:

Resolved, That the California League of Municipalities, assembled in thirteenth annual convention in San Diego, November 15 to 19, 1910, whereat sixty-five municipalities were represented by 195 delegates, hereby expresses its approbation of a measure to provide for a state public utilities commission to be endowed with power.

1. To compel publicity of the accounts and operations of public service corporations.

2. To regulate the issuance and sale of corporate stocks, bonds and certificates of indebtedness.

3. To authorize and require capital expenditures.

4. To require adequate service in every respect of such corporations to the communities which they serve.

5. To determine the valuation of the property of such corporations.

6. To advise and assist municipalities and other public corporations when requested by them in determining the rate to be fixed for the service rendered by such public service corporations.

7. In case when the power to fix rates is not vested in any municipality or other public corporation to fix such rate and prescribe the quality of service.

Resolved, That the legislature be, and it is hereby memorialized to enact the necessary laws to carry out the purposes set forth.

A Proposed Law for California

In an effort to comply with the letter and spirit of that resolution, Mr. H. A. Mason, secretary of the League of California Municipalities, and the writer, have collaborated in the drafting of a bill, which in our judgment, should secure, in a measure, the results which public service commissions are supposed to achieve. The bill creates a public service commission to be composed of three members to be appointed by the governor and to hold office for a term of four years. The commission is given power:

1. To issue permits to persons and corporations to engage in public service business.

2. To compel complete publicity in the af-

(Continued on Page 46)

BY WAY OF A SMILE

Little Robbie came home one day considerably agitated over a question that had come up in school. Rushing into the house he demanded of his father: "Say, pa, who was Demosthenes?" Bobbie's papa was one of those individuals who was dissatisfied with the general trend of modern educational methods, and frowned on the so-called frills and frivolities injected into the classroom work. "Demosthenes," he answered sharply, "was one of the early kings of Egypt. I don't see why the schools don't cut out some of their nonsense and teach history."

John S. Sargent's rough, impressionistic style of painting often gets him into trouble among his rich, aristocratic London patrons. Last week, after finishing three or four new things, he gave a tea at his studio in Tite street, and they say that at this tea a duchess, having scanned his chef d'oeuvres a long while through her gold lorgnon, said to Mr. Sargent in the condescending tone that duchesses use toward all who work: "I say, I like this, you know. I should go on with this if I were you." —Washington Star.

The class at Heidelberg was studying English conjugations, and each verb considered was used in a model sentence, so that the students would gain the benefit of pronouncing the connected series of words, as well as learning the varying forms of the verb. This morning it was the verb "to have" in the sentence. "I have a gold mine." Herr Schmitz was called to his feet by Professor Wulff. "Gonjugate 'do haff' in der sentence, 'I haff a golt mine,'" the professor ordered. Herr Schmitz proceeded. "I haff a golt mine, du has a golt dein, he has a golt hiss. Ve, you or dey haff a golt ours, yours or deirs, as de case may be."—Everybody's.

Town and Country

THE city and the country are linked together by Bell Telephone Service.

The city man when away can keep in touch with his office and business interests.

In a like manner, the man from the country who is visiting in the city, can telephone his home and find out how things are.

This is possible all over the country because Bell Telephone service is universal.

THE PACIFIC TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO.

SUFFRAGISTS AND ANTI-SUFFRAGISTS

Women distinguished in their own names or by virtue of their husbands' names are ranged in about equal numbers on both sides of the suffrage question. Two paragraphs, clipped from the same issue of the New York Sun, illustrate the line-up:

"The Equal Franchise Society will give a series of tableaux in the ballroom of the Plaza hotel early in January. Mrs. George Gould will represent Catherine of Russia. Mrs. Clarence Mackay will dress as Florence Nightingale. Mrs. James Stillman will carry the torch as the Goddess of Liberty. Mrs. J. B. Eustis will be St. Cecilia. Mrs. Charles Dana Gibson will appear as Raphael's Madonna. Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt as Joan of Arc. Mrs. Edward Thomas as Hypatia and Mrs. Bourke Cockran as Mary Wollstonecraft."

The other paragraph reads: "Mrs. Fritz Achelis presided at the first monthly meeting of the season which was held a few days ago by the New York State Association Opposed to Woman Suffrage. Mrs. Arthur M. Dodge and Mrs. Otto Killani reported from the great anti-suffrage meeting at which Lord Cromer presided and at which both Mrs. Dodge and Mrs. Killani spoke as representatives from the New York association. Among the active members of the association are Mrs. Elihu Root, Mrs. Frances M. Scott, Mrs. Henry A. Stimson, Mrs. Abram S. Hewitt, Miss Eleanor Hewitt, Dr. Emma E. Walker, Miss Anna C. Maxwell, Mrs. George Riggs and Mrs. Fulton Cutting."

F. George Mohr, associate editor of a trade paper in Cincinnati, either has a keen sense of humor or a large void where the "humorous" belongs. He has entered suit for $16 against Dr. Frederick A. Cook, the Arctic wanderer, claiming that as the amount he paid for four seats to hear Cook tell how he reached the pole. Now Cook has confessed that the discovery was principally in his mind. Mohr says he obtained the money falsely and wants it returned. Mohr created a sensation when he named the defendant, but Squire Myers wrote a writ summoning the Brooklyn physician to answer the action.

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

705 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD
The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed	$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital	300,000.00
Surplus	400,000.00
Profits	45,000.00

DIRECTORS: James D. Phelan, President; John Hooper, Vice President; J. K. Moffitt, Vice President; Charles Hallbrook, Randolph Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, William A. Watt, R. D. McElroy, H. O. Reilly.
Attorneys: J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy
Cashier: Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant Cashier; A. F. Curtis, Assistant Cashier

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)
526 CALIFORNIA ST., San Francisco, Cal.

Guaranteed Capital	$1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash	1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds	1,555,093.05
Deposits June 30th, 1910	40,384,727.21
Total Assets	43,108,907.82

Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co's. Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS:—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President and Manager, George Tourny; Third Vice-President, J. W. Van Bergen; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, A. H. Muller; Assistant Secretaries, G. J. O. Folte and Wm. D. Newhouse; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS:—N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, George Tourny, J. W. Van Bergen, Ign. Steinhart, I. N. Walter, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Streets. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Heyer, Manager.

In reply to many letters inquiring whether I shall publish a review of the session of the California Legislature of 1911, along the same lines as those followed in "The Story of the California Legislature of 1909," I will state that I shall do so, if subscriptions for 1,200 volumes are received before the Legislature of 1911 adjourns. If you wish to be one of the subscribers, fill out and forward this card.

FRANKLIN HICHBORN.

191

Franklin Hichborn,
Santa Clara, California.

As soon as the Story of the California Legislature of 1911 is published, send me one copy, for which I agree to pay $1.50 on delivery.

Name

Address

WHAT'S the use in striving to get rich when for twenty-five cents worth of whisky a man can make himself feel as rich as Old Rockefeller?" demanded a farm laborer, but the riches that whisky brought him did not prove satisfying, and when this farm laborer felt age coming upon him, and employment less easy to find because of his growing unreliability, he sought an abandoned shack, lay down in a dark corner of it and, placing a pistol to his temple, blew the visions of riches that whisky inspired into breathless darkness.

But why spend even twenty-five cents for whisky or hashish or opium or anything to make one feel rich, or powerful, or talented or strong, when, by cultivating the habit of day-dreaming, every man may make himself his own hero without expense, and such a hero as will put history, if not mythology, to shame? The glory of the imagination is as free as air, but, as Jed by and by became convinced, if one would give himself over to it he must be content to be nothing and do nothing, content to live a dream, and not a real life. It is a good thing to have an imagination that discounts the future and enables its possessor to foresee what will by and by take place. Every productive man of affairs is such a dreamer, but such an one builds no castles in Spain, whereas the day-dreamer foresees nothing, works to no end, but cuts himself loose from all material things and goes, like wreaths of smoke, floating off into space with untiring wing, companioning with the birds and the clouds, as free as fancy, as glorious as the sun.

Jed's first consuming ambition was to be six feet high, a dead shot and an incomparable athlete, and, premising that he was so, he dreamed himself through such adventures and achievements as made Beadle's dime novels so tame and unsatisfying that he could bring himself to read no more than six of them during all his boyhood days. Whatever we may hold as to dreams by night, dreams by day are wholly fabulous, Jed missed being six feet tall by half a foot, was never muscular, was about as athletic as a sack of salt, and during his hunting days, if the game "froze" (sat still), he could not see it, and if it flew or ran he could not hit it.

The ambition ranking next in Jed's range of desire was to be able to sing a great, round, sweet-toned bass with something in it of the sound of many waters. Times without number, in his mind, he had seen himself stand forth on stage or in choir to sing bass solos, sweet and solemn, but so tremendous as to make the windows rattle in their frames and to cause the vast audience to sit entranced until the spell was broken by cheer on cheer. That was because Jed had little voice to begin with and had yelled that little all to pieces during the voice-changing period of his life.

Long before Conan Doyle made Sherlock Holmes famous Jed day-dreamed detective stories of much intricacy in plot and in the solution of which he himself performed prodigies of valor and cunning. He was offered a comfortably furnished room in the rear of a postoffice in which to sleep free of charge that he might give the alarm if burglars should undertake to enter. One night he was awakened by someone prying at the strong wooden shutter of his window. He had under his pillow a great navy revolver carrying a ball big enough to make a hole through a man large enough to admit the thrust of a fist.

Jed sat up, cocked the revolver, rested it across a table, drew a bead on that shutter and—despite the fact that he had, in his mind, killed scores of malefactors of all kinds in forays, fights and in the rescuing of fair maidens from foul fiends, he waited with finger on trigger while there ran through his mind thoughts of the horror of killing a human being. He saw the dead thing lying there in the snow, heard the cry of pain, the gasp and the death rattle in the throat, saw the crowds gathering in response to the pistol shot, saw the body turned over to see who his victim might be, and he trembled with uncertainty as to who it might be. Thoughts like these came quick and vivid and they made Jed sick. They also made his heart beat so that it seemed as if it might kick some of his ribs loose. This was not through fear for him

RECOLLECTIONS OF JED

EVERY MAN HIS OWN HERO

BY

A. JUDSON

self, for he had sanity enough to know that he was in no danger. His fear was for the other fellow and he was appalled by it. He could kill imaginary desperadoes with as little compunction as so many bedbugs, but the real burglar, well, that was different.

Perhaps it was the sound of Jed's heart-beat, perhaps it was the noise of footfalls down the street; whatever the cause the would-be burglar took to his heels down the alley and never came back any more. Had the shutter been thrown open Jed would have fired, but more than likely into the floor or the wall or out the upper corner of the window so as to be sure not to hit. Thus do dreams vanish before one touch of reality!

Jed had a vacation after his initial year of school teaching had terminated and, being invited by a Colorado cattle man to spend a few restful weeks hunting and fishing on his mountain ranch, he accepted and set forth on horseback. One day he was out with his rifle hunting for certain wolves that had made bad work in the herds of his host, when he happened to cast his eye into the bottom of a little gulley that came down the side of a conical mountain a thousand feet high and covering perhaps four square miles of land, all within the Spanish grant owned by the cattleman. In the bottom of that little gulley something gleamed. It was a nugget of gold.

Jed jumped down into the gulley and picked it up and, while about it, picked up another and another nugget, varying in size from buckshot to hen's eggs. Crawling on hands and knees and poking over the dry dirt with his fingers, Jed soon had a hatful of the precious, shining gold. Secreting his riches in a hollow tree he followed that gulley from base to summit of the mountain, gathering nuggets all the way until he had as great a weight as his horse could carry. Then he went to the ranch house, found a strong, seamless bag, left a note for the proprietor saying that he had gone for his mail and would be back in two days, filled his sack, packed it across his horse and made his way to the nearest railway station and there took train for Denver, where he sold his gold to the mint, banked his thousands and returned to the ranch to hunt more wolves, find more gullies running down the sides of that brush-covered mountain, search them from base to summit for more golden nuggets with which to fill more sacks to take to Denver to sell to the mint until, before his vacation visit ended, Jed had more than enough cash capital in hand to buy the ranch, stock, mountain and all, which he did.

Jed had dreamed of being a benefactor of his race. Here was his opportunity. He threw a trocha of barbed wire around the foot of that mountain and hired armed guards to ride it as they would a range to keep all trespassers off night and day. He then secured the services of a mining expert and a force of men and they prospected that mountain foot by foot, finding that it was in fact volcanic, that it had burst open in a score of seams, as might a baking cake, and each one of these seams was saturated with free gold and gold bearing quartz of great richness. The riches of Jed were now fabulous. What work for humanity might he not undertake!

But Jed's first concern was to put his great property in order. He laid out a model town, piped crystal clear mountain water through all its streets, selected only such miners as would take the total abstinence pledge and keep it, paid them $10 each per day in wages. Threw an embankment of mining detritus across a valley at the foot of the mountain and so created a beautiful artificial lake which supplied the town with an ever sufficient source of water for all purposes, built model homes, planted trees, connected the new town by rail with the nearest railroad and set all things in order for a happy and prosperous community.

All this happened before Andrew Carnegie achieved notoriety or his system of library buildings had taken shape. Jed's first act of thorough-going public benevolence was to establish a chain of institutes extending across country from ocean to ocean and back again and up and down the land from north to south wherever wanted. Each institute contained a library, a theatre, art gallery, amusement halls for men, women and children, club rooms, a gymnasium, and around all a beautiful garden, the whole covering an entire city square. There was a local superintendent and corps of assistants in charge of each institute, but the whole system was under the general direction of a board of managers, self-perpetuating, with Jed as president, and this board hired lecturers, orchestras, singers, players, of the highest quality, to swing around this circuit instructing, cultivating, entertaining the people and so counteracting, as well as warring against, the hurtful influence of saloons and other demoralizing agencies. This was not all to be furnished quite free, to the pauperizing of the people, but at so nominal a price as would at once defray the cost of maintenance and yet come within the reach of all.

Jed's next great benevolence was a system of related schools and colleges for the children of the poor and the waifs of the world. Industrial and commercial schools they were, to be established near, but not in, considerable cities; schools like real living where everyone big enough would work for pay and pay for what he got, developing talent and learning how to live a life of usefulness.

But Jed's supreme benevolence was manifested as a regulator of extortion. Did any railroad impose extortionate charges upon the people along its line? Jed would serve notice upon it to reduce its rates on pain of having him build another line paralleling it from town to town. Was there a corner in any commodity? Jed served notice upon those who had it in charge to break the market and let supply and demand rule or he, with his millions, would break it for them and break them with it. Was there land monopoly? Jed would have the estate condemned for public use, would pay for it and allot it to individual holders on favorable terms. Was there congestion in cities? Jed would buy outlying lands, build railroads and modest model homes so that the tenements would be deserted and the rack-renters ruined.

And all this time the ore in Jed's mountain of gold grew richer as the shafts went down. As an act of patriotism he paid the national debt. When he went from institution to institution, and from institute to institute, the people turned out to cheer him, they rose in their seats and remained standing until he was seated in his private box at the theatre or the opera. The newspapers, all save the system that he had himself established, dedicated to the truth, heralded his praises, and when, grown full of years and useful honor, he went to his grave the nation mourned and the world sympathized in its bereavement.

Great, wasn't it!

The finishing touches were being put to the picture one beautiful Sunday evening as Jed lay upon his stomach on the grassy summit of Old Flat Top, his chin resting on his hands and his elbows on the ground, looking first at the reddening western sky and then into the shadowy valleys of the Sandy and the Indigo, when a measured football recalled him to himself, and John Hancock—gaunt, shiftless looking fellow—Dedrick's coach by his side.

"What are you up to, Jed?" "That's all," sat down by Jed's side, drew his knees under his chin and clasped them in his long, hairy arms.

"Oh, nothing, not a thing in the world."

"What gave you that far-away look in your eyes?"

"Oh! I was just a-thinking."

"No, you weren't thinking. When people think they knit their eyebrows and their eyes are on the job. Thinking is hard labor and nobody does it hour after hour kicking up the heels. Most people think that they think when they don't think and many of them would not know how to think if they tried. It requires a trained mind to think and I know you well enough to know that your mind is not trained. You were dreaming, Jed, just dreaming, and day-dreaming at that, the very worst kind of dreaming."

Jed confessed, in some surprise, that he was.

"What were you dreaming about, Jed?"

"Oh! what I'd do if I were rich, immensely rich, don't you know, had found a mountain of gold or something like that. Wouldn't I turn the world upside down, though?"

"Yes, in your mind, but no other way. Sharpers would fleece you out of it so quick it would make your head swim, or you would get dizzy and fool your riches away so that some court would appoint a guardian for you and take your money out of your hands as a father takes a sharp knife out of the hands of his little boy through fear that he cut himself with it. No man can handle a fortune beneficially, either to himself or to society, who has not either laboriously made it or been trained to its management from childhood, all hedged about by family claims and traditions to keep him in the middle of the road. But what kind of a day-dream were you reveling in, Jed? I haven't anything better to do than just to listen to it."

Jed had held many a frank, open converse with John Hancock, useless, solitary, John Hancock, who worked at rough labor enough to earn two or three dollars per week perhaps, and, having done so, would not do another stroke of work that week for either accommodation, love or money, so Jed reviewed for the entertainment of John the great benevolences outlined in the foregoing, with the difference that, warming to his subject and being to no drudgery of thumping the narrative out on a writing machine, he told it with frills and asides and amplifications not needful to these "Recollections." At the conclusion John threw himself back on the grass and haw-hawed. Then he resumed his readjusted attitude of bunched-up restfulness, tore a quid of tobacco from his plug and haw-hawed again, finally bursting forth with: "Great idea, Jed! The world's greatest philanthropist! Does infinite credit to your powers of imagination, but none at all to your common sense. Now just look at it:

"In the first place," he continued, "your rancher friend would speedily have sued you for the recovery of his property and would have held likewise the money you paid for it, for, in this matter of fact world of ours, the man who discovers a mine on another man's land does not own the mine and is bound to disclose the truth concerning it if he would buy the property. Your model town would be all right for model people to live in, but model people are all right already and where is your philanthropy?"

"Your system of institutes would take many men many years to work out and even then would come nearer to saving the found, who need little done for them, than the lost, who need everything. Your educational system would relieve society of the need for caring for its own and so deprive it of the manifestation of those helpful instincts that make for the amelioration of the race. In short, you would hog all the opportunities for benevolence that you could discover and, having a mountain of gold to draw on, the giving would cost you nothing, not a pang, not a deprivation, so that all you would get out of it would be the gratification of an inordinate vanity. Bah! Jed, Bah! The worst thing that can break loose in the world is a fool with money."

"Thank you!"

"You are entirely welcome, entirely welcome, boy, don't mention it, but what I want to know is, do you spend much time day-dreaming such stuff?"

"Yes, sometimes."

"I thought so. I half suspected so much."

You have fizzled on everything you have touched since I knew you without any very good reason apparent for fizzling. You don't look like a boy that has given himself over to bad habits and you are not real lazy as I am, and I reckon it is day-dreaming instead of thinking things out that ails you. Day-dreaming clouds the vision, it makes one live always in an unreal world, one does not see things as they are and so easily becomes an all around misfit and never quite arrives. The man who wants to get on in this world must cherish no illusions. Day dreaming is a worse habit than whisky-drinking, poker-playing, opium-eating or anything else I know of. For all these devotees may have lucid intervals; your day-dreamer by and by has none at all. He is a ghost stalking the earth passing through everything and everything passing through him, never once touching him and leaving everything as it was before.

"Stop it, Jed. Cut it out. It is a species of insanity. Kill it like killing snakes. If you don't it will ruin your life and the life of anyone who links her life with yours. When one of those visions begins to insinuate itself into your mind run from it as you would run from the Devil before daylight, shake your head, throw it out, grab up a book and dive into it, take an ax and swing it until you are tired, dig a hole and fill it up again, do anything that will drive the miserable temptation away. Hey, Jed, give me your hand on it? You've got good stuff in you by inheritance, and otherwise, and I have wondered where the loose screw could be. You have dreamed things heroic but you haven't done anything heroic that I've heard of, and the hero that a fellow makes of himself is a mighty cheap article."

"Is it that that has made such a shiftless failure out of you, John?" was Jed's taunting inquiry.

"Me a failure? Not a bit of it. I am just what I want to be, with my eyes wide open, and this town has no more successful man than I. But I am no do-er. I am a be-er. I love life too well to fool it all away doing such inconsequential things as making a living according to prevailing standards. I can live as well as I want to live and keep warm and well on two dollars a week, and for the rest I read and think, not dream; think, think so hard that it makes my bones ache. I don't preach. You might as well snap peas at ironclads as to preach at people, but just talk with them, man to man, as I sometimes talk with you, tell them things they never heard of, quietly, sort of on the sly so that they won't know what you are up to. If they tumble to you it's all off, if they don't you'll get your hook into their gills after awhile and then you've got 'em dead to rights."

Your father, Jed is the only man in town who has done more than I have to head people off who are going wrong and I've even headed him off. Why, boy, I have been camping on your trail for a year trying to find that loose screw. I told your dad I'd find it or bust a hame strap and I followed you out here for that purpose, watched you from back yonder out of sight for two mortal hours, trying to make out what you were up to. Now I've got you dead to rights and you are going to quit dreaming and go to planning, not up in the air, but right down on the ground. Christ wrote things on the ground with his finger, not up in the air where it would be invisible. You do the same. Get out your pencil and figure, figure the bark off the trees, the shingles off the roof, the paint off the house, anything so you get down to real things. Then work and you'll win."

"And you have been doing this for me, John?" asked Jed in humility. "I thought you little better than a vagabond."

"How much better than a vagabond was The Christ? I have a shack, a real comfortable little shack with a stove, a bed, a chair and a table and a whole dollar's worth of dishes, and he didn't have even that and neither did his apostles. They all boarded around. I'd rather stay at home, but I can live on two day's work in the week and have the rest of the time to work out the problems of other men's lives, round them up, head them off and set them right. I'll make a hundred American citizens yet out of what would have been failures but for me. Isn't that better than making just one hard-working, home-providing citizen out of myself?"

The church bells began to ring for the evening service, and in the gathering darkness the two half slid, half walked, down the precipitous face of Old Flat Top toward the droning town muffled among the trees. John had cured Jed of the enervating, ambition-sapping habit of day-dreaming, for from that night he fought the tendency like killing snakes. He did his commonplace best passing well and so went his way content.

(Public Service Commission Law—Continued)

fairs of public service corporations and individuals engaging in that work.

3. To control stock and bond issues of public service corporations.

4. To authorize and require capital expenditures.

5. To regulate and prescribe the terms upon which any franchises may be acquired.

6. To control sales, leases, etc., of the property of public service corporations.

7. To compel adequate service and the use of safety devices and to control construction in public service work.

8. To determine the value of property devoted to public service.

9. To assist municipalities in acquiring the property of public service corporations by acting as arbitrator or appraiser when requested so to do.

10. To advise municipalities as to the reasonableness of rates to be fixed for public service.

Other Powers

The bill gives the commission these powers and directs the maintenance of an office in the city and county of San Francisco: provides for a review of any order or decree made by the commission and incorporates the Wisconsin public utilities feature, in that such court review can be had only upon such testimony taken before the public service commission.

The bill also provides that the commission may have power to examine witnesses, books, and subpoena witnesses and gives it all the general powers necessary to be enjoyed by such a commission in order to accomplish the purposes of such legislation.

I have hastily sketched out the principal features of this measure, which I am satisfied is constitutional, and which it is believed will give to the people of the state of California that relief which they have for so long been seeking.

A committee appointed by the Republican state general committee to draft legislation in furtherance of the pledges contained in the Republican state platform, has this measure now under consideration and in the very near future a report will be made embodying the committee's views.

I believe every honest operator interested in public service enterprises will welcome the creation of such a commission, for the results achieved in other states have not only given the public the relief sought in a majority of cases, but have established the business of the public service corporations on a firmer and more substantial foundation and have removed entirely from political activity the agents and manipulators of public service corporations on the one hand and the political blackmailers on the other.

"Did you ever run into a telegraph pole?" inquired the elderly passenger. "Yes, ma'am," said the chauffeur, slowing up the taxicab to avoid a collision with a street car. "I've bumped into telegraph poles, I reckon, two or three times." "Brings you to a pretty sudden stop, doesn't it?" "No, madam; the machine stops all right, but I always keep on going."—Chicago Tribune.

"Of course," said Mr. Sirius Barker, "I want my daughter to have some sort of an artistic education. I think I'll have her study singing." "Why not art or literature?" "Art spoils canvas and paint and literature wastes reams of paper. Singing merely produces a temporary disturbance of the atmosphere."—Washington Star.

PERSONALIA

The women of Maryland have started a new paper called the Voter. Miss Mary Johnston is among the contributors to the first issue.

Oldham today enjoys an exceptional position in England inasmuch as it is the only town in the country where a woman mayor has been installed. The honor has fallen upon Mrs. C. E. Lees of Werneth park, who is the widow of Charles Edward Lees, a man who attained a considerable reputation for generosity in the town.

David Belasco has assumed charge of the rehearsals of Puccini's new opera "The Girl of the Golden West" at the Metropolitan opera house. Mr. Belasco's desire is to impart an American atmosphere to the proceedings of the singers who have never seen any such characters as those they are called upon to represent. Among all the actors there is only one American. The distinctive American types in the play are to be represented by ten Italians, a Bohemian, a Pole, a Spaniard, a Frenchman, two Germans and one American. So Mr. Belasco has been called in to make this polyglot crew act as much as possible like Americans of the '49 period.

John De Kay, the author of "Judas," which Mme. Bernhardt will shortly produce in New York, has sailed for America in order personally to superintend the rehearsals, which will begin immediately on his arrival. He originally intended to sail in Christmas week, but owing to a message from Mme. Bernhardt that she had decided to put forward the production from January to December 20, Mr. De Kay, despite the pressure of business, hurriedly arranged his departure. He takes with him the costumes for the play, which were made in Paris. He is very enthusiastic over the prospects of the success of "Judas," for which special music has been written by Reynaldo Hahn, a Venezuelan, in Paris.

Not long ago a woman submitted to the New theater in New York a manuscript entitled, "The Bullet-Proof Jacket, or Why She Didn't Commit Suicide." Another drama which recently found its way to the play-reading committee was in 26 acts and 49 scenes. To act it would require 175 actors and a squadron of cavalry.

Paul Armstrong, author of "Alias Jimmy Valentine," has finished a vaudeville sketch called "Three Thieves," for Frank Deshon. The characters are a burglar, a blackmailer and an embezzler.

It is said that Miss Jane Haskell, daughter of Governor Charles N. Haskell of Oklahoma, will seek a career on the professional stage. She made her debut recently in an amateur production of Pinero's "The Schoolmistress."

The distinguished scientist, Lord Kelvin, once demonstrated at a meeting in Edinburgh that he did not know how to light a fire. The duke of Argyll had been suddenly taken ill, and was carried to an ante-room, where it was found that there was need of a fire. Lord Kelvin undertook to kindle one, but showed his lack of knowledge by taking some sticks to a gas burner and trying to light them from that.

Rumanian watermelons have been introduced into this country by Horace Knowles, a former minister to Rumania. They are of about the size of a cantaloupe, and are served individually. The flavor is said to be delicious. This variety of watermelon was discovered by the ex-minister in the foothills of the mountains of Rumania.

William Sproule, the new president of the Wells-Fargo express company, came to America in the steerage from Ireland when a boy, and began his career by running errands for a news company. His predecessor, F. D. Underwood, was also self-made, having been a brakeman on a gravel train in the west when a young man.

"We Can't Be as Bad as All That" is the title of Henry Arthur Jones' new piece. It is a play of social life in the English upper classes, and is to be put in rehearsal at once by the Authors' Producing Company under the personal supervision of the author.

SHEAR WIT

Three chorus girls are said to have resigned from the staff of a musical comedy because they would not wear "horrid tights." Dear, dear, a girl must wear a little something on the stage even in these emancipated days.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Can't savvy just what that college high-brow is driving at when he puts up a yelp about the brand of spiel the ordinary gink hands out in the talk thing. He's off his done when he digs up this big noise about our English not being all to the mustard.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

The daily announcement in our want columns of "Wanted—A white girl to cook," is eloquent recognition of our claim, that the Houston girls are good enough to eat.—Houston Post.

Two very rough looking tramps looked in at a window at a railway station where an operator sat at his key. Say, pardner, said one of them in a very husky voice, report a couple of empties going east.—Slocumb (Ala.) News.

Southey's "Doctor" had the following opinion of his wife's nephew: "My wife's nephew is a sensible lad. He reads my writings, likes my stories, admires my singing, and thinks as I do in politics—a youth of parts and considerable promise."

Prof. Brander Matthews of Columbia told the other day about a boy who was asked in an examination what Shakespeare meant by the phrase, "Sermons in stones." The boy wrote: "When passing by a tombstone you may learn the name and the dates of birth and death of the departed one, and also from the inscription a valuable moral lesson from his or her life. Walking along a road you may see from the milestones the number of miles to the nearest towns, and thus acquire geographical information. Heaps of stones by the roadside indicate that repairs are to take place, and so inculcate a lesson in neatness."—Springfield (Mass.) Republican.

There is a story about an influential woman member of a fashionable Philadelphia church going to her pastor with a complaint about the quality of the voice of a man who occupied a pew behind hers. The woman told the pastor that this man's singing destroyed her devotional feelings, and asked whether the pastor could not suggest that the offending person change his sitting. The pastor said he should hesitate to do that, since he would have to give the man a reason for the request, but added: "I might ask him to join the choir."

The broken-down cabby regarded with a gleam of delight the taxi which had broken down. But he spoke no word. The chauffeur began operating on his machine. He turned it and twisted it and banged it and screwed it, but to no avail. And still the cabby spoke not. The chauffeur banged again. He did things to ignition sparks that wouldn't ignite and cranks that refused to be anything but cranky. And still the cabby, sour of visage, lay low and said nuffin'. Then the chauffeur wiped his beady brow and then the cabby still with the gleam in his eye, crossed over. "Ere!" he exclaimed grimly, holding out his whip. "Ere y'are, mister! 'It 'im with this!"—Answers.

Jesting about railways of the south is rather an overworked profession. Before mason-jarring the crop, however, let Senator Burton of Ohio have the floor. "Speaking of rail roads," he says, "the ultimate word, in my experience, was a 'limited' on which I traveled in Georgia last summer. At a point where we were making our greatest speed, a man stood at the side of the track with a moving picture machine. I leaned out of the window and called to him, 'How are you getting on?' He stopped turning the crank, and spoke with an expression of deep disgust. 'It don't seem to be no use,' he said. 'Hold your head still, please. I want to get a time exposure.'—Everybody's.

"Gracious!" cried the minister when the young mother had told him she wanted her baby baptized Jane Dell Emily Nora Eliza Maria Frances Sarah. "why do you want to afflict the poor child with a string of names like that?" "You wouldn't ask, sir," replied the mother, "if you knew how sensitive and nervous her eight girls are."—Cincinnati News.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

Department No. 3.

ERNEST H. CLARK CARY,

Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof.

Action No. 23805

Defendants.

ERNEST J. MOTT,

Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:

To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Ernest H. Clark Cary, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the northwesterly line of Brannan Street, distant thereon eighty-four (84) feet and nine and seven-eighths (97 $\frac{7}{8}$) inches southwesterly from the southwesterly line of Zoe Street; running thence southwesterly along said line of Brannan Street sixty (60) feet and two and one-eighth (2 $\frac{1}{8}$) inches; thence at a right angle northwesterly eighty (80) feet; thence at a right angle northeasterly sixty (60) feet and two and one-eighth (2 $\frac{1}{8}$) inches; thence at a right angle southeasterly eighty (80) feet to the northwesterly line of Brannan Street and the point of commencement; being a part of One Hundred Vara Lot Number 16.

Together with the appurtenances of each and every part thereof.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple as absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be met in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 28th day of October, A. D. 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By M. Kragen, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 11th day of November, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

City and County of San Francisco, a municipal corporation, whose address is San Francisco, California.

The German Savings and Loan Society, a corporation, whose address is Number 526 California Street, San Francisco, California.

Nov. 11-10t

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of SARA JACOBS, deceased.

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned executor of the last will of Sara Jacobs, deceased, to the creditors of, and to all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers with 10 months after the first publication of this notice to the said executor at his office, Room 609 Kohl Building, Corner Montgomery and California Streets, San Francisco, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of Sara Jacobs, deceased.

LESTER H. JACOBS,

Executor of the last will of Sara Jacobs, deceased. Dated, San Francisco, November 18, 1910.

ISAAC FROHMAN, Attorney for the Executor. 11-18-6t

TITLES RESTORED

TITLES RESTORED UNDER McENERNEY ACT, complete for $35.00. Burnt Records Title Co., 951-953 Monadnock Building, ninth floor, Market street, near Third

JULIUS GAIMANN
NOTARY PUBLIC

Office,
30 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491

Residence,
1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4590

SAN FRANCISCO

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Justice of the Peace

A court is an institution, not a person. We speak of the state or United States government, but it would not be easy to put the finger on it and to say, "Here, this is the government." No man ever yet saw the government, but if he fancies that it does not exist let him outrage it in some way and he will learn to his sorrow that its existence is very real. So with a court; judges and justices may come and go, but the court goes on. Men speak and act in the name of the court, but they are not the court. The court is an institution, not a man.

Now the foundation of our judicial system, because nearest the people and touching most familiarly their every-day life, is the court of the Justice of the Peace.

We, in California, do not have the township system of government as they do in most of the eastern states, except that the state constitution requires that the board of supervisors in each county must divide such county into a convenient number of judicial townships, and each township must have one, and may have two, justices of the peace and as many constables as justices, elected for four years at general elections. In case of vacancy the supervisors appoint to fill out the unexpired term.

The jurisdiction of justices' courts in civil cases is limited to less than $300. In practice the outside limit is $299. Within this limit as to the value involved, other elements not wanting, the jurisdiction of the justice's court is exclusive. All actions must be begun in that court, but cognizance cannot be taken of actions involving title to real estate or, in criminal cases, of offenses amounting to felony.

Without repeating the statute in its entirety, justices' courts have jurisdiction in civil cases on contract, for damages to person or property, actions for the recovery of the possession of personal property; actions for recovery of fines, penalty or forfeiture where the question of the legality of the law authorizing such fine or penalty is not involved; actions upon bonds or undertakings; proceedings for entering confessions of debt—in all cases where the amount involved does not equal $300.

As to territorial jurisdiction proceedings cannot be started in a justice's court where the cause of action originated outside of his township, but if it be necessary for him to issue any mesne or final process, that is, subpoenas or attachments, orders of sale or what not, they may be served in any part of the county in which the justice's court is held.

There is a class of actions in which the jurisdiction of the justice's court is concurrent with that of the superior courts, that is, the plaintiff may institute his suit either in a justice's court or a superior court. These actions are, actions for forcible entry and detainer (usually refusal to vacate a house or other property) where the rental value of the property does not exceed $25 per month and the sum due or damage claimed does not exceed $200; actions to enforce and foreclose liens on personal property where neither the value of the property nor the lien amounts to $300.

But there are also certain cases in which a justice's court cannot take jurisdiction no matter how small the sum claimed may be. These are where the justice's court would be trenching upon the jurisdiction of courts of record or where the cause involves ships or boats for the recovery of seamen's wages for a voyage in whole or in part without the waters of this state.

In cities of the larger class, such as San Francisco, Los Angeles and Oakland, one in order to be eligible to become a justice of the peace must have been admitted to the bar as a practicing attorney, but if so admitted and elected justice, he cannot practice before any other justice in that county while himself a justice. This is on the theory of the law that, no matter how many judges of the superior court, or justices of the peace, a city or county may have, there is in fact but one superior court or justice's court and, of course, it would not be proper for a justice to practice in a court to which he himself belonged.

Justices in the same county may hold court for one another if for any reason one is ineligible or disinclined to hold such court in his own township, but the request must be in writing. Such instances of calling in other justices to hold court usually arise out of the fact that the justice in such court may be related to one of the parties to the action or have some interest in it or is not on good terms with one of the parties and so might be chargeable with denying him a fair trial.

A justice of the peace may administer oaths, take acknowledgments, perform marriage ceremonies and perform the services of notaries public and, for the protection of the dignity of his court, he may punish for contemptuous conduct toward him.

Finally, the justice's court is commonly looked upon as a common sense court, and it frequently happens that cases before a justice involving all the questions of law and fact that would go to make a celebrated case if the sum involved were large, and the court before which it was tried was of last resort, will be disposed of in a day with justice substantially meted out, whereas, in a higher court, a case involving the same issues might drag on for months and years enriching attorneys and bankrupting litigants. The nearer the court is to the people and to that public opinion that the people make, the more likely is justice to be done.

Mrs. Rose Terry of Cadillac, Mich., has gone to Klamath Falls, Ore., to take entire charge of a large electric lighting plant. Mrs. Terry is said to be the first woman in this country to be entrusted with such a responsibility.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE

A full line of Theosophical Literature from Point Loma, California, the headquarters of the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society, under the leadership of Katherine Tingley, is now on sale at A. M. Robertson's, 222 Stockton St., S. F., and at Smith Bros., 462 13th St., Oakland, California.

PUBLIC MEN USE

Allen's Press Clippings

to help them keep in touch with every publication in the State. Send your order to 88 First Street, S. F. IT PAYS TO KEEP POSTED.

Day School---Night School

Electrical, Mining, Civil
AND
Automobile Engineering

Architectural Drawing
Wireless and Morse Telegraphy
BOOKKEEPING : SHORTHAND

Our Graduates in Every Department Secure Good Positions

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved
KRYPTOK
Invisible Bifocal Lenses
181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.
TAYLOR BROS. CO.
REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE
Tels: Oakland 950 OAKLAND
Home A 3950 1236 Broadway

This Week: "The Need for the Merit System"

By Francis B. Kellogg

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY

DECEMBER 23 : '10
FIVE CENTS : THE COPY

Vol. III Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street: San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH · GOOD COURAGE · GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, in Advance. No. 4.

How Happened It?

JACKSON HATCH, who embezzled the fortune of one of his clients a few thousand dollars at a time, was given a new trial because the district attorney did not elect on which one of these embezzlements he would try the accused and, in the cases against the looters of the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company, the district attorney was forced, against his will, to elect on which one of the embezzled securities the accused would be tried. How happened it, then, that when Happy Hooligan got drunk and stole forty-seven sheep the district attorney was not compelled to elect which sheep he would try the culprit for having stolen?

Unreasonable Women

THE BERKELEY W. C. T. U. is again agitated because, at some of their banquets at the Faculty Club and elsewhere, certain Berkeley professors have wine served with their meals. Unreasonable women! How can they expect gentlemen who have so little physical exercise, and so much mental, to digest big feeds without taking a little wine for their stomach's ache?

Oily Billy

IF EVER HONORABLE SENATORS should stand by each other it is when the title to the seat of one of them is being investigated, as in the case of unctuous Bill Lorimer of the Chicago Stockyards district. A committee of Bill's peers has found that the confessed receivers of bribes were no more to be believed than were the members of San Francisco's boodle board, the verity of whose confessions nobody but a boughten juror doubts. To be sure there was an Illinois legislative "jackpot" opened in St. Louis, four legislators were bribed and three more did the bribing, without whose votes Lorimer could not have been elected (unless others were bought to take their places), but because Lorimer himself, as sly a fox as ever stole a march upon a hound, was not connected with the bribery we are assured that no taint attaches to his seat. Wait and see!

It Is Not To Be Rash

THE SOUTHERN MEMBER of the lower house at Washington who refused unanimous consent to permit Representative Kahn to withdraw his bill to appropriate $5,000,000 in aid of the Panama Pacific Exposition at San Francisco may have performed a more kindly service than many suppose. It is not for Kahn to be rash in refusing such aid. It may be needed. The expense accounts of the booster committees have not yet been rendered.

As a Tradition

THE FUTURE HISTORIAN of San Francisco will divide his theme, as Caesar divided all Gaul, into three parts and one of these he will assign to Michael Henri De Young. The other two themes will be the Terry-Broderick incident and the eighteenth of April, 1906. These indeed may be forgotten, but not Michael Henri. Hand in hand with Beowulf, Sinbad the Sailor, Jack the Giant Killer, Pocahontas and Doctor Cook he will march down the ages imperishable and not to be minished, yea, even after William Randolph Hearst is in ashes and the ashes are blown away. What post-prandial reminiscences will not be dug out of imperishable lore clinging to this one scintillating personality that it has been the great good fortune of San Francisco to create! As a tradition he will shine. Would that he were one already.

Still Gathering

AS OFTEN AS ONCE A FORTNIGHT for a year, perhaps as often again, proclamation has been made through the columns of the daily press of San Francisco that District Attorney Pickert is out gathering evidence hand over fist concerning some burning iniquity, not related of course to the graft prosecutions. One wonders where he finds storage capacity for so much evidence, or if he be not "wool gathering" instead, so little comes of it. Would it not be well for District Attorney Pickert to lay low and say nothing until he gets a real 'possum up a surely tree and then howl?

Broke Over the Rules

CHARLES H. LOPER killed Joe Vernet down in Fresno county, made away with his body, gave out that he had gone to Oregon, sold his effects and pocketed the proceeds. So far the trick had been neatly turned for no one saw him do it. But the sheriff and the district attorney had their doubts. They bothered Loper with questions. In answering these questions Loper lied some and then they asked him some more questions. He naturally got tangled, was driven from one lie to another, was finally cornered, became confused, confessed, was convicted and sentenced to be hanged. That was "sweating," and the supreme court says that although convictions cannot be obtained without sweating they must not be obtained by it. It is better that men be murdered for their effects than that one jot or tittle pass from the law. By the way, the judicial line-up is of interest. Melvin, Lorigan, Henshaw and Beatty, on the side of the law; Sloss, Angelotti and Shaw on the side of common sense. Had the chief justice decided the other way the other thing would have been the law and yet courts do not make laws. They only construe it. "Sweating" is bad, but so is cold blooded murder for money.

The Best Thing In Sight

THE BEST THING IN SIGHT, speaking nationally and continentally, is the prospect for reciprocal trade relations between the United States and Canada. There never should have been anything else, there never was any reason why there should be anything else and there is now less reason for a tariff wall between the two countries than there ever was. Neither country has anything permanent to gain from such a wall and both have much to lose, the greatest loss of all being that spirit of continental nationality that is so big with promise for generations yet to come. New England wants reciprocity in everything including anthracite, the Middle West in both countries want it in everything including bituminous coal, and we of the Pacific West want it because that way lies our trade and up that way live our kind of people. Only a precinct patriotism stands in the way. Kick it out.

Eagle, Look Sharp

THE WORK OF PACIFICATION in Mexico is not progressing apace. It is much hindered by reason of the government's troops being soundly whipped now and again by the revolutionists. Delay is dangerous. The fires of revolution smolder by a million Mexican hearthstones where a deep sense of wrong rankles. Nothing is wanting but a rational hope for success to create such an uprising as must make American intervention inevitable. A thousand millions of American dollars are invested in Mexico, all owned by persons who run our government as well as the one south of the Rio Grande. It will be as they say.

Our Unpreparedness

Right ruefully do we confess that unpreparedness to resist an invading foe that so sears the hearts of those two patriots, Representative de functo McLachlan and Adjutant-General Lauck. Our priceless Pacific coast is wide-open to any free-booter nation disposed to sally forth and take it in.

For that matter the rest of the nation is in a similar predicament. What is to hinder the Eskimos sweeping down from the north, the "tar-heels" sweeping up from over the Rio Grande, the Haytiens pouring through the rice swamps of the Carolinas, the Yucatanians coming right up the Mississippi and splitting the Great Republic in twain through the heart of it, to say nothing of the Japanese or Tahitians effecting a landing at Pescadero or Bolinas and gobbling us all up in the twinkling of an eye? We should be considerate of what these gentlemen say, for most any old morning they may be able to point at us in derision and say: We told you so! We knew you'd be sorry.

Inasmuch as Uncle Sam has only between nine thousand and ten thousand miles of boundary to fortify what excuse can the old dotard give for failing to fortify all of it? As we showed the Spaniards at Siboney, it is not necessary for a hostile force to have a harbor or even a wharf in order to effect a landing. Did not the redoubtable General Shafter float ashore on a buoy and his army after him? In order to be secure we must have every mile of border fortified, whether of sea or lake or land, and who can doubt that it could be done for a paltry matter of a million or so dollars per mile, or from nine billions to ten billions for the whole? And then there is Alaska away out in the cold with nothing to prevent the Kamchatkans leaping across the briny interval and regaining possession of our own lady of the snows! The Philippines, too, with their seven millions to eight millions of dusky malcontents, what is to hinder our being raped of them?

But what would be our predicament if, having fortified abundantly, the Hague court of arbitral justice should relegate fortifications to the past? Wouldn't we look silly? How much better would be our plight than that of Bradbury, the philanthropist, he of Corte Madera and adjacent state seaside resorts, who in his younger days spent many of his accumulated thousands in constructing a levee wherewith to hold back the turgid waters of Tulare lake, which lake, in high dudgeon, packed its traps and retreated inward a dozen miles or more, not leaving Bradbury's dike water wherewith to wet its toes, not even until this day?

One of the finest things about President Taft that has happened in recent months is his refusal to become exercised over the unfortified condition of Representative McLachlan and the Pacific coast. The United States will be and remain as unfortified as the unfortified town of Oakland now is. Fortifications are of the dim past. The future is to the navy and the Hague court, with the chances on the side of the court.

It may be impertinent, but the query naturally suggests itself if Representative McLachlan, being about to retire to private life, has or has not engaged his services to dealers in munitions of war to pump war scares at so much per clap?

A Court of Final Resort

The power of the supreme court of the United States is not, as many suppose, co-ordinate with the legislative and executive departments of government. Rather is it inordinate, overtopping them all, and what is true of the supreme court of the United States is measurably true of the supreme court of California and of each state in the union. It has the final word as to what shall be the law

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage.

Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application.

Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

179 and not infrequently that final word is pronounced, in the one case, by a vote of five justices to four or, in the state court, by a vote of four justices to three.

Is that a healthful condition?

British precedent says no, and makes parliament pre-eminent.

If the Will of the People is the source of law it follows that, in the five to four, or four to three, decisions, the issue should somehow automatically revert either to the people themselves in a referendum vote or to a joint session of both houses of the legislature sitting as representative of the people, to determine which of the contending interpretations The People will have to be the law. Otherwise not the Will of the People, but the will of an odd man of the supreme court is the supreme lawgiver of the land. It is idle to say that the court merely interprets the law. It makes it.

An inconsistency somewhere lurks. The Will of the People pretty generally fails to arrive. It is by no Will of the People that Treadwell, Glass, Bartnett and Conboy go unwhipped of justice. The courts stand between.

How Would It Do?

Inasmuch as the appellate rather than the trial courts are objects of public suspicion, based on the presumption that the appellate judges busy themselves with abstractions rather than with realities in the administration of justice, how would it do to legislate our existing appellate courts out of existence and, in their places, establish courts of review, each composed of three trial judges chosen by lot, or otherwise, and sitting for such rehearings as may be demanded? Courts of review so made up would be composed of men fresh from the administration of justice at first hand, they could be relied on to correct serious errors made by the trial judge and they would not know so much law as to be wholly oblivious to justice and, being themselves trial judges at all times except when called upon to review a particular case, they would not necessarily feel called upon to "sit on" the superior court upstairs whenever they can conjure up some ponderous and inconsequential stupidity that will afford them legal opportunity so to do. There might be twenty such courts sitting at the same time in different portions of the state, thus expediting the business of establishing justice and improving the quality of the justice established. Whenever men get their feet off the earth and proceed to revel in whereas and now therefore—well, they do that at the hospitals for the insane and it is why they are there.

More Bullwork

Referring again to a recent remark of a sage contemporary that, "The judiciary is the bulwark of personal and property rights," we are inclined to amend the spelling and concede the point. If our present day administration of justice is not "bullwork," such work as a bull might be expected to turn out if turned into a china shop, then we do not know how to characterize it.

Take the case of Bartnett, upon whom telegrams of congratulation are now pouring, giving him a most joyous Christmas season. He was charged with having, as special administrator of the Colton estate, stolen the securities belonging to that estate and converted them to his own use. The evidence shows that he did not steal those securities as special administrator of the Colton estate. He only stole them as one of the looters of the California Safe Deposit and Trust company and therefore goes free, the recipient of hearty congratulations, although the Colton securities are still stolen.

This paper is not saying that it is the fault of the appellate court that this is so, but only that "bullwork" has been made of the administration of justice in the whole proceeding. Treadwell is in London floating an Alaska mine, Bartnett is in New York dreaming of his financial rehabilitation, and only the poor fool of a Dalzell Brown, who confessed his fault and took some punishment, has failed of beating the law.

Fault there is, grievous fault, that justice should be so made a jest of. If it be the fault of the attorney who prosecuted the case he should be disbarred for incompetency; if it be the fault of the trial judge he should be impeached and made to come down off a bench upon which he is unfitted to sit; if it be the fault of the court of appeals it were better to abolish the right of appeal than to have such "bullwork" made of the administration of justice. A great financial institution was looted, the most sacred of trusts was betrayed, and after three years of litigation, we have as a net result a trifling addition to our sum total of law and another absolute failure of justice to be vindicated.

Take the case of the drunken Conboy who killed a friend who tried to help him to his unsteady feet. He also is granted a new trial because the trial judge did, what every trial judge should have the right to do, and in every civilized country where justice is not made the sport of technicality and whim, he does have the right to do—talked to the jury like the traditional Dutch Uncle, giving it as his opinion that they should find no trouble in reaching a verdict and admonishing them to do it. They did it and there is no question that the verdict they reached was a just verdict, the only contention being that, presuming all juries to be composed of imbeciles without minds of their own, the declaration of the trial judge, that they should have no trouble in reaching a verdict, probably did help them to reach such a verdict.

This paper is not saying that the appellate court erred in so laying down the law and putting the city to the expense of another trial of Conboy, with a diminishing likelihood of being able to secure a conviction no matter how guilty the drunken police captain may be. What we do say is that such attempts to administer justice are "bullwork," a disgrace to the state, to the bench and the bar, and show that our whole criminal jurisprudence needs purification as by fire.

As good a thing as the coming legislature can attempt to do (whether the courts will permit it to do it or not remains to be seen) is to rehabilitate the trial court with the power to try cases rather than sit as umpire in a judicial game, and then restrict the injurious intermeddling of little judges sitting on tall benches to instances where, but for the error of the court below, the verdict must (not might) have been different.

It is impossible that such "bullwork" in the administration of justice can go on inter-minably without producing consequences of the most serious character. Those who have had their savings swallowed up by bank looters, seeing the miscreants go free, will treat them as they would be justified in treating looters of their chicken roosts—fill their skins with shot. The surviving members of families whose innocent sons drunken policemen kill will go gunning for those policemen after the manner of the feudists of Kentucky and Tennessee, and the doctrine of "dementia Americana" will be invoked to justify the act, and unless justice can be better secured by due process of law, will justify it.

There is nothing else deserving the attention of the administration and legislature about to be inducted into office, commensurate with the reconstruction of our system of criminal jurisprudence. Everything else can wait. It is perhaps providential that the miscarriages of justice in the cases of Glass, Barnett and Conboy, being flagrant, took place just at this time. If to these could be added the freeing of Ruef!

Christmas

Will the world ever come really to know that carpenter of Nazareth? Will it ever be able to picture him in his time and place in human history, surrounded as he was by Roman soldiery, Jewish citizens, aliens and denizens, influenced in their opinions by Greek culture, talking to the common people in an idiom that they could understand, holding fast in the main to that to which they held fast, speaking their language, thinking their thoughts, sharing their views of disease, of science, of history, limited as they were limited save that, in the relation of God to man, the father to his children, he saw above and beyond the highest and farthest the world has yet seen? Will the world ever come to know this Christ for what he was and is, the anointed bringer of good tidings to a despairing world? Must we always give ourselves over to slavery to the letter that fitted the time when it was written or spoken but, so interpreted, becomes unintelligible at another age of the world and under other conditions? Why should we hobble-skirt our hearts and our souls at the dictates of a theological fashion, and so lose opportunity to sit free at the feet of this most marvelous of all teachers of the way-of-life that we may drink in such of his words as were spoken for all time and all men? The theologies that men have written and expounded! How in spite of him have the backs of men been laden with this dead burden when his own yoke was easy and the burden he imposed upon his followers light, so light that men and women have gone to their deaths bearing it trippingly as a damsel going to the well for a pitcher of water dripping with coolness! And what was the burden of the message this eastern Ariel brought to the world? What was it but love and service, love for every living creature and a helpful hand stretched forth to whoever needs help? Just that and not a thing else that is indispensable. He only is infidel to this aerial messenger who would becloud his face with theologies, with creeds, with hard conditions as to church membership, absolution, penance, forgiveness, as to solving problems of the universe, of creation, of last things, prophecy and the fulfillment of it, a' that and a' that, and keep us from coming to him as came the little children of old with open minds and honest hearts that we may learn how to love and how to serve. If Christmas is the best day in all the year it is because on that day more of us give ourselves over to loving and serving, not always wisely, too often more conventionally than sincerely, and yet striving somehow to love and to serve those we do love in loyalty and truth. All that is joyous in our Christmas tide is of the spirit of The Christ. All that is burdensome, the costly presents poorly afforded, the ceremonial, the conventional thing, these are of barbaric mythology and antedate the birth of Christ, probably by centuries. So it is with much, if not most, that we get from him, it comes freighted with the excrescences of morbid ages so that he walks, in the minds of many, a melancholy ghost weighed down with the miseries of a world instead of being that fleet-footed messenger, bringing glad tidings, that he is to those who know him in spirit and in truth. Whenever shall the world come to know that carpenter of Nazareth for what he is and was?

Illuminating

If the testimony now being taken by the Railroad Securities Commission, whatever that may be, in New York, is properly digested and laid before the public it will throw much light on the railroad rate-making and control question in this country. Judge Robert S. Lovett appears to have been especially frank and open in his testimony. So far as he has observed, the need for paying either interest or dividends has not entered into rate-making. Rates are made to take all that the traffic will bear and, be it much or little, it must serve no matter how great or how small the capitalization. No doubt this is true. No doubt it ought not to be. While the physical valuation of railroads can be only one factor in rate-making it should prove a most important factor, Judge Lovett to the contrary notwithstanding. Some day it will so prove.

What Judge Untermeyer said in relation to holding corporations was also much to the point. Such corporations never should have been allowed to exist and they should speedily be destroyed. They are devices for enabling holders of fifty-one per cent. of the capital stock of a holding corporation to skin alive the holders of forty-nine per cent., not only of that corporation but of the corporation held by the holding company, and one of the most valued by-products of corporation exploitation is made up of the hides and tallow of the minority stockholders. Corporate dishonesty and buccaneering methods of dealing with the public are equaled only by the dishonesty and buccaneering methods which the majority stockholders maintain toward minority stockholders in the same company.

Take the case of the Associated Oil Company: The Southern Pacific Company is reputed to own fifty-one per cent. of the capital stock of that corporation. The Associated has confessedly made huge profits and acquired vast holdings, but it pays no dividends and those who are dependent upon their dividends for their livings must sell their shares at a price greatly reduced for the want of dividends being earned in abundance. When the Southern Pacific gets ready to realize on its investment, what stands in the way of its taking over the whole vast property at such a price as it is minded to pay itself for its own property, including that of the unrepresented forty-nine per centers?

Judge Untermeyer is right. We are as uncivilized in enforcing justice in the management of corporations as we are in other forms of criminality, the management of corporations being a recognized form of criminality. The gravity of the case can the better be appreciated when we reflect that, in the nature of things, business must somehow mainly be conducted through corporations. Therefore their dishonesty of management is as much a menace to wealth itself as it can be to the general well-being. Say on, Judge Untermeyer. The more you tell the quicker will a remedy be applied. For long years you were attorney for one of the greatest corporation criminals of modern times and you know.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Anyone conversant with childhood delinquency will agree that the most stubborn of all evil habits to break up is petty pilfering. For this there are psychological justifications of convincing power, and no parent or guardian is doing his duty by a child placed in his hands if he does less than all he may do to instill in the mind of his charge an adequate power of discrimination between what is one's own and what is another's, for, by inheritance and nativity, we are all of us born thieves.

Up from the Adamite man, up from the cave dweller, all the way to our day, there may be traced two elemental, if not always predominating, means of acquisition—taking by power and taking by stealth. In their simpler forms these are robbery and larceny. In their more complex manifestations they are exploitation and the employment of crafty devices for the securing of special privileges and immunities. Betwixt these extremities, lying all along the paths of life, the manifestations of taking by force or taking by stealth are beyond classification or enumeration and constitute the heaviest burden that society has to carry.

In the mass the tendency harks back to the infancy of the race, in individual instance to the early childhood of pickpocket and shop-lifter, footpad and porch climber, defaulting clerk or fashionable kleptomaniac, and for the simplest of all reasons—we memorize by repetition, we acquire habits by doing over and over again, and whoever during childhood's days committed a thousand petty thefts will, except some profound experience ordain to the contrary, commit another thousand during after years and, let us confess it for it is true, he may become a multi-millionaire merely by multiplying his petty larcenies by millions instead of by scores. When one contemplates the efforts made, the inventive genius employed, to make the merest semblance of genuine commodities sell for what they are not, the humanist despairs of his race.

But there is one gross, common, contemptible form of this depravity that should be attacked and steadily resisted in every family from infancy to adulthood. That is the tendency to pilfer. Many families are, all unwittingly, kindergartens of thievery. Parents lead their own children into temptation in a hundred different ways and, themselves having no very definite ideas in relation to what is their own and what another's, do nothing effective toward making such ideas clear and definite in the minds of their children.

Watch the building of any house in the residential district of any bay cities community. No sooner have the workmen gone than the "kids" swarm to it with bags, baskets and little wagons to carry off the scraps of lumber left lying around. These belong either to the contractor or to the owners and possess a tangible value. If to the contractor, he may keep his home supplied with fuel the year round from the waste of his different build-ings; if to the home-owner, he may have kindling enough to last years.

But the "kidlets" do not discriminate between waste lumber and good. They soon carry off whole armfuls of shingles, broken bunches of laths, moldings and finishings that either curtail the contractor's profits or rob the owner of that which is his own. It has been conjectured by contractors that losses so sustained every year about the bay aggregate many carloads of merchantable lumber.

The real harm, however, is not to the contractors or to the home owners, but to the "kidlets" who are thus taught lessons that they never will forget. It is not that their native integrity of character is broken down. Rather is it that their innate tendency to pilfer is fed and encouraged and they are helped to grow toward, instead of away from, the preadamite man. In nothing does a growing child need more careful and unremitting guidance than in learning to distinguish between that which is his own and that which is another's and to respect the difference.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

California First in Oil Production

A bulletin just issued by the United States Geological Survey officially recognizes the position of the Golden State in the matter of oil production, as follows: "California, as was expected, took first place in petroleum production, changing places with Oklahoma. California's product in 1909 was about 6,500,000 barrels more than any other state has ever produced in a year. Should California show a further proportionate increase in 1910—and she is understood to have done so—"her total will be more than double the highest yield of Pennsylvania." "Almost 6,500,000 barrels more than any other state has ever produced in a year!" With that shy humility which is universally recognized as a Californian characteristic, may we be permitted to suggest that this is "going some?" Although the oil product of the United States increased more than 30 per cent in 1907, an increase which has been somewhat more than maintained since then, the bulletin has this to say about it: "Only three states contributed greatly to the increase in quantity produced. California took first place by gaining 25.35 per cent., Oklahoma increased 4.5 per cent., and West Virginia 12.83 per cent. Utah and Wyoming produced only 22,137 barrels, but this was a gain of 24.55 per cent. over their combined output in 1908. In all other states decreases were noted, the greatest decline, 47.15 per cent., being in Louisiana." The bulletin is gratifying: California is first in oil and first in the hearts of its countrymen.

Center of Population to Move East

As yet it is too early to say with certainty, but there is strong probability that when the center of population of the United States in 1910 finally is definitely determined it will be ascertained to have moved a little east and south of its location in 1900, about 25 miles west of Columbus, Indiana. If this probability is found to accord with the fact, the situation will be unique, inasmuch as this will be the first census taken since 1790 in which the center has failed to move westward. Beginning with the first census, when the center was located a few miles east of Baltimore, the center of population uniformly has moved westward. The trend also has been slightly to the northward, so that the present change will be a variation in that it will trend both eastward and southward. We of the West have had an idea that our population has increased rapidly—and it has—but it appears that the East has been outdoing us in this respect.

The Oldest Egg Has Been Found

While a party of German archeologists were delving in the ruins of the ancient Moguntiacum, which was built before the Christian era by a son of the Roman Emperor Augustus, they came upon a deeply covered cistern. In the cistern a clay vessel was found, and in the vessel was a hen's egg which was, to all external appearance, as perfect as on the day when the hen mother first sang her psalm of praise over it. The egg now is in a Roman museum, but nobody has had the hardihood to attempt to ascertain the condition of its contents. This is believed to be the oldest egg in the world, although it is whispered that it may have some fairly able competitors in the cold-storage article. It also has been suggested that the egg trust is likely to investigate the condition under which the outer form of this egg was maintained so long, but it is admitted that this is merely a rumor, and there may be nothing to it. As to the quality of the ancient egg's contents, what need it matter, when any householder must many a time ere this have purchased eggs which he would be willing to guarantee were no better? When an egg attains a certain condition of noxious desuetude, it matters not whether it is a month or a few aeons old.

Hungarians Feed the Devil

Set in the midst of that mystery of life and death which their minds have not the capacity to solve, it is small wonder that most men are superstitious in some degree. Usually such superstition is of mild character, taking the form of disregarding Fridays, holding certain numbers lucky, etc., but occasionally it breaks out more violently. Witness recent developments in the village of Rihai, Hungary. There was a series of earthquake shocks so severe as to set church bells to ringing. The villagers were greatly alarmed, and consulted an old woman, who claimed to be possessed of occult power, concerning what should be done. She assured them that the earth tremors were caused by the groans of the devil, who suffered from cold and hunger. Thereupon the villagers killed several calves and goats and threw them into a chasm near the village in order that the devil, who is presumed not to be a vegetarian, might have something with which to appease his hunger. They also set fire to the bishop's forest near there to give the devil an opportunity to warm himself, although it should have occurred to anybody that he need not go home to find all the warmth he needed. The episode resulted in the arrest of the occult lady and several peasants, the latter, at any rate, more to be pitied than blamed. Does not the whole story read like a fragment from the middle ages rather than a bit of twentieth century history?

Ten Per Cent. for the Poor

Under the laws pertaining to that city all paid places of entertainment in Paris pay 10 per cent. of their receipts to the government for the benefit of the poor; the law applying to theaters, concert halls, dance halls and, in short, all places of paid amusement. The receipts from these sources in 1909 amounted to $10,363,000, and this sum was the most ever received in any one year save the exhibition year of 1900, when the sum received was $12,165,000. It is of interest to note that various forms of entertainment contributed to the fund last year as follows: Theaters, $5,979,000; concert and music halls, $3,300,000; dances, $151,000, and—their first contributions to such a fund—cinematographs, $338,000. It is noteworthy that moving-picture shows, though of recent birth, contributed more than twice as much as dancing, though the light, fantastic toe never wearies of disporting itself. The idea of compelling those who amuse themselves to pay something toward the support of those who are in want seems to be worthy of emulation.

The First Scholar Continues First

Occasionally one hears it suggested that the bright pupil in school or college, the one who stands at the head of his classes, rarely amounts to much after he "gets out in the world," and, indeed, there seems to be a somewhat popular impression that this may be so. The Harvard Graduates' Magazine combats this theory as erroneous, and produces statistics which uphold its contention, as follows: Between 1777 and 1888 Harvard classes contained 113 first scholars. Of these five became United States senators, ten became congressmen, three were members of presidential cabinets, two ministers to Great Britain and three ministers to other countries, one a United States supreme court justice, six judges of United States courts or of state supreme courts, two became presidents of Harvard, and a number of others were educators of high rank, while several became eminent in the literary world. Certainly there is nothing about such a list to give countenance to the theory that first scholars lapse into obscure mediocrity. On the contrary, there is little room for doubt that an equal number of graduates selected at random would be found to have made a much inferior record.

The Queerest Railway Train

Without much room for doubt, the queerest railway train in the world is operated in Japan. It travels over nineteen miles of hilly road between Atami and Odawara, and it is called the "push man train" for reasons which will become apparent as this paragraph is continued. The locomotion of the train is worked as follows: Each car is pushed and hauled up a hill by coolies; then, when the summit is reached, the coolies jump on behind, and the car runs down the hill and to another hill by its own momentum. There the process is repeated, and so on to the end of the journey. Years ago, on a three-mile line of road running from the Los Angeles & San Pedro railway to Long Beach, there used to be a car or two hauled by an absurd little engine, and when there were too many passengers aboard on an up-grade the engine would refuse to haul its load farther, and the male passengers were expected to get off and push the cars, which they did, thus assisting the engine. It was called the G. O. P., or Get Off and Push, train. But doubtless to Japan alone belongs the distinction of possessing the only train that depends entirely on human muscle for its motor power.

A striking feature of Mme. Bernhardt's repertoire is "La Beffa," an Italian drama in four acts which was first produced in Paris by Mme. Bernhardt at her own theatre on March 2, 1910. It is a romantic, psychological play.

Stellman's

Vanished Ruin Era

San Francisco's Classic
Artistry of Ruin

$2.50

One of the beautiful art gift books of the year—the one art gift book of intense local interest. Wonderful pictures of that ephemeral modern Acropolis, which the Fire God created, and of the new city which man's courage and energy rebuilt. A gift book de luxe, generously made and proportioned, bound in strong boards, inclosed in a box and finished throughout in a style both elegant and unique. Price $2.50, by mail $2.78.

This work and other books, booklets, cards and calendars are described in our illustrated catalogue entitled "PLEASANT PAGES," which will be gladly supplied without charge upon request.

A complete stock of gift books of all varieties, fiction, sets, Standard and antiquarian works and fine bindings is displayed in our BOOK ROOMS.

PAUL ELDER & CO.

Books and Art

239 Grant Ave.,

San Francisco

The California Weekly
IS PRINTED BY
Donaldson & Moir
PRINTERS
330 JACKSON ST. Phone Douglas 1765

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

HAIL, CHRISTMAS!

By M. L. Theise-Whaley

Hail, day made for gladness!
That dissipates sadness,
As the sun's ardent beams kiss the dew from the earth,
We greet thy returning,
With hearts filled and burning
With love, for thy festal of good cheer and mirth.

With laughter and singing,
With good will, and ringing
Of joy-bells, we welcome thee, bend to thy sway.
The children adore thee
And youth bows before thee,
While even old age dreams of blest Christmas Day.

For souls that are blighted
By sin, thou hast lighted
The bright star of hope; whose soft radiance streams,
Into life's darkened places,
And lifts downcast faces,
Again to the light with its heart cheering beams.

Then hail to thee, Christmas!
That comest to bless us,
With gifts—and with giving, that true joys prevail—
In our hearts we enthrone thee
Anew, while we own thee
Rich gift from the Father, and bid thee: All Hail!

BERNARD SHAW'S LATEST

Bernard Shaw's latest play, "The Dark Lady of the Sonnets," is thus described by the New York Times: In this one-act piece given at a special Haymarket matinee recently, the author sets his drama on the terrace of Whitehall Palace between 11 and 12 o'clock on a midsummer night; and his characters are Queen Elizabeth, her frolicsome maid of honor, Mistress Mary Fitton, William Shakespeare and a palace warder.

The presence of Mary Fitton as the mysterious "woman color'd ill" of the sonnets shows Mr. Shaw among the Herbertists in the controversy as to whether Pembroke or Southampton was the "only true begetter" of these marvelous poems. In fact, Pembroke is specifically mentioned by the warder as having paid several moonlight visits to the terrace for the purpose of meeting the frolicsome Fitton.

The story can be briefly told. Shakespeare comes to keep a tryst with the young maid of honor; and, while waiting, is surprised by the apparition of a lady walking in her sleep. He mistakes her for the girl, "whose pretty looks have been mine enemies," and, having awakened her, is beginning to pour out his heart, when Mary, a harmony in flame-red, flies furiously in, calls the lady by a highly opprobrious name, gives Will a clout that sends him to the floor, and then discovers to her panic and horror that the lady is no other a personage than the Queen. And her Grace looks so like mischief that Mary is presently glad to totter away after warning her mistress in a terrified whisper against "this man who is more than a man—and less than one," and his awful power of words, "that can raise a soul to heaven or abase it to hell!" The poet, however, succeeds not only in pacifying his sovereign, but in interesting her in himself and his schemes, and particularly in a certain scheme for the foundation of a national theatre; though her Grace's knowledge of her people warns her that the time is not yet ripe for such an institution, that other nations will first have to set the example, and that probably in 300 years (that is, circa the present day) such a temple of dramatic art and literature may be set up. "You and I will be ashes then," says her Grace, sadly; but William foresees and foreshadows his own immortality and hers. And, on his loyal "God Save the Queen!" and her proud "Amen!" the curtain falls.

Original! Yes, and welcome on that ground alone, says the reviewer of The Pall Mall Gazette. But fifty times more welcome for the drollery with which part of it is written, and the sheer splendor of some of its more serious passages. The most comical thing in it is its picture of a Shakespeare picking up striking phrases from the talk of his interlocutors, and promptly making a note of them for use in his plays. For instance, the warder, at first sight of him, cries, "Angels and ministers of grace, defend us!" and the dramatist makes a note of the exclamation then and there. "Frailty, thy name is woman!" is another coinage similarly borrowed of the warder; and when, noting the literary gentleman's little dodge, the worthy sentinel calls him a snapper-up of unconsidered trifles, he makes a note of that, too, in high delight.

The conversation of the Queen proves even more profitable. She babbles in her sleep of the freckles that have come upon her hands, and moans that all the perfumes of Arabia will not wash them out. "All the perfumes of Arabia!" echoes the playwright luxuriously. "The music of the phrase!" Down it goes. And when, later, he bursts into a rhapsody on the magic of words, he thrills not only the Queen on the stage, but the audience in the theatre, and we listen for a few moments to an eloquence such as we rarely hear nowadays, except in a theatre, and even there only when Bernard Shaw happens to be the orator.

And, comical as this Shakespeare's system of snapping-up appears, and ludicrous as sound certain denunciations of his popular comedies "As You Like It" and "Much Ado About Nothing" in comparison with the tragedies which are being played at the Globe to empty benches, the creation is one that should finally silence those stupid people who have taken various little flights of patent nonsense, together with sundry most excellent pieces of criticism, to imply that Mr. Shaw is the only sane person in Europe who declines to recognize the mastery of Shakespeare.

STEVENSON AT COLLEGE

An intimate view of Stevenson as an undergraduate is given in an article published by the Kansas City Star. It shows him at the period when he was forming his literary ideals and method under the influence of a great professor. The account is as follows:

A tall boy, very slender, with piercing dark eyes and black hair, surmounted by a Highland tam-o'-shanter; living within himself, little known by his fellow-students and seemingly without enthusiasm for his college work—that is the way Robert Louis Stevenson, the writer, is remembered by Dr. D. S. Stephens, chancellor of the Kansas City (Kan.) university, who was a classmate of Stevenson in the university of Edinburgh in 1869-70.

In the same class was a robust, blue-eyed, light-haired boy who always was a leader in class work and in the university activities. He was Henry Drummond, later known to the world as a scientist and writer.

"Few of us expected much of Stevenson," Dr. Stephens told a visitor, "but all the upper classmen felt sure Drummond would be heard from later in life. Stevenson always wore a tam-o'-shanter and he usually had a Scotch plaid sash across his breast and around his waist. We didn't feel well enough acquainted with him to ask why he clothed himself that way. He made us feel always that he preferred to be by himself. Drummond won several prizes in scholarship, but Stevenson's name never was in any such list. Drummond used to argue with the professors, but if Stevenson ever disagreed with them he kept it to himself.

"There was one professor in whom Stevenson showed a particular interest. He never missed a lecture by Dr. David Masson, professor of English literature and rhetoric, and the influence of Dr. Masson's teaching is discernable in his writings. The professor was a personal friend of Thomas Carlyle, whom he resembled in appearance. His 'Life of Milton' and other books are masterpieces of style. 'Prevailing Objectivity' was his hobby. He preached the doctrine of the concrete in writing in all his lectures."

Dr. Stephens then referred to the notes he took from Dr. Masson's lectures forty years ago. The notes were written in pencil in the classroom and never have been copied, but he made them out readily. "Now here's one of the professor's points that I remember well: 'The objective includes the subjective more surely than the subjective includes the objective.' He used to insist that we write of abstract things in concrete forms. He urged us to get away from generalities, and to state things in a way that would capture the reader's interest by specific application rather than repel it by a formidable wall of cold words. Intelligibility he regarded as the prime virtue of literature. After that came non-offensiveness, vivacity, beauty and richness, in the order named. His three canons for general writing were truth, prevailing objectivity and the stating of facts rather than the writer's conclusions. To illustrate the matter of classifying the significant details he used to tell of Sir Walter Scott's remark to William Allen, who was painting a picture to illustrate a scene in 'Marmion.' 'I have only to provide a moor, clouds of smoke above it and the flash of swords,' Scott said. 'The reader will supply the rest of the picture of a battle. You have to put the details into your painting or it will mean nothing.'

"Stevenson's style is of the purest, and it was to style that he was paying most attention at Edinburgh. He used to imitate the style of Shakespeare, and Milton and Scott and other great writers. He studied each in turn, meantime absorbing every word of Dr. Masson's lectures. And the same was true of Dr. John Watson, known as Ian MacLaren, and Barrie Low, the Scotch novelist, both of whom were students at Edinburgh about that time. And Masson's influence is to be seen in their writings as well as in those of Stevenson.

"And while Dr. Masson was influencing the novelists, Dr. Henry Calderwood, professor of moral philosophy, was having an equally great effect upon Henry Drummond's thought. Dr. Calderwood was free from the dogmas of the typical professor. His aim was to make his students think for themselves and teach them to make others think. Drummond's books and teachings bear witness to Calderwood's success in that line."

Dr. Stephens considers "Treasure Island" the best example of Stevenson's skill. "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," Dr. Stephens considers an excellent example of Stevenson's philosophy, which always was optimistic, despite his ill-health. Dr. Stephens went to the Scotch university after being graduated from Adrian college in Michigan. He had worked under Dr. Calderwood and Dr. Masson. He went to Kansas City, Kan., eleven years ago, when the university was founded. He has been its chancellor ever since.

PARISIAN THEATRES

The Paris opera, the Opera Comique, the Comedie Francaise and the Odeon all receive subventions from the state. The average cost of a performance at the Opera last year was $3,220, and the average receipts $3,056. There was a general increase in the cost of management, and the loss for the year was $28,000, which is far from discouraging when it is considered that the loss the great theatre had in 1909 was $768,000. The total receipts of the Opera Comique were $768,000, about $100 less than the expenditures. This deficit was owing to increased pay of employees. The Odeon is becoming a paying institution for the first time. The Comedie Francaise, which always makes money, had net profits of $88,439.

THE ASCENT TO IGNORANCE

By E. FRENCH STROTHER

"Dear! dear!" you exclaim, "here is that impossible person again, twisting phrases and trying to be clever simply by saying things wrong."

There are two easy answers to that. The first is, that this page has repeatedly been guaranteed to be information-proof. The second is, that merely because a belief is old is no proof that it is right, and further, that even an old belief which is right may be only half of the truth. So let us be good-natured and candid, and see if there may not be something to justify our title, "The Ascent to Ignorance."

Of course, the old belief was the converse of this. All schools have taught that man has emerged from darkness, climbed from an abyss of ignorance, scaled the heights of knowledge and power. Well, has he? Somebody told you he has, but has he? That's our question. Let's not take somebody's say-so for things: let's look for the truth ourselves.

Our point is this: the benighted prehistoric cave dweller may not have known many things, but the things he knew he did know. But the enlightened modern man does not know anything. Life is to him one huge interrogation point. The cave man had no doubts. The modern man has nothing else. As far as the limited cave mind went, its knowledge was absolute. It dealt only with certainties. The cave man knew that he existed, that the sun rose and set, that hunger must be satisfied, that certain acts meant death. The modern imagination has progressed infinitely beyond the wildest dreams of the cave man. But it has progressed from the vivid white light of absolute knowledge into a gray and indeterminate fog of doubt.

Let us be explicit—illustrate by an example. Take the idea of God. Did the ancient cave man know there was a God? The question answers itself. He stood every moment in the living presence of God and had no more doubt of His existence than he had of his own. That overwhelming Fact roared itself into his consciousness in every wintry blast, crept into it in every falling leaf, shone in the rising sun and gloomed in the pitchy night, just as the Resurrection was yearly enacted before him by the budding green of spring and as Salvation was borne in upon him by the life-preserving harvest of fruits and nuts.

What does the modern man know about God? Fifteen thousand Christian sects have differed as to who and what He is. Fifteen thousand million people, probably, have differed in minor degrees of faith in and conception of Him. Does anybody know? Few are they who would dare to say they do, and fewer still who in their inmost hearts have not at some time had their doubts.

A like ascent from knowledge to ignorance has taken place in nearly every line of human thought. The ancient cave man had no doubt that he existed. His stomach cried aloud too often for that, his body was in too imminent danger of destruction, and he had observed that so far as this world was concerned, the destruction of the body was synchronous with a permanent suspension of the spirit. But what of the modern man? Does he know that he exists? Wise philosophers have doubted it, many who are the reservoirs of knowledge have questioned it, many thousands of intelligent people flatly deny it. A large and materially successful sect has grown up which denies the existence of material things, including even the material body. This, surely, is an ascent from knowledge to ignorance.

But, you protest, you are using your words all wrong. You don't mean knowledge, you mean faith; you don't mean ignorance, you mean doubt. Ah, my friend, where do you draw the line? Let us say that you know that blood is red. How do you know it? I've seen it, you answer. Exactly. But when you saw it and announced that it was red, you based your knowledge on the faith that your senses did not deceive you, the faith that your nervous system reacted normally to stimulation, that your brain correctly registered the message of the nerves, that your perception of red is the same as the perception of red enjoyed by everybody else. Here are four acts of sheer faith—the number could easily be multiplied—involvement in your vaunting assertion of knowledge. No, no; knowledge is merely faith in the truth of what we think to be true.

And right here is where the cave man had his advantage over the modern man in the exactness and positiveness of his knowledge. There was no hiatus between the faith and the fact in his mind. The connection was instant and absolute. Speak to him of God and he showed you instantly God in ten thousand forms, as vivid as the trees and streams wherein He dwelt. He was the God of the tree, the God of the chase, the God of war, the God of fruitfulness—an omnipresent and omnipotent God, as present as the scene before one's eyes. Speak to the modern man about God, and he will hesitate while his mind traverses the myriad conceptions of Him that confuse and trouble the modern mind. God has become a hazy hypothesis. He is farther away, by ten thousand leagues of perception, than He was to the savage mind.

"This is all very well," you reply, "but let us get down to matters not purely speculative. Take our modern science. Here, at least, we know, and know absolutely, many things the cave man never dreamed."

Well, here you are partly right and partly wrong. In little things, science does know more. But in the big things science quickly becomes as speculative as religion ever was, and with no more basis for faith. You speak glibly of the "law of gravitation," for instance. Pin the best physicist living down to it, and he will deny that there is any such "law." There is such a "hypothesis," and infinite reasons for believing it to be a correct hypothesis, but it is a speculative conception at best, and in the nature of things not susceptible of proof, no more susceptible of proof than is the speculative conception of God.

Again, what does your science know about the composition of matter? The very dust at your feet has defied the most knowing. True, you have the molecular theory and the atomic theory, but what do you know? There are dozens of theories; not one certainty. The microscope actually widened the vistas of doubt instead of narrowing the field of research. Now much is hoped from the ultra microscope, that marvelous device for retaining an image conveyed by light rays too rapid in their flight for optical grasp. Perhaps—we say perhaps—when it is perfected, and the tiniest speck of matter has been magnified its four hundred million times a million times in size, we may know. But just as likely we will only have multiplied the problem a few million times.

That is part of our trouble. The vastness of the truth has dawned upon us, rather than knowledge of the truth. Wherever we turn we see infinity stretching beyond, unexplored and as yet inexplicable. We see nothing plain; we see, instead, gigantic shapes, whirling chaoses of tremendous uncertainties, Cyclopean fogs of doubt.

"Here! here!" you exclaim, "wait a moment. Maybe all you say is true. Maybe the savage did know and maybe we don't, but wouldn't you rather be a modern ignoramus than a savage savant? Aren't we better off, anyhow?"

Now that's quite another story. And the answer depends on the point of view. If you enjoy the intellectual gymnastics, by all means it is better to be a William James or a Kant, a Bacon or a Socrates, than to be Ab, the cave dweller. But if you mean that we possess more practical knowledge, I say no: the cave man knew more than we do. He knew all he needed to know. We know only an infinitesimal part of what we need to know. The cave man, in that respect, had millions of times the better of us.

But we did not set out to argue that question: we merely undertook to show that man has progressed from exact knowledge, however limited, to hazy ignorance, however vast. Consider government as another example of this progress. In the cave dweller's lexicon, government meant rule by force, and nothing else. The strong ruled, and there was an end on't. What does the modern man know about government? Nothing, except that ten thousand various forms of government have been tried—all failures. The cave man had no science of government because he needed none: he knew that what the big man with the club said was the law of the land, and he ordered his life by that simple but exact knowledge. The modern man prattles about a science of government, whereas he really has no such science and knows only the history of a mournful pageant of past unsuccesses.

Medicine? The cave man knew the beneficent from the poisonous and ate only the good. He had his healing herbs and physics. And he knew the limitations of his medical knowledge and with fortitude, when those limitations were reached, attuned his mind to peaceful dissolution. The modern man has multiplied the pharmacopeia, he has charted the anatomy, he has observed endlessly the functionings of the organs, he has improved surgery—and he has bred in the public mind a degree of false hope in his powers so widespread and a fear of death so acute, that most of us dare not approach the veil other than under the fortifying powers of dazzling stimulants.

What does the modern man know? At every avenue of research he stands at the gate of cosmic mysteries, impenetrable doubts. Every material science, pursued to the limits of the human understanding, ends at a question mark. The cave man knew: the modern man doubts. The cave man had certain advantages over us. Perhaps, on the other hand, we have certain advantages over him.

PEOPLE

Mrs. Helen M. Wixson, who has just been elected state superintendent of public instruction in Colorado, is said to owe her election to the non-partisan vote of the women. Though the Democrats swept the state, Mrs. Wixson, who was nominated by the Republicans, received a large majority, women without regard for party lines voting for her.

Miss Agnes Deans-Cameron has been sent to England by the Canadian government to lecture on the advisability of emigrating to Canada. Before going over to the mother country Miss Deans-Cameron traveled extensively over Canada for the purpose of investigation, the means for doing this being furnished by the government. She proved so successful that the Australian government has followed the example of Canada by sending Miss Beatrice Grimshaw to explore Papua, British New Guinea, with reference to its opportunities for settlers.

Mrs. Nellie Archibald of Ashland, Wis., has been elected treasurer of Ashland county. She is the first woman in Wisconsin to hold such an office. She defeated the two opposing candidates about two to one at the polls. Mrs. Archibald is the widow of a former treasurer and acted as his deputy for several years. She is an expert accountant. When she first applied to have her name put on the official ballot the right was denied to her.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

Little Mabel's Christmas Presents

Santa Claus comed to our house las' year
 And bringed me a present 'at you can't guess.
 An' mama she said, "Sech presents is queer,
 Now ain't they, Elijer?" an' pa said, "Yes."
 They was two of the presents. A bruvver was one,
 An' he didn't have teef like grown-uppers
 do,
 An'—I fink 'at you'll laugh before I get done—
 The uvver one it was a bruvver, too.

An' I've had bofe them presents sence Chris-mas las' year,
 An' sometimes they laughs an' sometimes they cries,
 An' when they are cryin' I can't see a tear,
 But mama says, "Bessum" an' papa he sighs;
 An' mama she said that them presents was mine,
 But soon as I touched 'em she hollered,
 "Take care!"
 An' I do not fink 'at a present is fine,
 When jus' to play wiv 'em your mama 'll scare.

Of course I like bruvvers—'at is, if they're good—
 But I hope when ole Santa comes ridin' about
 He'll bring me a doll an' a Red Ridin' Hood,
 So no one 'll holler, "Be careful! Look out!"
 I'm 'spectin' of presents, an' hope for the best,
 A dolly that talks if her tummy you touch,
 Or somefin like 'at, but no bruvvers, I guess,
 For jus' two such presents is almos' too much.

* * *

Concerning Christmas

I believe that Christmas could be made the most happy, the most cheery, the most blessed day in the year, and this without lamentable drawbacks, if all of us would determine to make it so. If all the world of men, women and children would unite to make it what it could be, ah, what a millenium day it would be! As it is, it largely is a day for making those of us who are comfortable more comfortable still; as for the rest, it really is too bad about them, but "the poor ye have always with you," and we may as well be philosophical about it. We are well fed, well housed, well clothed. It is unfortunate about those who are not, but—what Christmas presents did you get?

Over in San Francisco, years ago, I met a small girl who was a hopeless skeptic on the subject of Santa Claus.

"I've prayed an' prayed for him to bring me a doll or somefin," she said, "but he never did. I don't b'lieve there is no Santa Claus."

Oh, woeful pessimism and agnosticism born of the hard facts of a hard life unfit for babes to know! But you and I, who need nothing, will receive much, and those who need somewhat, that they may live, will receive nothing, or if they receive a little, it will be doled out to them.

It is your fault, and mine, that this condition exists, on this one day, at least. We might see that our gifts go to those who need, not to those who possess in sufficiency; we might make it understood that we would prefer that gifts meant for us should go to those whose need is told in gaunt faces and ill-clad forms. Doing thus, what a truly blessed day it would be, blessed for both giver and receiver.

But we will not do this thing. We are not that far along on the narrow, glorified way the Nazarene pointed out. What a pity it is that we are not! What a wonderful Christmas Day of Christmas Days this would be if we were!

* * *

"Did your mama whip you when you was a little girl, mama?"

"Yes, for she felt that it was best for me."

"And did she whip you real often?"

"She did, because she knew I deserved it."

Little Willie (after consideration)—Gee!
 How our family has improved since you were a little girl, hasn't it, mama?

The Opinions of Rufus

I'm jest like you, Abel; I'm a sot believer in compromisin'—my way.

They ain't much logic in a woman's "because," but I've 'bout made up my mind it leads to truth full es often es a man's "consequently an' therefore."

I'd ruther that folks wouldn't lie 'bout me, but ofener'n not I perfer that to their tellin'
 the truth.

Still, no matter how mean folks talk 'bout me, they's a mighty good chance they won't tell es mean es I know.

After analyzin' some men that's talked 'bout most I'm 'most ready to take my chances on them that's mentioned less.

Someway or other I've got an impression that the only kind of righteousness that's a misht in Heaven is self-righteousness—an' that's the kind some reel prosperous citizens carry.

It's mighty hard for any man to git other people to rate him any higher than he rates himself.

Josh Bings says a hen's the blamedest fool created, but he never met some of the folks I have.

Folks used to think that "meet 'er by moonlight alone" was the best payin' snap on earth, but that wus 'fore gas meters wus invented.

I writ to Helen Gould askin' her why 'tis that all the best self-respectin' brains in some families runs to one person, but she never ans'ered me.

I've heerd that there is sev'ral poets that bust into raphers over sunrises that never has seen one.

If us that lives is examples of the survival of the fittest, let's rejoice, brethren an' sisters, that the other kind didn't hang on.

* * *

Excepting You and Me

The lawyer aids the grafter if he has the coin to pay,

Yet he prates about his "honor" in the old,
 familiar way;

The preacher whacks the sinner, as he ought to do, I'm told,

But he's apt to overlook him if a "pillar" in his fold;

The apples that the farmer sells on top your praise must claim,

But how they dwindle down below I've always held a shame,

And, thinking of these painful facts, the truth
 I plainly see

That everybody goes astray—excepting you
 and me.

Milady fair is shocked to meet her sisters of the fall,

Forgetful of some quiet scenes she mentions not at all;

Paul Holyman is nobler far than other folk
 he sees,

And so each day he thanks the Lord "that I am not as these,"

The old prayer of the pharisee, forgetful that our clay

In saint and sinner is the same forever and alway,

And noting this, or noting that, to make the claim I'm free

That everybody wobbles some—excepting you
 and me.

Yes, everybody wobbles some (of course excepting us);

They mean to be exalted, free—and have to wear a truss;

They see the right and yearn for it, quite honestly they do,

But just as they are near its goal they're buried in a slough;

And, noting that these things are true—I've noted them full oft,

Have shed a tear for sinners or at sinfulness have scoffed—

I've just about concluded, and I trust that you agree,

That everybody stubs his toe—excepting you
 and me.

Opposition to a Water Trust

After three monthseller had asked for a State for a drop of water to use in his tongue, and had been refused, he thought of the matter bitterly for a few thousand years.
 After that he hired a hall, and addressed an enthusiastic meeting of the Parched Tongue Society.

"Fellow Gaspers," he said, "my experience on earth convinced me that many trusts are excellent institutions. For example, an oil trust, a bankers' trust, or even a railway trust is a soft snap. But after some ages of carrying my tongue on Edison's patented tongue-receiver, I am convinced that this water trust is wholly iniquitous. I assure you that not a drop of water has come from my faucet since I can remember. Every time I turn it it helches out flame, which is discouraging, and I assume that a majority of you meet with the same difficulty. Under these distressing circumstances, I have prepared some resolutions, as follow, which I respectfully but heatedly submit for your indorsement:

"Whereas, this water trust cinch has been maintained so long as to hurt our feelings—
 and,

"Whereas, its facilities are so inadequate that not a drop of water has reached our bath-tubs in many moons, and,

"Whereas, the only kind of a trust in which we believe (as we constantly maintained on earth) is the kind that benefits us, and the present rigidly-maintained water trust does not; therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we are utterly and unalterably opposed to the Cerulean Water Trust, and unqualifiedly demand that it be at once dissolved."

The resolution was adopted by an absolutely unanimous vote, but there is no record that any attention has been paid to it as yet.

* * *

No Pay for These

The melancholy-looking man who came into the office took my chair and sat down.

"Say," he then inquired, "do you pay for jokes?"

"We do," I replied, "if they pass the test."

"What's the test?" he asked.

"Why, the author of the joke reads it to me, and if I laugh he gets paid for it; otherwise he does not," I explained.

"Well, you bet you'll laugh at this, I wrote it myself, and it's awfully funny. The joke is made of two definitions, you know. I can't help laughing at it myself, even if I did make
 it. Just listen:

"Insurgent—A citizen who yearns to do—
 good.

"Reactionary—A citizen who yearns to do —anybody he can."

"Haw haw haw! Ain't that rich. It's a corker! I don't see how I ever happened to think of it, and—Why in thunder don't you laugh?"

I really should have liked to please him, but—well, could you laugh at that sort of thing? I did my best, but I failed, and the man went away very much offended. After he had gone I said the definitions over to myself, and tried to work up a smile, but it was "no go."

* * *

Strictly Imaginary Story

"The correspondence file shows a remarkable case yesterday."

"What was it?"

"It was so remarkable that he hasn't got over his astonishment yet."

"Very well, but what was it?"

"He found one of his patriotic supporters who didn't want an office."

E. B. It must not be forgotten that a justifiable criticism of the foregoing story is that it is so unnatural that the intelligent reader will not be likely to believe it.)

* * *

The great Recording Angel sighed

"My patience most," he said, "is tried,

Not by ill deeds that mortals rue,

But what they meant, but didn't do."

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor The California Weekly:

I am an ardent reader of The California Weekly. I have read your issue of December 9 and I am sure to recall the names of men who have played that God-like attribute in fighting for truth and right—and against error and wrong—in affairs national, state and municipal. In your issue of December 9 I find this: "The charter election of Oakland is in full swing. The chief opponent to this upward and forward step is the saloon, which was to be anticipated, for no good thing can be achieved without first whipping that institution to a frazzle."

It required a high degree of moral courage to publish that in this city where the rum sellers institute has its headquarters from whence its political decrees are proclaimed—and ratified by a majority, or plurality, of the city's electors. On my roll of honor your name leads all the rest. The arrogance and mischievousness of the rum sellers institute must be severely rebuked, whipped to a frazzle.

But an army of whippers! Where can they be recruited? Our middle-aged electors will not help—it hurts business. Our young electors are too wise to fight it. They have noted the fact that none but the institution's "nominee" can win political honors—or share political patronage. Every saloon is a recruiting camp for the institution's army of touts, pimps, lusers, drunkards, confidence men, thieves, wrecks and derelicts. Strange as it seems, it is true, that the chief source of revenue for the upkeep of the institution's recruiting camps is derived from industrious, respectable men who from habit only throw their money over public bars—thoughtlessly, needlessly and too liberally. The problem of reducing the number of saloons is not a difficult one. Let reputable men abstain from patronizing public bars. No oath of total abstinence, or prohibition, but a resolution to cease supporting them. An adherence to such a resolution will materially aid in the preservation of their own health, public morality, the future of their children, their self respect and freedom from the tyrannical rule of rum sellers. Liquor dealers, wholesale and retail, are leagued in intolerant hostility to temperance. Let those who resent that league's attitude quietly, but firmly, withhold further contributions to that league's support.

JOHN T. DARE.

San Francisco, December 13, 1910.

This paper takes to itself no credit for courage in opposing the American saloon as an institution, for the reason that the saloon never has and never will stand for the things that this paper stands for. It is a public enemy and no one fit to fight any fight will hesitate to attack the public enemy at every favorable opportunity.

The suggestion in the foregoing that gentlemen, out of sheer self-respect, institute a boycott against the saloon is a good one. All over the east drinking among gentlemen during business hours is taboo, and any perpendicular drinking at all on the part of gentlemen is becoming so. Gentlemen keep liquors in their private lockers or seat themselves with their friends about a cafe table to discuss a bottle of wine, sip a cocktail or imbibe a mug of beer at their leisure. For any young man to be seen passing in or out through doors that swing both ways is a distinct handicap to his progress.

Only one service of real value is performed by the American saloon and that is the furnishing of public comfort stations for men, but whoever avails himself of them is expected to spend something over the bar. This is a need that the municipality of the future will supply at least once in every block, just as our highways of the future will be supplied with watering places for animals at convenient distances to obviate dependence upon the watering troughs of roadhouses.

General Grant's natural timidity was overcome by reflecting that the enemy was just as much afraid of him as he was of the enemy, and when a man who detests the American saloon comes to understand that the saloon is just as much afraid of him as he is of the saloon the saloon will lose its terror for those who go into either business or politics. Give us a straight line-up of all those who are for and those who are against the saloon and the anti-saloon people can beat them every time, but not on an issue of prohibition, which commends itself neither to the judgment nor the consciences of many just and moral men.

The terror in which the saloon lives is well exemplified in the truth that while the saloons of San Francisco are, as a whole, in financial straits, because there are three thousand drinking places where one thousand would be an over-supply, and three hundred a sufficiency, yet saloon men struggling for an existence dare not lend a hand toward closing a single drinking place—the one thing that stands in the way of the financial prosperity of those that survive. The fear that if divided among themselves they will all fall causes them to all stand together in resistance to every good thing though all are made poor by that policy.

The vote in Oakland, against shutting saloons out of residence districts, doubtless owed its humiliating result to this cause, although the closing of the residential saloons must greatly have profited those at the trading centers.

The saloon has not to be politically whipped before any good thing can be done and those who stand for Right Things may as well make up their minds to it first as last and gird on their armor, not of prohibition, but of local option that shall drive roadhouses out of the country and saloons out of the residential districts of cities and towns, limiting and regulating everywhere.

The Watchman, California Weekly:

Dear Sir: In your discussion last week you have championed the naval auxiliary plan as a substitute for our lost merchant marine. There is one clear argument against this substitute. The United States government cannot act as efficiently, as agent of our producers, as the agents of the steamship companies, who make American commercial expansion the means of extending their business. For example, the German lines have offices in every center of population, for the benefit of their patrons.

Public opinion, you suggest, opposes subsidies, because of the distrust of special privileges. But have not all tariff protected industries special privileges? And is not our merchant marine an industry that from its very nature cannot be cured by the old panacea of protective tariff? To be just, should not our merchant marine be protected to the extent of the difference between the cost of maintenance at home and abroad? And who is better fitted to regulate the bounties than the newly created tariff commission? The commission which we hope will stop the dangers of tariff privilege.

Respectfully yours,

ROBERT K. VICKERY.

780 Kingston avenue, Piedmont Station, Oakland, December 12, 1910.

The merchant marine problem is not easy. Many strong minds are considering it, and the strongest are much perplexed. We do not regard the objection to the auxiliary navy idea, raised in the foregoing, as conclusive. What the national government cannot do in the way of drumming up trade American boards of trade and enterprising merchants and manufacturers can do if they will and if they won't what's the use anyhow? Combined behind a tariff wall they have grown so rich practicing extortion upon our own people that they have treated foreign commerce as of relatively small importance.

By parity of reasoning fostering by subsidy may be no worse than fostering by excessive tariffs, but the sentiment of the people is to be taken into account and that sentiment is distinctly hostile to subsidies.

Besides, to equalize the foreign and American standards of prices and wages by subsidies for the sustaining of a rehabilitated American merchant marine that would permit American ships manned by American seamen to do half our carrying trade would swamp the national treasury. Outside of sweatshops nowhere are wages so low as in the merchant marines of foreign countries.

What the American capitalist wants is freedom to buy his ships in the cheapest market, man them with the cheapest labor the world affords (Lascars, Chinese and Japanese coolies) and, thus outfitted, proudly bear the American flag into every port of the world where a dollar can be made. Our patriotic heart refuses to throb in ecstasy over that spectacle.

And where, pray, under that system, is Uncle Sam to look for able seamen to man his auxiliary navy in time of war? To the Lascars, Chinese and Japanese?

No, there is a certain need to be filled for an auxiliary navy, if we are to have any navy at all. That auxiliary must be made of picked men, men with as good stuff in them as the ships have in them, and it seems to us that the government can supply that need directly to better advantage than indirectly through the good offices of men who will be in the shipping business for what the traffic will bear rather than for the service they can render their country.

Editor The California Weekly:

Very often I see Senator Cummins as a possible candidate for the presidency. I recall his introduction speech at Chicago in which he was alleged to say that it were better to vote for any kind of a Republican rather than a Democrat. If he really said that Cummins is a great disappointment and is hardly of senatorial caliber to say nothing of going higher.

The progressive Republican movement does not lack for strong leaders, even though Dolliver is no more. Beveridge, or La Follette, or, if necessary, Roosevelt, would lead a willing people. Taft, of course, is out of the question. He has been tried and found wanting.

Thanks for the good paper you are giving us. May your power increase.

Yours truly,

F. W. TROWER.

San Francisco, December 10, 1910.

We doubt the correctness of the statement attributed to Senator Cummins. He is a party man and believes that the fight for Right Things must be fought out mainly within the Republican party, but if an Aldrich or a Hale were to be brought forward by the Republicans it is probable that Senator Cummins would throw his influence toward making Iowa Democratic that once anyhow. As to whether William Howard Taft can "come back" we shall know better a year and a quarter later, but the chances now appear to be against that possibility. He is trimming, and neither side will stand for that.

Editor California Weekly:

Dear Sir: The comments recently published in your paper on the life and works of Mrs. Eddy present a view taken by many thoughtful people. For this reason it may be well to note that such a view is from the standpoint of the material as opposed to the spiritual.

If the writer of the article in question had lived in the first century he might have expressed himself in much the same way regarding Jesus and his teachings.

The explanations of life and nature adopted by the physical scientists of two thousand years ago have in our day been completely revolutionized; indeed, the theories of fifty years ago are now largely discarded, while the teachings of Jesus are more firmly established than ever. Shall we then speak of the science of matter as "the only true science," and classify the science which treats of man and his relation to God as "pseudo-science?"

It is a significant fact, to which the article in your paper calls attention, that Christian Science was not built up as the result of plodding laboratory experiment. It was a discovery; and while it required time and scientific perception of the highest order to make this discovery and to see its application to human needs, yet it was not like a theory elaborated to fit a series of recorded phenomena. This discovery was a discerning anew of truths taught and demonstrated by Jesus. The Master of Galilee himself brought into clearer view verities perceived long before by Moses and the prophets.

Then what shall we say of the science of Christianity? Does not the enlightened thought of the twentieth century acknowledge that when the understanding of God and man dawn upon human consciousness its continuance must be without end?

Thanking you for giving space to these comments,

Yours sincerely,

OLcott HASKELL.

San Francisco, December 17, 1910.

There is no science which treats of man and his relation to God. Science has to do with material things and the operations of material laws and there are few discoveries in science that have not been the result of patient search, testing and trying, hypothesizing and verifying, applying known laws to material substances in the hope of achieving desirable ends. To apply the term "science" to a philosophy or to a religion, or to an admixture of philosophy and religion, is to misuse language.

Philosophers may place their feet upon a scientifically demonstrated truth and from that premise erect tall towers of thought of great probability and attractiveness, from which towers they may seem to see God, but science itself stops short of that goal.

Religion has to do with man's relation to God, and religion comes but by revelation. How God reveals himself to the race is an issue of much difficulty, but few there be who doubt that he has done so through all the ages and many there are who believe that he is still revealing himself to men, more and more clearly year by year and generation by generation. How? Where do thoughts come from, anyhow? To what other end have poets and seers, prophets and teachers? For what other reason came The Christ?

Our correspondent speaks truly when he says that it is a "significant fact that Christian Science was not built up as the result of plodding laboratory experiment." It is equally significant that it dare not submit a single one of its "demonstrations" to that plodding, laboratory experimentation on the part of trained scientists worthy of the name whereby alone its claim to be known as a science can be tested, wanting which it must ever be regarded as pseudo. This is not impugning it as a philosophy or as a religion, but only as a science, which it is not and never can be until the abyss separating the material from the spiritual shall be bridged.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Rah! Rah! For the Country Merchant

The suggestion from Washington that the rural free delivery routes might be able to earn some portion of their cost by carrying parcels, if so much of a parcels post system were put into operation as would reach from town to country, has enabled the country merchant to discover more friends than he had dared dream of. They are rising out of the earth, so to speak, and all are fearful lest the country merchant be ruined by this extension of the postal parcels system. It counts for little in soothing the anxieties of these new found friends that it is only proposed to apply the parcels post to the transmission of parcels from the country merchant to his customers living on farms. They are quite sure that, nevertheless, it is all a plot of the reformers to ruin the country merchant and that, the very next thing, we shall have a full parcels post system with the whole retail business of the nation centered in Chicago.

Whoever pretends this solicitude for the country merchant is acting for, and on behalf of, and is probably paid by, the four great express companies, or one or more of them. In truth what is proposed to be done is merely to allow at ordinary postage rates an eleven-pound limit on merchandise transported from the initial point on a rural free delivery route to someone living on that route, and is wholly for the benefit of the free rural delivery system. It will not be of much benefit to it either, because the rates will be found prohibitive except in very special instances.

If ever a general parcels post system is established it will have to be under some system of "zone" limitation whereby the basis rate will carry only so far. In a land of such magnificent distances as ours a flat rate that would not bankrupt the nation would transport few goods. The important consideration at this time is for the country merchant not to permit the greedy express companies to make a cat's paw of him, the more especially that, under the proposed extension of the service, neither the country merchant nor the express companies stand to be hurt.

The Harbor Commission It is an old saying that one must go from home to learn the news at home, and The Watchman is indebted to the Santa Cruz News for a choice morsel. It runs to the effect that a body of grave and prosperous gentlemen of San Francisco took it into their heads to serve the state by making appeal on behalf of the retention in office of the president of the board of harbor commissioners, with the result that something sudden happened.

There runs a general opinion that the present harbor board of San Francisco is a better board than has existed for many years, but it is purely a Herrin board. No one will question that. The best man on the board is probably W. V. Stafford, but, figuratively speaking, he and Mr. Herrin kiss every time they turn the corner. Being under obligations to propel Mr. Herrin out of the government of this state, by the aid of the toe of the boot, how can Governor Johnson keep his pledge and leave W. V. Stafford in office? Will the latter gentleman take the test oath, put on the uniform of a progressive Republicanism and publicly recant his allegiance to the head of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company? It is hardly to be expected of him. In fact, his political subserviency has not been, for instance, like that of Mr. P. S. Teller, his associate on the board, open and notorious. He has served his chief faithfully, but sotto voce, as it were. Unfortunately also, for the good of the service, the terms of the members of the San Francisco harbor board expire in the wrong order. It were better if the term of P. S. Teller expired in March, 1911, rather than 1913, whereas Mr. Stafford passes under the ax by operation of law at the earlier date.

The Harbor Board A Strategic Point Good government in San Francisco is as important as good management of the San Francisco harbor, and the San Francisco water front is one of the strongholds of the associated villainies in the politics of this city. So it has ever been. To leave the harbor board in the possession of Mr. Herrin, if it can be taken out of his possession, would be a dangerous thing to do from the standpoint of the redemption of San Francisco from corporation domination. Doubtless this has occurred to Governor-elect Johnson and if, as reported in the Santa Cruz News, something "sudden" took place at the reported interview, considerations such as these probably suggested themselves to the mind of Mr. Johnson.

It is also worth while to pause to consider whence this spontaneity of acclaim that the present harbor board is the best ever. Has it not mainly emanated from the San Francisco Chronicle? There being two sources of inspiration for things that appear in the Chronicle, an annual retainer and so much per line per issue, one naturally feels some curiosity to know to which of these we are indebted for the Chronicle's favorable opinion of the personnel of the San Francisco harbor board. Other than this, and a general tendency to be courteous and obliging, what is there tangible upon which to base the general impression that the existing harbor board is all right?

Good Thing! Where Are You. When, in 1905, Going to Get Your Money?

Governor Pardee faced his second legislature he found that a condition and not a theory confronted him. The state had begun to grow and the demands upon all the institutions in the state were growing, too. A careful estimate made it apparent that it would require $6,000,000 to put the institutions of the state abreast of their reasonable needs and, of course, not all of that sum could be raised at that session, but this was only a part of the demand that was made for money for this, that and the other perfectly legitimate uses for public money. Every member with a pet appropriation bill in his pocket went to see the governor to enlist him on behalf of the measure. To one and all of these Governor Pardee had one ejaculation to make, one question to propound. It was, "Good thing, but where in 'ell are you going to get your money?"

That question was not as difficult of answer then as it will be the coming winter. Then the only point at issue was how much the people would stand in the way of taxation without rebelling against the administration, the legislature and all the institutions and benefactions of the state, for it then was perfectly easy to predetermine how many dollars would go into the state treasury for every cent added to the state tax levy.

Governor Johnson, on the contrary, will face an unknown quantity. The adoption of amendment number one, and consequent revolution of the state's system of taxation, puts the whole state budget at sea. Many estimates have been made as to how much that scheme of indirect taxation will yield, made in the best of faith, but nothing approaching certainty can be had under a year of trying the thing out, and there seems to be nothing for it except for the incoming administration to cut appropriations to the bone and wait, with the probability that a year hence the legislature may have to be called into extraordinary session for the purpose of readjusting expenditures to revenues or revenues to expenditures in the light of experience.

The Laugh On Eureka

There has been an undercurrent of opinion, pervasive of what the Sacramento Bee calls "Superior California," to the effect that one Englebright really isn't bright, but, everywhere outside of Humboldt county, opinion is likely to shift in Representative Englebright's favor. Even in Eureka there may be, away down low, a tendency to rate him as anyhow too bright for them. There is a strong reform sentiment within the Republican party in Humboldt county, but not even that element could be interested in nominating a better man than Englebright for congress. He looked good to them, for had he not obtained an appropriation of more than a million dollars for the improvement of navigation across the Humboldt bar? He had not. He was only playing that he had. When the skeleton of the rivers and harbors bill emerged from the pork barrel it carried, not a million, but a paltry $15,000. Humboldt bar needs improvement. A million dollars would be none too much to make that harbor as safe as it should be. The Watchman is sorry that Eureka did not get it, but his grief is much assuaged by the reflection that the measure of sympathy that should be Eureka's due would be greatly enlarged but for the fact that that country up there stood for a confessedly inadequate man simply because they thought that they stood to gain something from his renomination and election. In our assortment of banes in our political life this particular one of standing for a candidate merely because he stands a chance to get us an appropriation, and without reference to his fitness for his job—well, there is nothing small about that particular bane. It is a besetting sin for which suffering is a proper retribution.

By Way of Explaining How It So Happened

Reference was made last week to the injurious rumor that supreme court clerk-elect, B. Grant Taylor, had capitulated to the powers that have been and arranged to keep in office the entire clerical force of Clerk Frank Caughey. Report reaches this sanctum to the effect that, if this has been done, this is how it has been done. The present job-holders in that office picked out and canvassed all the attorneys they could find who were likely to be influential with Mr. Taylor and his friends and urged them to give a letter, or join in some form of memorial to Mr. Taylor, setting forth their entire satisfaction with the office as it has been, is now and ever should be world without end, amen! Now these lawyers, having business in that office that an ill disposed clerk might easily "queer," one and all felt one of those betwixt and between, half chilly and half feverish, sensations chasing up and down their macaroni columns that answer for a spine; they felt that they "sorter orter and sorter not" sign, but a trifle more "orter than orter not," for they signed the memorial to Mr. Taylor that the Caughey clerks be retained. If any lawyer signed any commendation of the Caughey clerks when he did not want them, through moral cowardice or for any other reason, such lawyer is wholly unentitled to any measure of sympathy or political influence and should never squeak more, but of course that is not going to make it any more palatable to progressive Republicans in general to know, if such shall unhappily prove to be the fact, that the Herrin machine is to remain in possession of the outer works of the supreme court of California. Uneasy will rest the head of him who, having been nominated by the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League and elected to office, first falls down.

Why Not Switch To a Better Use?

Dr. E. E. Brainard, of Southern California, has in hand a bill to promote the establishment of a state colony for epileptics. The position of the orphan child is indeed unsatisfactory, but that of the epileptic is lamentable. If California shall enter upon any new enterprise in the institutional line the very first one should be a colony for epileptics, to the end that these most unfortunate of beings may be withdrawn from the hospitals for the insane and the home for the feeble minded and be brought together for treatment and study in a single institution devoted to their care. To this end, if nothing else can be done at this time, it would be an act of common sense and humanity to divert to this use the fund already appropriated for an industrial school for dependent children. It would be a wiser benevolence and a finer philanthropy.

State University For Southern California Quite a commotion has been kicked up south of Tehachapi in favor of a big bond voting or other treasury mule.

ing procedure, whereby another state university may be established in Southern California. If those people persist in pushing that enterprise Northern California will buy a broadax and send a committee down to the top of Tehachapi mountain with instructions to chop Southern California off and send it afloat. Another university is not the remedy. The true remedy is already being tentatively applied at Fresno and consists in fitting certain high schools at central points to give the courses given at the state university in the freshman and sophomore years, leaving it to the big universities to instruct through the junior and senior years and do graduate work. County Superintendent Keppel is barking up the wrong tree.

If Southern California wants to do something sensible let it come to Sacramento asking that a state agricultural school be established in that portion of the state, not a college, but a good preparatory school, a school that will teach the young Southern Californian how to farm in Southern California; not a school to turn out agricultural experts, but well trained farmer artisans. That would be something like.

Castles In Santa Barbara It somehow seemed imperative to the Gillett administration that the California State School of Manual Arts and Home Economics be made appurtenant to the very admirable personality of Miss Edna A. Rich, the efficient and enthusiastic instructor in these valued arts at Santa Barbara. As Miss Rich could upon no consideration be induced to leave her beloved Santa Barbara, where roses blow and zephyrs waft, of course the school had to be taken to her there. Its beginning was humble enough perhaps, but the climate of San Diego is not better adapted to seeing visions and dreaming dreams than is that of Santa Barbara, and Miss Rich has been at it. From what The Watchman hears she dreams not in the abstract, but in the concrete. In fine, she wants a trifling appropriation of $250,000 wherewith to erect, equip and install her school in a re-enforced concrete building suited to teaching California teachers how to teach manual training, domestic science and domestic art, branches that much need to be taught. "Good thing! But where in—the immediate future—is she going to get the money?"

Senator Roseberry On Employer's Liability It has been given out that Senator Roseberry will carry to Sacramento when he goes a well thought-out measure for enforcing the employer's liability for accidents befalling employees. The rest of the world has much to teach us in this regard and we shall do well to avail ourselves of it all before legislating more than tentatively. A legislature might easily do more harm than good, and yet the principle is sound. No greater wrong was done this commonwealth by the Southern Pacific Company than when, years ago, having at last manipulated the selection of supreme justices to its liking, that corporation availed itself of the first favorable opportunity to secure from its court a decision validating the fellow servant principle, designed for a shop, in its application to a railroad in which men working for the same employer may be hundreds of miles apart and may never have so much as heard of one another's existence. It was a most wretched business creditable to no one connected therewith.

But we must not by statute go to the other extreme and so increase the hazards of employment as to make men reluctant to employ. The risks of accident must be reduced to a minimum. Inspection and responsibility will achieve that end, but the industry, rather than the individual, should be chargeable with the risk as an element in the cost of production. The careless ditch digger who drives a pick through his own foot should be aided rather than indemnified, and that idea also should characterize any employer's liability law enacted.

Republican Legislative Conference to Convene The committee appointed by Mr. Meyer Lissner to draft suggested laws to carry out the platform pledges of the Republican party, will meet in conference next Thursday and Friday, Dec. 29th and 30th, at the Palace hotel, San Francisco, to hear the reports of each committee. Many members of the legislature, other state officials, and newspapermen from all over California have signified their intention of attending, as well as the committee themselves. This is a proper time to remind the public that the recommendations of these committees are purely advisory and in no sense attempts to usurp the legislative function. But they will undoubtedly dispose of a lot of preliminary discussion of these measures and clear the issues so that the task of the legislature will be greatly simplified. Many of the objections to the measures will have been threshed out before the legislature meets, leaving the discussions of the senate and assembly free to deal with only the most important details.

COUNTY LIBRARY SYSTEM

The first annual conference of California county librarians is to be held at the California state library in Sacramento December 28th and 29th. This will be one of the most significant library meetings ever held in California, as it formally marks the inauguration of a movement whereby the entire people of any county adopting the county library system may have free and unlimited library privileges.

Although the plan of forming county library systems has been actively carried on in this state for only about a year it has already been adopted by twelve counties, and several more are preparing to start in. Those already having adopted the system are Santa Barbara, San Joaquin, Alameda, Sacramento, Modoc, Tulare, Fresno, Kern, Merced, Madera, Yolo and Del Norte counties, all of which will be represented at the conference by the librarians in charge of the county library system. Other leading librarians including William R. Watson of San Francisco, Purd B. Wright of Los Angeles, Charles S. Greene of Oakland, and James L. Gillis, state librarian, will attend.

The county library movement is being received with much enthusiasm all over the state, and is being watched with eager interest by the library world all over the United States, as it offers possibilities in library extension such as no other state in the union has reached; and which, when fully adopted, will make the library as complete in its area of service as the school system is. It will be the work of the coming conference to plan and discuss the best means of making the county library most effective.

EXTEND THE CHARITY YOU NEED

When you feel inclined to say that mean thing about the girl across the street, Mabel—well, don't say it. To be sure, it may be true that she should be ashamed of herself; but how about that thing of which you should be ashamed that you did? Would you like to have it advertised, even by word of mouth? Probably not.

You see, Mabel, it is a fact that there is not a man, woman or child of us all who has not done regrettable things, things of which he or she should be, and, I trust, is, ashamed. There is not a one of us, no matter how lofty the place the world accords him in its esteem, on whose moral shins are not the scars he has borne since the day he went astray and fell. I tell you, my dear girl, if we would extend charity to this world, as we should, we need but look at ourselves and see how sorely we need it. How can we meanly gossip about our neighbor when all the time we know that our house is glass and that each ugly thing we say of him may be returned to us with interest?

On the whole Mabel, I guess that I would not say it. In the end you might learn that the girl on the other side of the street is not dumb.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of SARA JACOBS, deceased.
Notice is hereby given by the undersigned executor of the last will of Sara Jacobs, deceased, to the creditors of, and to all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers within 10 months after the first publication of this notice to the said executor at his office, Room 909 Kohl Building, Corner Montgomery and California Streets, San Francisco, which said office the undersigned selects as his place of business in all matters connected with said estate of Sara Jacobs, deceased.

LESTER H. JACOBS,
Executor of the last will of Sara Jacobs, deceased.
Dated, San Francisco, November 18, 1910.

ISAAC FROHMAN, Attorney for the Executor.
11-18-6t

SHEAR WIT

"And after awhile," said the narrator, "our automobile party came to a wide stream. There was no ferry, no bridge. There seemed to be no way of getting the machine over." "And what did you do?" asked the innocent bystander. "Why, we just sat down and thought it over."—Yonkers Statesman.

"I met Flossie McCracken, today." "What did she have on?" "A hobbie gown, and she neither noticed nor spoke to me." "She was probably afraid that if she did she would fall down."—Houston Post.

Thelma, while visiting her grandmother in Valentine lane, discovered a marble-top table in the parlor—the first she had ever seen. Running to her mother, she exclaimed "Oh, mamma! Grandma has a table in the front room with a tombstone on it!"

A little boy was entertaining the minister the other day until his mother could complete her toilet. The minister to make congenial conversation inquired: "Have you a dog?" "Yes, sir, a dachshund," responded the lad. "Where is he?" questioned the dominie, knowing the way to a boy's heart. "Father sends him away for the winter. He says it takes him so long to go in and out the door he cools the whole house off."—Success.

"I want to get two pounds of tripe," said the lady entering the shop. "Sorry, ma'am," replied the keeper, "but we haven't any tripe today. 'No tripe? Why, it's in season.'" "No, ma'am, there's no tripe being shot just now." "No tripe being shot! Why, what are you talking about?" "I—I should say, ma'am, that the fisheries commission won't allow tripe to be caught now." "Are you crazy, man? I don't want fish! I want tripe!" "Well, what in thunder is tripe, ma'am?" "Why—why, I don't know just what it is, but if you haven't got any I'll try some other place."—Yonkers Statesman.

A bit of unconscious humor is imbedded in the solid narrative of W. S. E. Russell in a recent issue of the Springfield (Mass.) Republican. He says: "Beneath this lava sheet is Surtshellir cave, the greatest lava cave in the world. Two of these caverns, each like a trolley subway, parallel each other. One has been known for centuries, the other was discovered last year. We explored the former."

Miss Bute—How dared you kiss me! Didn't you hear me say "Sir!" when you asked me if you might? Jack Slinger—I thought you said "Cert."—Boston Transcript.

The irate passenger who got on the train at Strafford glowered at the conductor who had asked him for his ticket. "Do you know that this train is fifteen minutes late," he sputtered. "Fifteen minutes late—it's an outrage. You oughtn't to expect your passengers to pay for such service as this! Scandalous, that's what it is. Fifteen minutes late! Fifteen min—" "Yes, I know," responded the conductor, soothingly. "We're running it that way on purpose. We have a dispatch from Byrn Mawr that some hold-up men are lying in wait for us just the other side of Rosemont, and we're in hopes we can delay the train so long that they catch cold and get rheumatism."—Philadelphia Times.

Friend—They say you've made $100,000 since you held office. Statesman—So I've heard. Friend—Aren't you going to deny the story? Statesman—No. It causes unpleasant gossip, of course, but it's fine for my credit.—Cleveland Leader.

"That umpire," remarked the stranger in the grand stand, "doesn't seem to be popular with the crowd." "Oh, he doesn't mind a little thing like that," rejoined the native. "He was formerly a government weather fore-caster."—Chicago News.

Willis—So the play will appeal to all classes? Gillis—Yes, indeed. It's three-quarters full of up-to-date slang to catch the young people, and one-quarter full of old, reliable cuss-words to get the old fellows.—Puck.

THE NEED FOR THE MERIT SYSTEM

AND A SUGGESTED ALTERATION OF SIMILAR LAWS

By FRANCIS B. KELLOGG

The merit system, as adopted and used in this country to a limited but steadily increasing extent, is a system or method of selecting persons for the subordinate service in any branch of government on a basis of merit or fitness only as ascertained by competitive examination. This system was first adopted in 1883 in the civil service division of the United States government as distinguished from the military and naval service, which latter were already on a merit basis. It was a reform of the civil service and became known as civil service reform. As time has passed and the reform principles and methods have been extended to cover more and more of the government civil service it has ceased to be regarded as a "reform" but rather as the accepted and only legitimate procedure in filling subordinate positions. The word "reform" has therefore been largely dropped by common consent and the term "civil service" generally interpreted as meaning the system of filling positions by competitive examination. This title is unfortunate and misleading and should be replaced by the term "merit system" which is descriptive. Since its adoption in the United States government service, the system has been installed in more than fifteen cities and in six states. In these situations the term "civil service" becomes still more inappropriate as in neither cities nor states is the military or naval service of any special significance, if indeed it exists at all. The whole service is practically "civil." Still, the system, in cities and states is designated as the civil service system and the commissions as civil service commissions, and will probably continue to be.

Historical

The history of civil service reform in the United States has been almost an identical repetition of the experience of the British government. While we were struggling to free ourselves from the tyranny and injustice of the mother country, she herself was engaged in life and death struggles with the spoils system. Bribery was rampant. An office was opened in the treasury for the bribery of members of parliament. Incompetent men, boys and even idiots were appointed to places of trust. Even the king, George Third, was out for the spoils. He appointed his infant son a bishop and other babes to lucrative positions. He extended his rapacity beyond the seas and as a result lost the American colonies. With this loss the British empire awoke and by successive acts passed from time to time through a succession of years finally established the merit system. But it took almost one hundred years to entirely throttle the hybrid monster, the spoils system.

Since 1870 all offices except the heads of the great departments have been filled by competitive examination. From 1855 to 1870 competitive examinations were required, but candidates were limited to those selected by parliament, so tenacious were the rulers of their patronage, even in a restricted degree. Parliament was the great obstacle in the path of the reform, just as congress and legislatures have been in this country. Senatorial confirmation of presidential appointees is practically a selection of candidates by that body and is just as much a spoils proposition and just as demoralizing as was selection of candidates by parliament. It is not right. It must go and President Taft has sounded the first note in suggesting that the merit system be extended to cover first, second and third class postmasters.

The fact that the governmental service of England is far superior to that of any other country is due to the fact that all selections for subordinate service are made by competitive examination. So repugnant has the idea of patronage become to the British people that when Lord Beaconsfield, at the height of his power as prime minister, was reported to have appointed one of his adherents to a minor clerkship without examination, a popular storm was raised which threatened his downfall and was only quieted by personal denial by the minister himself in the house of lords. We are a long way from this state of public opinion in this country but we will reach it some time, because it is right.

Merit System in United States

In the United States "No nation ever started on its career with a larger proportion of strong characters or a higher sense of moral obligation than the English colonies in America. They almost entirely escaped the corruption that so deeply tainted the home government." (Lecky.)

Washington, Jefferson and Adams publicly declared their abhorrence of a system which degraded the public service to a reward for partisan activity. During the first thirty-nine years of this government there were only 73 removals from office. Public employees worked for the good of the service, assured that their terms depended upon honesty and efficiency.

In 1820 congress, under the manipulation of an adroit politician, passed an act limiting to four years the terms of a large number of responsible offices—and the doors were open for the spoilsmen, led on to their plunder by Andrew Jackson, the president. Even the four years law was too slow for him. He made more removals in one month than the six previous presidents had in thirty-nine years and in his first year discharged over 2,000 faithful public servants whose only offense lay in their political opinions.

The spoilsmen, held in leash until that time by conscientious presidents and statesmen, were turned loose and, led by the president, plunged into the vortex of a maelstrom of political corruption dragging the country after them.

In six years the demoralization of the service had become such a scandal that a senatorial investigation was ordered. Their report showed an enormous increase in the expense of government and stated that the inevitable tendency of the patronage abuse was "to convert the entire body of office holders into corrupt and supple instruments of power and to raise up a host of greedy subservient partisans ready for any service however base."

From this time on, protest after protest from committees of statesmen, appeal after appeal from successive presidents, vainly strove to stem the rising tide of political corruption. Abraham Lincoln complained that the clamor for places and the pressure of party leaders for patronage weighed him down more heavily than the burdens of war.

Grant, who had defeated a gallant foe in the greatest civil war of modern times, assailed the spoils citadel and was defeated. The demoralization of the civil war was the opportunity of the spoilsmen and chaos reigned. "Whom the Gods would destroy they first make mad." When Grant appealed to congress for relief he appealed in vain. He could drive into retreat the enemies of the country but he could not protect her from the attacks of these enemies within the walls.

In 1883, forty-eight years from the first protest, the present civil service law was passed. But do not imagine that the effect was to eradicate spoils at once from the public service. Its application was limited at first to cover only a small part of the service. Gradually, but inevitably, it has been extended until today it covers about two-thirds of the government service, while many cities and several states have adopted its rules. Wherever it has been adopted it has been successful just in proportion to its honest and efficient administration. Its enemies have been sleepless in their efforts to defeat and render it ineffective and have at times succeeded, in some degree, in dragging it down, but in spite of frantic opposition and inadequate application it has marched steadily on, as it must march on, until the last vestige of spoils has been obliterated, because it is right.

Proper Field of Merit System

The proper field of the merit system is the non-political offices and positions as distinguished from the political or elective offices. Elective offices comprise and should be limited to those which represent principles of government as decided by a majority of the people. In the recent election the people voted not so much for men as for men who represented certain principles of government. Prominent among these was the divorcement of government from private or corporate interests. The merit system in the ultimate analysis has for its object precisely the same principle: The divorcement of government from private interests, in this case the "private interests" of the office holders, which are also very apt to become identical with the "private interests" of corporations. A great many offices in California have been made elective and thereby political, which properly belong in the non-political or appointive class. It was probably because the framers of the constitution were fearful that if made appointive they would be made to serve the private political interests of the appointing power that they were made elective. They thought the people could be trusted rather than the politicians. The short ballot would place these offices where they properly belong among the appointments and an efficient merit system in the hands of a capable and honest civil service commission would insure the absence of private interest as well as the presence of efficiency in these appointments. President Eliot says, "Taken together civil service reform and the short ballot will go far to destroy the boss and the machine."

In the application of the merit system thus far certain offices which are non-political have been exempted. These occupy a middle ground between the political and non-political offices and are either of a confidential or fiduciary character. Such an office would be the secretaryship to an elective official or deputy whose duty involved the handling of public funds for which the official was responsible. The necessity for these exemptions is open to argument. The defalcations in the United States classified civil service have been only a fraction of those in the exempt positions, and it is believed that eventually these exceptions will be brought under the rule. At present, however, they stand. The bulk of the non-political service to which without any question the merit system can be applied consists of clerks, attendants and attaches of public offices and institutions, in fact all the positions connected with the government and state institutions whose duties are technical and routine.

Importance of the Merit System

The importance of appointment for merit in the public service is something that hardly needs demonstration. It will be granted that the public is entitled to the best obtainable service.

The merit system has been devised and developed to secure this end and it has been incontestably demonstrated that it succeeds. It is upon the firm foundations of this success that it must stand and be judged.

It is hard to imagine anything more important in government than that its machinery should be manned by the most efficient service and yet the accomplishment of that end has not been the most important achievement of the merit system. It should never be forgotten that the vital function of civil service reform has been and must be to remove politics from the public service. It recognizes the fact that unless special and systematic measures are adopted to prevent it, positions in the public service are bound to be used as political capital by designing politicians and office holders. Thus the army of government employees is made to serve the private political purposes of party manipulators, which purposes are directly opposed to the public well-fare. The general of this army, which is paid by the public for pretending to transact its business but really for working against its interest, is frequently some one entirely outside of the public service and also frequently the paid agent of some public service corporation. We do not need to go far afield in this state for an example. As The California Weekly stated in a previous issue the Southern Pacific Railroad has controlled the state and county governments and even the cities through its ability to dictate appointments.

Does it not seem that sane men must recognize the probability, nay, the certainty, of a recurrence of this condition unless definite steps are taken to prevent it? There is but one effective remedy—the merit system. However men may differ upon minor details of that system, all honest men will acknowledge that it is the only system which promises genuine assurance that the appointments shall be made with an eye single to the public welfare. The merit system is the guardian of the public treasury since it guarantees that the public money shall be spent for services, not to the appointing officer but to the public, and that those services shall be the best obtainable. It has been the experience of the men who have been fighting for emancipation from the Southern Pacific machine in the recent election to find arrayed against them in their fight the state and county office holders who had received their positions at the dictation of the railroad. This state of things is absolutely done away with by the merit system. In the first place the employee is under no obligation either to the head of the office or to the machine for his appointment or retention. Hence there are no political debts to be paid. In the second place a provision of the merit system makes it a misdemeanor for an appointee to engage in active political work. This provision contemplates, as it has been expressed by a civil service advocate, "that the appointee becomes the servant of the whole public and is hence in honor bound to abstain from active discrimination in favor of any division of that public."

One of the leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League stated in the hearing of the writer that in the city of Los Angeles in the recent election the state and county employees were everywhere in evidence and working to a man for the machine, whereas, the city employees who are under civil service were conspicuous by their absence.

The merit system is the best friend of the honest public official who goes into office with the purpose and intention of doing his full duty to the public. In the first place with the merit system established it is easier to persuade desirable men to become candidates. Such a man naturally hesitates to run against an opposition which does not scruple to do a brokerage business in office futures. He is placed at an unfair advantage unless he resorts to the same tactics, which he declines to do. The possibility of a man getting elected by promising his subordinate appointments is a thoroughly demoralizing one. It is an outrage first upon the public, which he is elected to serve, as it demoralizes the service; it is unfair to those who are turned out, for no good cause, after becoming qualified by experience and it is not a square deal toward an opponent who refuses to do likewise. But the merit system not only protects the public and everybody concerned from this injustice, it protects the elected official from the appeals and distractions of seekers after positions. It is a bulwark behind which he can take refuge from the army of office seekers in their assault through him upon the public treasury. The time for which he is himself paid from that treasury can be devoted to the duties for which he was elected. The temptation which is well nigh irresistible, to use subordinate appointments to buttress his own position or to cancel an obligation, is removed once for all.

The personnel of the forces which man our prisons, reformatories and charitable institutions is a matter of the gravest concern. At present it is a safe assumption that it is recruited from the army of hangers on and crumb gleaners which make up the camp followers of a successful political party.

Merit System Essentially Democratic

Under the patronage system government itself becomes a "special interest" thriving upon special privileges appropriated from the rights of the public. The public service which belongs to the whole people is exploited for the benefit of the favored few and the whole scheme is financed from the public treasury. The merit system on the other hand is absolutely democratic. It opens the public service to all on equal terms. It only demands that the applicant shall be qualified, and as between applicants be the best qualified. As a means of determining which are best qualified it subjects them all to competitive examinations and tests of fitness under identical conditions. If there is any more equitable, fair or effective method of determining fitness it has not yet been discovered and it is certain that it will not be, for the simple reason that in this method all ulterior and unworthy motives are eliminated and the character and efficiency of the candidate are alone considered. It has been long enough on trial so that the mistakes inevitable to a new system have been for the most part corrected.

There has been one mistake, however, in the opinion of the writer, which has been quite generally perpetuated, viz: surrounding removals with too great difficulty. In attempting to protect the service from those who would use it for selfish ends and insure the carrying out of the civil service principle of retention in office during good behavior, most civil service provisions require that a discharge shall only be effected by the filing of charges and a trial before the civil service commission. In making this provision the very pertinent fact has apparently been overlooked that improper motives for removals are forestalled, since the removing officer has no discretion in the appointment of the successor. Experience in connection with this provision has shown that the head of a department will put up with inefficient service rather than take the position of prosecuting attorney with the possibility of losing his case and having to put up with his subordinate under a still greater strain than before. The subordinate in such a trial frequently enlists the sympathy of his fellow subordinates, who take his part, and with the result that the department head finds that he himself is the real defendant on an implied charge of partiality or injustice toward the accused.

Departmental discipline would be better conserved by lodging power of removal with the department head and the rights of the subordinate would be amply protected by allowing an appeal to the commission with the burden of proof on the appellant to show that his discharge had been unwarranted, rather than upon the department head to prove inefficiency.

The Merit System in State Government

The same reasons which have led to the adoption of the merit system in the national government and cities of the country are reasons why it should be installed in state and county government. To quote again from President Eliot's address at the last annual meeting of the National Civil Service Reform League, "The great reason for the extensive gains made during the last thirty years for the merit system over against the spoils or patronage system is that the merit system is the only business-like and democratic method of selecting the servants of government, municipal, state or national." And again, "Civil service reform is the fundamental governmental reform on the triumph of which all other reforms in American governmental administration necessarily depend."

Comprehensive civil service laws applying to both state and municipal governments have been adopted in New York, Massachusetts and New Jersey. In Wisconsin a civil service law applies to the entire state service while in Colorado and Illinois there are civil service laws affecting state institutions. The secretary of the National Civil Service Reform League, Mr. Elliot Goodwin, during his recent visit to California, made the statement that in New York state the application of the merit system to county offices had presented no difficulties and was easily handled by the

(Concluded on Page 63)

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIPD
The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital 300,000.00
Surplus 400,000.00
Profits 45,000.00

DIRECTORS: James D. Phelan, President;
John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt,
Vice-President; Charles Holbrook, Rudolph
Sprickels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R.
D. McElroy, H. O. Beatty.
Attorneys: J. C. McKinstry and D. C. Murphy.
Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hobson, Assistant
Cashier; A. E. Curtis, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial
(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)
526 CALIFORNIA ST., San Francisco, Cal.

Guaranteed Capital$ 1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash..... 1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds..... 1,555,093.05
Deposits June 30th, 1910..... 40,384,727.21
Total Assets 43,108,907.82

Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co's. Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock
P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President and Manager, George Tourny; Third
Vice-President, J. W. Van Bergen; Cashier, A.
H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William
Herrmann; Secretary, A. H. Muller; Assistant Secretaries, G. J. O. Folte and Wm. D. Newhouse; Goodfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS — N. Ohlandt,
Daniel Meyer, George Tourny, J. W. Van Bergen, Ign. Steinhart, I. N. Walter, F. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Streets. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432
Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues.
For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W.
C. Heyer, Manager.

In reply to many letters inquiring whether I shall publish a review of the session of the California Legislature of 1911, along the same lines as those followed in "The Story of the California Legislature of 1909," I will state that I shall do so, if subscriptions for 1,200 volumes are received before the Legislature of 1911 adjourns. If you wish to be one of the subscribers, fill out and forward this card.

FRANKLIN HICHBORN.

191

Franklin Hichborn,
Santa Clara, California.

As soon as the Story of the California Legislature of 1911 is published, send me one copy, for which I agree to pay $1.50 on delivery.

Name

Address

[From The California Weekly]

SAMUEL LOVELACE has been our police magistrate ever since the momentous issue of "Incorporation, Yes," or "Incorporation, No" was decided affirmatively, and plain Buena became Buena City. It seemed to be for this function that Samuel came into the world; for not until he was installed as magistrate did he find an altogether satisfactory niche.

As long as Sam Lovelace lives, he will be re-elected police judge of Buena City, if he covets the honor; and he will covet the honor as long as he lives.

Our judge of police is an austere man, though kindly, and he maintains his court with a quiet dignity that higher tribunals might imitate with profit. The flippant "you-doesolemnly-chee-chee-chee" manner of swearing witnesses is intolerable to him; and, whatever may be the haste of attorneys, each oath is administered as reverently and impressively as though the deponent had come to final judgment.

His penalties, too, are meted out with nicest regard to the mental and moral characteristics of each culprit, and are remedial rather than retributive in their character.

Thus it has come about that many permanent reformatory have taken their date from the day upon which Judge Lovelace took official cognizance of their cases.

But it would be too much to claim for the judge that he is profoundly versed in the law, inasmuch as it does sometimes happen that a superior court overrules his decisions; yet his mortification at having strayed far from the law is often mitigated by the consciousness of having come much nearer to justice than the more erudite but technical tribunal.

It chanced upon a Christmas day that my wife and I ate roast turkey and plum pudding at the judge's pleasant home; and having done justice to our hostess's cookery, and being left by the ladies to our pipes, the judge extended his legs, tapped the toes of his boots lightly together, and remarked, "Yes, sir, my one extravagance is footwear. Poor as I am," he continued, drawing his pantaloons above his boots and tilting up and down upon his toes, "no man in California wears better-made or better-fitting boots than I wear. Just like gloves, I assure you."

Noticing that my attention was particularly attracted to some ornamentation upon the front tops of the boots, "Yes, yes," he exclaimed, "that furnishes the key to the mystery."

When he had drawn nearer, I found, daintily embroidered across the top of each boot, the legend, "This is this, not next Christmas, remember," the words this and next being distinctly underscored. This brings us to our story.

Caleb Filkins was by inheritance, as well as by inclination, cobbler to a quiet New England village. In addition to his cobbling proclivities, there came to him, also by inheritance, the ancestral homestead of the Filkins family—a hummocky little farm of forty or fifty acres just outside the village confines, and bordering upon Bradbury Pond. Upon this farm grew apples; and these apples were Caleb's undoing.

During the earlier years of Caleb's domestic life with Martha, his wife, little was thought of his visits to the cider in his cellar. But when the crabbed stuff began to tell upon his temper, making that crabbed also, Martha called his attention to his growing infirmity, not too seldom, perhaps, nor yet too gently.

By dint of insistence upon her part, and the mustering of all possible resolution upon his, cider was forsworn for the better part of a year; but, alas! temptations continued to beset Caleb, and each recurring Christmas found him a little more estranged from those about him, each New Year's day a little less hopeful of a happy year to come.

Of all those who should have been near to him in the later years of the old home life, but one, the youngest child and only daughter, Valentine, remained leal and true. Whatever his treatment of others, to little Val Caleb was always kind; and nothing could shake the child's confidence in her father. When, as too often happened, he came home with nerves all unstrung, he could bear to come in contact with no one but Valentine.

CALEB FILKINS' CHRISTMAS

BY

TOBIAS BLACK

But to have her clamber upon his knee and stroke his fevered brow with her soft hands, or rest her curly head against his flushed and burning cheeks, was like balm to him, restful as a mother's lullaby.

At last the fateful day came when Caleb and Martha his wife separated. The dissolution came without legal process. Caleb retired, and Martha and the boys continued the business at the old stand.

Caleb had pondered long upon the matter, and it seemed to him to be better so, if not for him, at least for them. So he packed his kit, shook hands with Martha and the boys, wept a bit over little Val, and at the close of an autumn day, hopeless and alone, trudged off up the hill toward the village railway station. The sun was setting behind dismembered bars of rain cloud, and the light streaming through made the windows of the old house blaze, and the autumn-dyed foliage of orchard and wood, shower-sprinkled, to take hold on glory. Out in the road, shading her eyes with her tiny hand, was little Val, gazing lovingly after her besotted father, who would never come back to her again.

Thrusting his luggage under the stile, Caleb entered the old cemetery, and from the seclusion of a clump of stunted pines, watched the daylight fade and night come on among the time-stained tombs and black, faintly lettered headstones of dismal slate. There his father, Caleb, slept, and there Grandfather Caleb, and there his father's grandfather, and he had been a Caleb, too. For nearly two hundred years—till now!—an inquirer would have found a Caleb Filkins living at the old place and respected; and yet must lie, unworthiest of all that line of Calebs, wander away to end somewhere, somehow, in a homeless drunkard's nameless grave.

Five whole years Caleb passed of aimless wandering up and down the Pacific coast, working here a week and there a month, rounding off each period of labor with a drunken spree. These years had told upon him terribly. At the beginning his hair and beard were only grizzled; now they were long, unkempt and white. He seldom spoke to any one. He came and went—always more or less under the influence of liquor. It was at such a time that an officer found him, a trespasser, and brought him before his honor the police magistrate of Buena City.

Caleb sat in the prisoner's pen, uncombed, unwashed and ill, though he gave no sign of illness other than labored breathing.

"What is the charge against this old man?" asked the judge, when Caleb's turn had come.

"Plain drunk, your honor," the arresting officer replied.

"What is your name, my friend?" queried the judge.

"My name is John—John—"

"Come, come, my man," broke in the judge, "do not try to trump up some stupid alias. You are old, and evidently in need of a friend. So give me your own true name. What is it? Speak up."

"My name is—Sir, I have been a weak and sinful man, but never have I been brought before a bar of justice until now. I had hoped to meet my death without first suffering that shame, but death comes late to them who want it. I suppose one more shame waits for me yet—the chain gang. Fasten a chain and ball to my withered ankle, and put into my hands a rake to gather garbage with in the street, that men may stare at me, boys mock and women pity me! Then death must come, for what has life to add to misery then? My name, sir, is Caleb Filkins."

"Caleb Filkins," repeated the judge, "Caleb Fil—kins." He leaned far back in his chair, stretched his legs, and, putting his hands behind his head, repeated the name again and again, half to himself and half aloud. "Ca—leeb Fil—kins, Ca—leeb Fil—kins—"

Rising from his seat, the judge left the bench, and, coming down to the prisoner, laid his hands upon Caleb's shoulders. Peering into his eyes, he asked:

"Are you Caleb Filkins of Academy East Village, who used to live just over Cemetery Hill and across the road from Jonathan Lovelace's farm? Are you that Caleb Filkins?"

"I am, sir; indeed, I am!" Caleb replied. "I was born upon that farm, and never left it until five years ago. Then, sir, I had become the town toper, and I came away to save further disgrace coming upon Martha and the children. But who are you, sir? Did I ever know you?"

"Who am I? Why, man alive! I have eaten with you, slept with you, wrestled with you—yes, and fought with you, made bows and arrows and played Indians with you, dove with you to the bottom of Bradbury Pond to fish up lily bulbs with our toes, and yet you don't remember me? Who am I? Why, I am Sam Lovelace! Don't you remember Sam?"

Yes; Caleb remembered. While the judge was talking, recollection had been struggling up through the mists and fogs of a beclouded intellect, and Caleb remembered. Sam and he had been boon companions in their youth; but Sam went west in '49, and Caleb had lost and well-nigh forgotten him.

Caleb was indeed ill, and but for tenderest nursing would have fallen an easy prey to pneumonia. As it was, weeks ran into months before he was able to resume his bench; but as soon as able, he fell to work again to repay the judge for expense incurred in caring for him in sickness. So long as this incentive lasted, he behaved well enough.

The judge was hopeful that the renovation Caleb's system had undergone in sickness and convalescence would cure his moral infirmity, and Caleb, too, resolved upon a life of severe sobriety.

Alas for the judge's hopes! Alas for Caleb's resolution! Within the ensuing year he was five times arraigned in court upon the charge of drunkenness.

He became enfeebled and downcast, and looked upon death as his only escape from thralldom, and service upon the chain-gang as the one humiliation that would be greater than he could bear. The judge, too, was sorely tried and not a little out of patience. Convinced that moral suasion and clemency were profitless in Caleb's case, he resolved upon a heroic remedy. The very next time the ancient offender was brought to bar, the judge had the treatment ready for him.

"Caleb Filkins, stand up!" he thundered, when the shamefaced culprit had entered the usual plea of "guilty." "You are an old and constant offender against the peace and dignity of our city. I have been moved to clemency heretofore because of your gray hairs, and I have reposed confidence in your oft-repeated promises of reformation, all to no purpose.

"When I reflect that you have found it easier to yield to than resist temptation, that you have all your life been false to every obligation, false as husband to the wife you promised to cherish, false as father to the children God has given you, false to your country, becoming a vagabond when you should be a useful citizen—when I reflect upon these things, I am persuaded that yours is not a case which calls for mercy from the court.

"It is, therefore, ordered that in case Caleb Filkins shall be found intoxicated within the corporate limits of this city at any time before next Christmas, he shall serve upon the chain-gang for thirty days. Meantime, judgment is suspended. Go."

Caleb stood bewildered, staring vacantly; but when free to go, he grasped his hat and knotted staff, and fled out of court and down the street like one pursued.

On he sped, passing the mill and hospital, taking a by way and rushing on with but the single thought—to get outside the corporate limits of the town. On, his knees smiting each other as he hastened; on, swaying from side to side, stumbling sometimes, nearly falling, but on and on, gasping, with temples throbbing; but on until, staggering, clutching, he fell prostrate in the stifling dust by the roadside.

Hour after hour he lay there, panting for breath, unable to rise or even to drag himself out of the burning sun. "Easier to yield than resist temptation"—"false to every obligation"—"false as husband, false as father, false to native land"—"not a case which calls for mercy from the court." A thousand times those winged denunciations chased each other through the old man's brain. A thousand times their frightful import made him shudder and groan aloud.

The sun rose higher and higher, and beat upon him hotter and hotter. His tongue became swollen; the pulses upon his temples hammered and rang, clashed and pounded, like a hundred anvils ringing. The firm earth seemed yielding beneath him, and he was sinking, sinking into its all-engulfing arms. Death could not be far off, that he knew. He was so very, very tired, and longed so much for sleep.

But what is that? Clank! clank! clank! It is the chain-gang passing along the street under guard. Clank! clank! clank! Why do people stop and stare? Is a chain-gang, then, so strange a sight? Women, with moistened, pitying eyes, are gazing upon the poor fellows as they pass. Ah, Caleb, you are not one of the gang! Death, sweet death, kind, good death has come to you by the lone oak, and saved you that indignity.

No! there goes an old man, the last in the procession. Who is he? His steps are slow and feeble, and his hair and beard, long and white, are fluttering in the wind. It is at him that all are looking. Caleb cannot see his face, for his eyes are cast down. But that must be he. That must be Caleb Filkins!

Some school children passed that way, and one, a brown-eyed girl of ten or twelve, brought water and bathed Caleb's temples, cooled his wrists and gave him drink. Then, taking his head upon her lap, she shaded his face with her parasol while her brother ran to fetch his father, Farmer Aiken.

When Caleb opened his eyes again in consciousness, it was to find himself in a clean, sweet bed, and the little girl with brown hair and eyes sitting by his bedside fanning him. Then he closed his eyes and thought of home; saw the windows of the old house blaze in the glare of a setting sun, and, out in the road, shading her eyes with her tiny hand, he saw little Val gazing up the hill whence her papa had gone so many years before.

Poor little Val! Was she alive, or was she dead? Six long years, and not one word! "False, Caleb, false to little Val!" Almost before Caleb knew it, he was weeping softly, and the little girl with eyes so like Val's was wiping away his tears and weeping, too.

He had been delirious for many days; had talked of home, of Martha, of blazing windows, and of Cemetery Hill; had heard the chain-gang clanking, and had cried aloud, pleading with death to come to him by the lone oak and save him from that gaping, curious crowd.

Now that he was better, he never wearied of following Mary Aiken with his eyes. So like Valentine, he thought, only so much taller. No! if Val were alive, she must be as tall as Mary Aiken. Almost a woman, and unprovided for! What had he done for her that it should be otherwise?

False, Caleb! false to Valentine!

A great resolution came into his heart just then and buoyed him up, making him eager to return to his bench. He would toil and scrimp and save, and by-and-by, dying, would leave all he had to Valentine. God willing, her heritage should be worth the having, too.

It was a hard battle which Caleb fought the next half-year, till Christmas came. Friends were not wanting to whisper words of cheer, and, beside, was he not working for Valentine? But the inward fire was not quenched.

He was a skilful workman, and his earnings were considerable. Early in the autumn he made a payment upon a plot of ground in a newly laid-out suburb of the city, and later built a tiny cottage fronting a public road, with a shop in front and a living-room in rear. Thus he worked and strove, and Christmas came.

Sleep hung heavily upon Caleb's eyelids Christmas morning and it was already day when he was startled into consciousness by the tooting of wheezy tin horns and the thump of baby drums under his window.

For an instant, he was at a loss to understand what it all meant; and then, "Caleb, Caleb, Christmas has come, and you are free; don't you understand?" It was the evil one whispering over the headboard, Caleb says.

A burning thirst seized him, and his breath came thick and hard. All thought of resistance fled in a flash, and he bounded from his bed with but a single thought—to quench the burning.

As his bare feet touched the floor, they rested upon a thick, soft rug made by the deft fingers of Mary Aiken. It was warm and friendly to the touch, and served to recall his scattered senses.

"When you were drinking, Caleb," he said to himself, sinking back upon his bed, "you did not have any nice warm rug to rest your feet on, chilly mornings."

Again the inward craving, and again Caleb rose to go in quest of drink. "You did not sleep between warm blankets, either, Caleb Filkins; you know you didn't, but in your shabby, every-day clothes, dirty and damp. Will you go back to those again?"

Caleb snuggled down into bed for answer, resolved upon a fierce resistance.

"Going to lie in bed all day, old dotard? Going to lie in bed all day, I say? Come, bestir yourself. Go down to Mack's and have a little toddy; only just a little one to stop the burning. You've earned it, Caleb—I say, you've earned it."

Presto! There he was, in thought, in the midst of the crowded bar-room! How the decanters glistened where fell the straggling sunlight that made shift to enter the closely curtained windows! How real it all was to him! The little bedroom in which he was seemed filled with the smell of liquor. His nostrils dilated, and his bosom heaved. Yes, earned it he had, and have it he would!

What, what? Little Val looking down from the wall? Was that a look of pain which stole over your baby face just then, or is Caleb dreaming? Who now will write the letter that is to tell of the never-dying love of poor banished papa? Where now is your dowry coming from? False Caleb! False to Val! No, no, he would not go down to Mack's!

A score of times Caleb rose to go in quest of drink, but as often his eyes fell upon a token of some one's kind regard, and back he had gone to his bed again, only to be driven forth a moment later by his old-time enemy.

After all, what mattered it whether he lived or died, were drunk or sober? Who cared for him? Martha? Her love for him had gone out twenty years before. The boys? They had not cared for him since they were merest lads, and hardly concealed their satisfaction at his going. Valentine? Pretty baby that she was, she had no doubt forgotten him long ago; or if she remembered, it was, but dimly, as in a dream. Mary Aiken? Yes, Mary had been kind, but her solicitude for him was but the zealous whim of a half-grown girl, to be supplanted any moment by another passing fancy.

Drawing aside the curtain, Caleb peeped out into the garden. Would anything there care how it fared with him? The roses, would they care? The geraniums and chrysanthemums, would they? If only they could think and feel they might care, for Caleb had cared for them most tenderly since Mary had taught him how.

He allowed his eyes to wander away to the great Sierras, standing grave and solemn against the morning sky. Caleb never wearied of looking at the mountains. They seemed the personification of conscious strength and changeless resolution. Up there where the whitened summits glistened, 'twas like old New England at Christmas time.

"Oh, Caleb, if you could only keep sober, might not Valentine come to you some time from out that wintry land, and, in a little cottage all your own, love and care for you, now that your old age has come?

"Bah! Caleb Filkins, you are dreaming. A spree or two, and you'll be dead, and the business over with. To-morrow you'll be brought before your old schoolmate, charged with drunkenness. How he will lecture you! Perhaps he will threaten you with the chain-gang as before."

"What was it he said? 'It is ordered that in case Caleb Filkins shall be found intoxicated within the corporate limits of the town at any time before next Christmas—' What's that? Before next Christmas, did he say? Why, this is not next Christmas; this is this Christmas! Next Christmas is yet a whole year off. Caleb, the chain-gang! the chain-gang!"

The old man cowered beneath the bed-clothes in abject terror.

"Uncle Caleb! Uncle Caleb! are you in there? Are you ill? You are to take dinner with us to-day, you know, and now it is almost noon."

It was Mary Aiken who had come for him. "Wait for me, Mary," Caleb cried. "Do not go until I come." He hurriedly dressed, and joined her at the door. "Take me by the hand, Mary, and whatever happens, do not let me go! We must go directly to the judge's. Oh, I am so glad you came for me, Mary! This is this Christmas, isn't it, Mary. The judge said next Christmas. I am sure he said next Christmas, and this isn't next Christmas, at all, is it?"

They hurried on to Judge Lovelace's home, Caleb grasping the girl's hand so tightly that she almost cried out with pain.

Arriving presently, for it was not far, and seeing the judge in his easy-chair by the window, Caleb entered.

Hardly waiting to catch his breath, he burst forth:

"This is this Christmas, isn't it, Judge? and not next Christmas, at all, is it? You said next Christmas, didn't you? You know you did, Judge. Ain't I right? Be careful now; ain't I right?"

At first the judge thought Caleb had gone quite out of his senses; but the anguish upon his face and his evident desire for an affirmative answer enabled Lovelace to understand. Assuming a firm, judicial tone, he placed his hand upon Caleb's shoulder and said: "You are quite right, Mr. Filkins. I said next Christmas, most assuredly."

"And you would put me on the chain-gang if I were found intoxicated before next Christmas?"

"Such was my judgment, as you know, and the decree was suspended only till the fact of intoxication should be shown. Nothing could cause me greater pain, but my duty would be plain."

So spoke the judge; and now that Caleb was fully assured, he broke down completely. Sinking upon a sofa he buried his face in his hands and wept. "Oh, Mary, if you had not come for me!" he cried. "Oh, Judge, if you had not remembered! How have I fought with my enemy these many hours! But for you I should have gone the old way. I shall be stronger now. Come, Mary, your mother will be concerned for you."

Caleb trudged away with Mary Aiken, almost buoyant in his newly found security.

By the time another Christmas eve had come, Caleb had completed for the judge a pair of boots, ripest product of the cobbler's art; and across the ornamental top of each were worked the words, "This is this, not next, Christmas, remember." By way of recompense, the judge, early Christmas morning, appeared at Caleb's cottage. Calling him to the door, he gravely warned him that "This is this, not next, Christmas," and to beware lest he be brought into court charged with drunkenness before next Christmas.

Feeling safer now, Caleb began to long to hear from home. At his request, the judge addressed a letter of inquiry to Mr. and Mrs. Caleb Filkins, Academy East Village, as though unmindful of Caleb's absence; and by-and-by an answer came, telling of Caleb's disappearance, and that they thought him dead; that young Caleb managed the farm, Silas the ship, and Valentine, their only daughter, attended the old academy. Better still, within the letter came a photograph of Valentine.

Nor was that all. Another enclosure was there; a letter in a fair but girlish hand, which

Caleb read with delighted surprise, as follows:

"Dear Mr. Lovelace: Won't you please keep a good lookout for my papa? He went away from us seven long years ago, because he was ashamed, and never came back any more. He did not know how much his little Valentine loved him, or he would not have done so, I know. Many a time I have lain awake at night thinking of him, wishing that I had eyes that could see all over the world just for a few minutes so that I could find him; but not having eyes that could see anywhere at all in the dark, I cried myself to sleep and dreamed of him.

"Sometimes in my dreams I have seen him, poor and feeble and old, leaning heavily upon his staff, wandering along lone and dusty roads, stopping now to ask for food and now for drink, with no home to shelter him or any one to be kind or care whether he were good or not; and when I awoke to find it all a dream, I just cried and cried until I went to sleep again.

"He never was unkind to me, and if you see him anywhere, tell him that his Valentine wants him to come home again, and there shall not anybody scold him at all. You won't forget, will you, Mr. Lovelace?"

"VALENTINE."

From the day that letter came, a new light beamed from Caleb's eyes. His manner softened, and his voice took on strange intonations, as the voice of one who has newly learned to love. Caleb wrote, and with his letter went one from the judge and one from Mark Aiken to Valentine.

What a day that was for Valentine—the day upon which those letters came! Out to the barn to tell brother Caleb, who was not in when Silas brought the news; clutching to her bosom the photograph with its kindly face and long white hair and beard; laughing and crying, talking and singing, hugging and kissing every one, "acting like one possessed," Martha said.

Silas and Caleb were first amazed, then content that the mystery of their father's disappearance had been cleared up; and even stern, long-suffering Martha was mollified by the judge's account of Caleb's struggles, and shed a tear or two.

I chanced Caleb's way the other day. The city has grown out far beyond his humble acre. He has sold a part of his land, and with the proceeds a row of pretty cottages was built, yielding an income quite sufficient for his small needs.

As I passed, I saw him delving with his spade among the shrubbery. By his side a woman stood with form erect and arms akimbo, lips firmly closed, eyes that look straight at you, hair neither white nor brown, but both in equal share. I took her to be Martha.

Both were looking up the walk whither my steps were tending, and I soon saw why. From out the shade of an avenue of almond trees, with arms about each other's waists and sun hats dangling at their sides, came two young women with measured pace. Which was the more beautiful, I hardly knew; one would have taken them to be sisters. They were Mary Aiken and Valentine.

("MERIT SYSTEM"—Concluded)

state commission. Moreover the results of its application had been entirely satisfactory. It is well known that it is easier to secure the adoption of progressive measures in a young state such as this than in the old conservative states of the east. The one under consideration is not an experiment. It has been tried out and the steady progress of its extension is ample proof of its efficiency. It is not only a good thing in government; it is an essential thing. We need it and now is the time to get it. Patriotic men with painful regularity have introduced a civil service law at every session of the legislature for the past twelve years and with equal regularity it has been killed by the minions of the machine. At last the people have come into their own and a legislature is elected which will recognize the people and the people only as master. This legislature will pass a state civil service law and California will have taken one more long step toward political freedom and efficient administration.

PERSONALIA

On November 22, Justin McCarthy reacted his eightieth birthday, and a great circle of friends in politics and literature congratulated him on this happy event. "A little while ago," writes a correspondent, "I had the pleasure of chatting with the venerable historian and novelist. He told me how keen was his interest in politics still. 'If only my health had allowed me to live in London I should not have given up parliamentary life fourteen years ago,' said Mr. McCarthy. Since then he has lived, quietly watching events, by the seaside and adding to the long history of his literary achievements. Mr. McCarthy will be remembered by hosts of readers of his brilliant 'History of Our Own Times,' and the vivid light he threw on current events was largely due to his experience as a busy journalist and active politician."

William Gillette is to appear in a revival of the farcical comedy, "The Private Secretary" at the Empire Theatre, New York, the play that brought him his first celebrity as a farceur when it was brought out in 1884. The piece was such an instant success from the night that Mr. Gillette first appeared in it that not until he had acted it 2,000 nights did it satisfy its popularity.

William A. Brady makes the announcement that Aristophanes's farce "The Birds," is to be revived in the spring by the Chicago company presenting Margaret Mayo's modern farce, "Baby Mine." Mr. Brady is declared to be actuated by a desire to indicate a phase of Greek literature which has been neglected in the many revivals of the Greek tragedies. This desire is "to eradicate the impression that only the lugubrious was the theme of the Attic playwright that the proposed revival is undertaken."

Signora Duse has arranged what she calls her pied a terre, a small apartment in a building perched on the Tarpeian Rock next the Capitol, in Rome. The rooms in the apartment chosen by Signora Duse are so small that she has had special furniture made to decorate them, and she calls it "The Doll's House." The building is very old, and was constructed for the necessities of another age, when people seemed not to have had the requirements of our day, so the actress had it practically rebuilt, spending a small fortune to render it what she considers habitable. It is now transformed into a real jewel, full of souvenirs and mementos of her career in all parts of the world, and many priceless objects she has taken the trouble to ferret out in different foreign towns.

Mr. Barrie is at his new game of writing one-act plays as presents or compliments. Mr. Frohman has announced that Mr. Barrie had sent to Maude Adams, who is appearing in Toronto in "What Every Woman Knows," the manuscript of a new one-act play written out entirely in longhand, with the cast of characters, stage directions and diagrams of its scene carefully designed by the playwright himself, with attention to the minutest details. Before the end of her present season, so the notice runs, Miss Maude Adams intends to recognize Mr. Barrie's gift to her by appearing in "Youth" upon some special occasion. The royalties of the performance will be devoted to the Actors' fund of America.

Mrs. Brit Trevathan is said to be the first nominee, man or woman, to defeat the Democratic ticket in Angelina county, Texas. Mrs. Trevathan ran for county clerk on an independent ticket and won.

When Chauncey M. Depew retires from the senate on March 3 its champion surviving story-teller will be genial "Bob" Taylor of Tennessee. But there will be a newcomer with whom Senator Taylor will have to contend for honors. The friends of John W. Kern of Indiana expect him to succeed Depew as the best story-teller of the senate, although he will be pushed for first honors by Senator Taylor. Men who campaigned with Kern say he has a string of good stories of infinite length, and they expect him to become a favorite in the cloakrooms.

DIVIDEND NOTICE SAVINGS UNION BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco)
Northwest corner of California and Montgomery streets
After January 3, 1911, Market Street, at Third Avenue and O'Farrell Street.
For the half year ending December 31, 1910, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four (4) per cent. per annum on all savings deposits, free of taxes, payable on and after Tuesday, January 3, 1911. A dividend not drawn will be added to the deposit account, become a part thereof and earn dividend from January 1, 1911. Money deposited on or before January 10, 1911, will earn interest from January 1st.

R. M. WELCH, Cashier.

DIVIDEND NOTICE THE GERMAN SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco)
526 California Street
Missouri Branch, 277 Missouri Street, St. Louis
Richmond District Branch, 432 Clement Street, between Fifth and Sixth Avenues.
For the half year ending December 31, 1910, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four (4) per cent. per annum on all deposits, free of taxes, payable on and after Tuesday, January 3, 1911. Dividends not called for are added to the deposit amount and earn dividends from January 1, 1911.

GEORGE TOURNEY, Manager.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

Department No. 3.

ERNEST H. CLARK CARY, Plaintiff,
vs.
All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof.
Defendants.
ERNEST J. MOTTE,
Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:
To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Ernest H. Clark Cary, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the northwesterly line of Brannan Street, distant thereon eighty-four (84) feet and nine and seven-eighths (97/8) inches southwesterly from the southwesterly line of Zoe Street; running thence southwesterly along said line of Brannan Street sixty (60) feet and two and one-eighth (2 1/8) inches; thence at a right angle northwesterly eighty (80) feet; thence at a right angle northwesterly sixty (60) feet and two and one-eighth (2 1/8) inches; thence at a right angle southeasterly eighty (80) feet to the northwesterly line of Brannan Street and the point of commencement; being a part of One Hundred Vara Lot Number 162.

Together with the appurtenances of each and every part thereof.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple as absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 28th day of October, A. D. 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
By M. Krage, Deputy Clerk

MEMORANDUM

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 11th day of November, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

City and County of San Francisco, a municipal corporation, whose address is San Francisco, California.

The German Savings and Loan Society, a corporation, whose address is Number 526 California Street, San Francisco, California.

Nov. 11, 1910.

TITLES RESTORED

TITLES RESTORED UNDER McENERNEY ACT, complete for $35.00. Burnt Records Title Co., 951-953 Monadnock Building, ninth floor, Market street, near Third

JULIUS GALLMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office, 30 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491
Residence, 1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4590
SAN FRANCISCO

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Superior Courts

By authority of the state constitution each county in the state has a superior court. Even little Alpine, with only 309 inhabitants, has its superior court with as great powers as have the superior courts of San Francisco or Los Angeles. Per contra, Los Angeles county, with its half million inhabitants, and San Francisco city and county, with its 417,000, each have but one superior court, as Alpine has. The difference lies in this: Los Angeles and San Francisco counties each have twelve superior court judges for their one superior court, whereas a part of one judge would be abundant for Alpine. Were the twelve judges of the superior court of either San Francisco or Los Angeles to sit together for the trial of a case they would have no more authority or power than each one of them would have sitting and trying that case alone.

It is to be doubted if our constitution makers did the wisest thing when they constituted each county a judicial district. It would have been more economical and, very likely, would have attracted higher judicial talent to the bench had the counties been combined into judicial districts of such size as would make sure that all the time of each court, except proper vacation periods, were fully occupied. Of course such counties as have legal business enough to constitute a district should have one, but there are a number of counties in the state that do not. The judicial district system obtains in many states in the union and works advantageously.

A judge from one county may hold court for the judge of another county, upon his invitation, and upon request from the governor he must do so, for, be it remembered, the salary of a superior court judge is paid, one-half by the county and one-half by the state; but until now, even if a judge from another county were called in, he could only hold court in place of the resident judge and not with him. However, by the adoption at the late general election of Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 36, if one judge gets behind with his calendar and a neighboring judge has not enough business on his hands to keep him occupied, the judge called in may open a second department of the superior court of that county and help to clean up the docket.

This promises to be advantageous to the dispatch of justice over the state, although some equalization in salaries should take place if the judges from the poorly paid counties are forced to spend all their spare time in the counties whose judges are well paid helping such judges out. The foregoing amendment also broadened and made more useful the previously existing power of litigants to agree, in writing, to the selection of a judge pro tempore to try some one case where, for any reason, the superior judge of that county cannot try it, giving the person selected, who must have been admitted to the bar, all the powers that the judge would have, but solely with reference to that one case alone.

The jurisdiction of the superior courts is about as broad as are the causes of disagreement among men and the ways that men have of committing offenses against the social order. As explained a week ago, ordinarily superior courts cannot take cognizance of cases involving less than $300, although, no matter how small the sum involved, appeal may be taken from a justice's court to a superior court. The superior court holds the power of life and death, within the law, over persons placed on trial in such courts, with the limitation that courts of appeal may overrule the decisions of superior judges.

That justice, in our American, and likewise in our Californian, courts often miscarries, much too often, no one will have the hardihood to deny. In fact the President of the United States, himself a great judge, has declared the failure of American justice to be a disgrace to our American civilization, and no civilization that tolerates judicial failure has much claim to being called civilized, inasmuch as that is what civilization is—the establishment of justice, equally, impartially, promptly and inexpensively. By that test above all others are civilizations to be measured.

The consensus of appellate judicial opinion is that failure to establish justice rests mainly upon the shoulders of trial judges and, under our system, the superior court judges are our trial judges; but the consensus of public opinion is that judicial failure usually lies at the feet of appellate judges who, in their sequestered positions, withdrawn from contact with real life, come to exalt the form or the theory of the law above the substance of it, the fault that The Christ found with the administration of justice in his day, a fault from which it has not been free from his day to our own, being written into the pattern from which our social fabric is woven.

Whatever view one may take of this controversy between the trial courts and courts of appeal, at least this much is true: the trial courts are face to face with the verities of life. The trial judge sees the accused, watches his bearing, hears the evidence and looks into the faces of the witnesses while they are giving their testimony; hears the arguments of counsel and watches their attitudes toward the issues, toward the goal of justice toward which all should conspire to make progress and, better than any appellate court that will ever pass judgment upon his work, the trial judge will be able to know what constitutes justice in the case at bar. If somehow the superior judge were freed from terror of reversal, except he prove a malignant man, he would come much nearer establishing justice than he can now that appeal is taken from the man who knows what constitutes justice in any given case to a bench of men who only know what would constitute hypothetical justice in hypothetical cases. The superior court is a superior court to any appellate so far as the meting out of justice is concerned.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE

A full line of Theosophical Literature from Point Loma, California, the headquarters of the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society, under the leadership of Katherine Tingley, is now on sale at A. M. Robertson's, 222 Stockton St., S. F., and at Smith Bros., 462 13th St., Oakland, California.

PUBLIC MEN USE

Allen's Press Clippings

to help them keep in touch with every publication in the State. Send your order to 88 First Street, S. F. IT PAYS TO KEEP POSTED.

Day School---Night School

Electrical, Mining, Civil

AND

Automobile Engineering

Architectural Drawing

Wireless and Morse Telegraphy

BOOKKEEPING : SHORTHAND

Our Graduates in Every Department Secure Good Positions

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO

16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved

KRYPTOK

Invisible Bifocal Lenses

181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tels. Oakland 950
Home A 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

This Week: "The Woman Suffrage Amendment"

By Lillian Harris Coffin

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY

DECEMBER 30: '10
FIVE CENTS: THE COPY

Vol. III Published by California Weekly, Incorporated,
26 Montgomery Street: San Francisco, Cal.

GOOD FAITH-GOOD COURAGE-GOOD HUMOR

Subscription Rates: One Year, $2.00; Six Months, $1.25; Three Years, $5.00, in Advance. No. 5.

We Quit

WITH THIS ISSUE The California Weekly ceases publication. After two and a quarter years of effort to build up a self-sustaining patronage in San Francisco failure is admitted. Having been given full power to use the corporation's capital as he deemed best, and to choose his own associates in conducting the enterprise, the undersigned concedes that the fault, is fault there be, is his own and not another's. For reasons which it were dreary to recapitulate, The California Weekly has, in respect to developing an advertising patronage, without which no paper can live unless steadily subsidized, been up against a stone wall, and the paper that cannot in process of time earn its own way as an organ of publicity scarcely deserves to survive. That wall of indifference or opposition could, in time, be broken down, but the few thousands generously placed at our disposal for continuing the paper would not suffice to that end and it were an injustice to our friends to use the fund only to find ourselves some months later where we now are, with neither assets nor liabilities to speak of, but still far from a self-sustaining goal. A paper must go forward or it will go backward and the journalistic "hoodoo" once on is well nigh irremediable. In the light of experience I now know that to establish a weekly paper that will be to this coast what Collier's or the New York Outlook is to the nation would require no small expenditure. For the paper itself no apologies are offered. The Staff has done its best and is not ashamed of the result. Nor do we regard the venture as having been wholly unsuccessful. The purpose in seeking to establish The California Weekly was to help in the redemption of California from corporation domination. In so far as that end has been partially attained The California Weekly has helped and in that service its shareholders must find what compensation they may for losses sustained. Howbeit, none of them had over $500 invested, only a few more than $100, and care was taken in the capitalization to approach none to whom the loss, in the event of failure to land on a self-sustaining basis, would be a serious deprivation. There are some odds and ends of business, pro and con, to be closed up, after which a full statement will be sent to each of the shareholders. Arrangements are in process of making for having the unexpired subscriptions filled out by another paper and, if successful, each subscriber will be notified of the fact personally by mail. If no such arrangements can be made the subscriber will have to join with the shareholder in regretting the failure of the paper to stick. With gratitude to all who have given us their aid and encouragement and with bitterness toward none, feeling certain that the members of The Staff will all somewhere find a chance to lend a hand toward making things better than they are, I am sincerely, for a free commonwealth governed through just laws equally and efficiently enforced,

A. J. PILLSBURY,

Editor-Manager.

222 Pala Avenue, Piedmont Station, Oakland, California.

One Thing More

THE BLOW LATELY STRUCK to break the shackles which the Catholic church had long since riveted upon the wrists of Spain augurs well for both the church and for Spain, for the church because special privilege corrupts it, and for Spain because special privilege impoverishes it. The American way is best, but America had to humble Spain before Spain could be brought to see it. One thing more, the establishment in Spain of a free public school system, strong on the side of manual training and scientific agriculture. Time will do all the redemptive work needed to be done to give a proud and capable people a chance to be again glorious. Success to the progressive abroad as well as at home!

Cleaning Up Adams County

ADAMS COUNTY, OHIO, is probably no worse than other counties in that and other states. Since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, it has been the custom in close elections for pious old party leaders, not a few of them deacons in good standing, to acquire the riff-raff vote by purchase, each side thanking God that conscience did not stand in the way to prevent their doing what they knew the other fellows were doing. The shame of the show-down will probably enable those people to see the matter in a new light. By the way, isn't business being hurt in Adams county? And how comes it that the best citizens ever allowed the scandal to come to light? There must be some of God's anointed in Adams county. May the crusade spread to other counties and other states that they also may be cleaned up. A corrupt electorate is the negation of democracy.

One of Pinchot's Dreams

A FEW MONTHS AGO it was declared from Washington that the idea of a great power trust, covering the west, was one of those Pinchot dreams born of the brain of a faddist and fanatic. Last week it was announced, also from Washington, that Attorney-General Wickersham is instituting proceedings for the dissolution of that trust which threatens to become one of the biggest agencies for spoliation the world has known. Not even Joseph of old dreamed things more true than Gifford Pinchot.

Free Lectures In Schools

THE ANNOUNCEMENT that a free lecture system in the schools of San Francisco is soon to be inaugurated gives buoyancy to the hope that this city may come to be educationally contemporaneous by and by, may have physical examinations of pupils preparatory to entrance into schools, and visiting nurses to look out for them thereafter, all of which modern conveniences such backward cities as New York and Chicago have had for a decade. Educationally San Francisco is old foggy.

Concern For the Third Party

ONE OF THE NICEST THINGS that has taken place lately was the acquiescence of the locomotive engineers of the Middle Western roads in the best terms they could make with the railroad companies, although far from satisfactory, rather than precipitate a strike that must inflict so much hardship upon that innocent third party known as The Public. Very fine and greatly calculated to endear the locomotive engineers to the people! But is it not about time for that innocent third party, The Public, to do a little something for its own protection rather than be so absolutely dependent upon the forbearance and self-abnegation of powerful labor organizations or combinations of railroad companies? What would be the matter with The Public saying: "Here, what's the matter with you fellows? Come into court and let's see who is right and who is wrong. Remember, no affray!" The Public is too innocent and inefficient by half.

Nineteen-Eleven

ALTHOUGH, WITH THIS ISSUE, The California Weekly goes where the candle goes when it goes out, that melancholy fact affords no reason for not wishing its friends a happy and fruitful year. After all, it is perhaps not so much what we do as what we try to do that counts. Nor is it what we shall get out of the coming year that will make us rich so much as what we shall put into it. It is good to be alive, but to live abundantly and intensively is great. Nineteen-Ten treated California and the country kindly. Here is hoping that Nineteen-Eleven may do better.

Excuses That Do Not Excuse

Coroners' juries are overly tender of chauffeurs who kill people and where, as in the case of the Henshaw chauffeur in Oakland, more than one person has been killed there is ground for fearing that running over children may become a habit with one, the more especially if a large measure of public sympathy is bestowed upon the killer instead of upon the life crushed out. The slowing up or stopping of any street car should be taken as notice to every chauffeur driving his vehicle along such street that some one is about to alight from such car, either at one end or the other. The responsibility must be upon him and not upon the person alighting, the more especially if that person chances to be a child. There should be no such thing as contributory negligence upon the part of a child to mitigate the offense of running over a child. Grown persons are in such terror of automobiles that they are accustomed to look to the right of them and to the left of them before daring to take a step from a car from which they have alighted. To be heedless is a prerogative of childhood, but not of any chauffeur. It is a matter of every day experience in riding upon street cars that automobiles whirl by them at stopping places without deviating a hair's breadth from the straight line, so close as to fan the faces of outside passengers with the rush of their machines. Some months of imprisonment for manslaughter would mitigate this form of recklessness. To the driver of every automobile the law should say: "Thou shalt not kill." The responsibility must be put upon him and upon no other. That degree of care which a reasonably careful person would employ is insufficient to excuse any killing. It must be such a degree of care as cannot be exceeded by any person in full possession of all his faculties. It were better to err on the side of stringency than leniency in dealing with chauffeurs who kill. Such a policy on the part of coroners' juries and courts will put a stop to four-fifths of such killing of foot passengers, adult or under age.

What About the Valley People?

Much displeasure has been expressed with reference to the majority decision of the state railroad commission in relation to San Joaquin valley rates north and south and the railroad people are said to be urging jobbers of San Francisco, Stockton and Los Angeles to get together and adjust their differences amicably, parceling out the territory as they may mutually agree.

But what about the producers who live in the upper San Joaquin valley? And what about the consumers who live south of Tehachapi? Are they not parties in interest? That portion of the San Joaquin valley lying south of Kings river is the granary of Southern California. It is to that broad and fertile, irrigated domain that Los Angeles is looking for its daily bread and butter, milk and eggs, beef and mutton, deciduous fruits and for hay for its horses. Southern California does not produce enough to feed its own horses let alone enough of every day staples to feed its own people, and it cannot. It produces oranges and lemons, walnuts, climate and picturesque situations, to spare for shipment abroad, but were it not for the upper San Joaquin valley it would go hungry. Why not give those southern consumers some consideration in fixing rates? Are the jobbers the only parties in interest?

Moreover, this upper San Joaquin valley, from where Kings river crosses the valley to Tehachapi mountain, is being settled and developed from Southern California and is coming to have the Southern California spirit. It does not look upon the saloon as the palladium of our liberties, the institution in whose prosperity all are prosperous. Some of the towns have shut them up and kicked them

THE STAFF

A. J. PILLSBURY.....Editor and Manager
A. J. WATERHOUSE.....Assistant
E. FRENCH STROTHER.....Assistant
V. E. FRANKLIN.....Business Manager

Address all communications and make all remittances payable to The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, Rooms 310 and 311. Telephone Douglas 4094

Entered at San Francisco post office as second-class mail matter.

Rejected manuscripts will be carefully returned if accompanied by necessary postage.

Sample copies sent free on request.

News dealers and general agents supplied by The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Advertising rates submitted on application.

Subscribers wishing their addresses changed should give their old as well as their new addresses.

Readers of The California Weekly will, in due time, find in its columns every important public issue explained by some person whose special knowledge gives him a right to be heard.

179

out as mischievous and unclean and, more and more, that portion of California is transferring its sympathies and its trade to Southern California, from whence it draws its most lucrative business.

We may surmise, also, that the railroad people have no notion of going into the subject of cost of service throughout the San Joaquin valley. No doubt it is the lowest in the world and, how low, the railroad people will not disclose unless they have to. Tehachapi mountain is also there. It is hard pulling over it. If rates were fixed mainly with regard to cost of service Los Angeles would have to secure its San Joaquin valley products by sea from Port Costa and freight rates from San Francisco to the foot of Tehachapi mountain would hardly enter into the cost of living, but how would San Francisco jobbers ever reach Nevada and Utah with their commodities? The rule that applies in one direction must apply in all directions.

Commissioner Loveland will take the San Francisco jobber's view of all questions coming before the new commission and the San Francisco jobber is not looking for a fair field with no favor. That is not characteristic of the San Francisco type of mind. He is looking for a cinch, for an underhold, a special favor. It will be up to the other members of the board to view these perplexing issues from the standpoint of a broader prosperity for the whole state, giving to the claims of San Francisco a due and proper consideration, but no more. San Francisco is entitled to, and cannot be kept from enjoying, the full advantage of its position on one of the great harbors of the world—when its commercial interests develop the possibilities of that harbor and not before.

Had San Francisco merchants been less of hucksters and more like merchant princes its deep sea commerce would long since have been less on paper and more on water. The prevailing furor for a great blowout in 1915, with an intermediate prosperity based on the expenditure of borrowed money, instead of devoting all energies to a building up of a permanent manufacturing industry and commerce, is characteristic of the San Franciscan type of business mind. A great splurge, a copious raking of shekels off the top of the heap to serve temporarily, leaving the future to the future, is the San Francisco way. Great, rich, sober-minded New York carefully considered the matter of holding the Panama-Pacific exposition there and unanimously decided that it was not wanted at any price. The misdirection of energy and the after effects rendered the whole undertaking undesirable in the practical, sober eyes of Gothamites.

Something Archaic

If the sentiment expressed by John Llewellyn, of the Llewellyn Iron Works of Los Angeles, correctly voices the sentiments of Los Angeles employers in general, then must we conclude that, progressive as our southern city is in most respects, industrially it is archaic, farther in the long ago than the longest memory of its oldest inhabitant. In substance Mr. Llewellyn's declaration was: "We are fighting for a principle, the right to run our own business in our own way." That right, if it exist at all, applies only to him who is his own employer and his own, sole, employee. The moment an employer adds to his working force the services of a single employee he forfeits the right to run his own business in his own way. The absolute rights of the employer are at once modified by the right of his employee to a living wage, healthful surroundings, decent hours, the right not to be discharged for trivial reasons but to retain his place so long as such services are needed and he renders a loyal, helpful service to his employer.

When this relation of employer to employee is multiplied, on the one hand, by a hundred shareholders constituting an artificial personality created by the law and existing by sufferance of the law, and, on the other hand, by a thousand employees, no one not an industrial fossil should be found contending for the "principle" of conducting an "own business" in an "own way." There seems to be that about industrial Los Angeles that is archaic.

Autocracy is to be resisted, whoever attempts it, and when resisted by the imbecile and brutal, it is as likely to be with dynamite in Los Angeles as with the bomb in Russia. Despicable men will employ despicable methods to gain their ends and the only sure defense against such men and such methods is to assume so fair an attitude toward the issues involved as to disarm hatred. Such an attitude Mr. Llewellyn has not assumed.

If we reflect upon the helplessness of the social order, when confronted by even one man in a thousand made criminally minded by a rankling sense of wrong, we can begin to realize the importance of squaring our industrial policies with the moral and social standards of our time. This Los Angeles employers apparently have not done. Whatever principles may have characterized industrial life in past centuries the spirit of twentieth century industrialism is co-operative and participating, founded upon giving and taking, arbitrating and agreeing, and no longer upon authority. Never again will any employer, who takes into his service one person beside himself, be perfectly free to "run his own business in his own way." We are "members one of another," industrially as well as spiritually, and we cannot be so spiritually without being so industrially.

That "industrial freedom" for which Los Angeles is clamoring contemplates nothing of the kind, except for the employer. He is to run his "own business" in his "own way," with the result that labor will be bought as mules are bought, in the lowest market and at the cheapest price. When the supply of one-lungers gives out access will be had to the same sources of cheap labor to which Pittsburgh has had access.

No, no, no, a thousand times no. The denial of the right of collective bargaining to labor means that industry is to be autocratic and not free, and autocracy in industry, whether the associated employers or the labor unions be the autocrats, is un-American, archaic and of the spirit of the sixteenth century rather than of the twentieth. The trend of our time is toward democratization of industry and if Los Angeles fails of squaring itself with the spirit of the age it will suffer the sorrows of the condemned.

The seed of injustice and hate cannot be sowed for thirty years without sooner or later harvesting in kind. There is in the thousandth or ten thousandth man a fanaticism of criminality that transforms, in his diseased mind, the most unspeakable atrocities into doing service for God and man. A hundred such men in a nation, if they be cunning and careful, and work together, can make that nation tremble for its life.

Once again, the only safety to life or property that can give us peace and calm and security lies in there being no one who has it in his heart to take our life or destroy our property. It is love and not hate that can afford that security.

Some Interesting Figures

A statement of the financial operations of the Southern Pacific Company for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, published in the San Francisco Chronicle of Wednesday, should be read with great interest, the more especially by the people and business men in San Francisco. Only a few items of great significance will be here considered.

The surplus for the year, over fixed and operating expenses, that is, over the cost of running the system and paying interest on its aggregate debts, amounted to $37,240,927.54; out of this dividends amounting to $17,238,346.93 were paid to the shareholders, leaving a balance of profit to be otherwise disposed of amounting to $20,002,580.61. It is particularly interesting to note what became of this vast sum of undivided profits.

"In order to reimburse the Southern Pacific Company for expenditures incurred in the construction of the Bay Shore line, and for the cost of future additions and betterments thereto," the report goes on to say, "as well as for additional terminal facilities, the board of directors authorized an issue of not exceeding $50,000,000 of San Francisco terminal first mortgage bonds of which $25,000,000 have been issued bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent."

Now comes the interesting admission: "These bonds of the value of $15,000,000 have been taken up in this year's account." That is to say, of the earnings of the company over and above dividends on the capital stock, earnings that owe their origin to excess charges, earnings that therefore belong to the patrons of the road and not to the shareholders, $15,000,000 are converted into bonds of the San Francisco terminal company upon which the patrons of the road must pay 4 per cent interest for anyhow fifty years.

Under a proper system of stock supervision of such corporations such robberies as this would not be permitted. The patrons of the Southern Pacific Company gave that $15,000,000 to the company to be used for the public benefit. It was perfectly proper for that company to accept that gift and to devote it to terminal betterments, or to any other use that would subserve the general public, but to accept that gift and then capitalize it, charge interest on it and by and by make the public make the gift over again, after having paid $30,000,000 in interest on the gift, well, that is indeed high finance, and high finance generally implies high toned, adroit and successful grand larceny.

In other words, the greater the profits of the Southern Pacific Company the heavier the mortgage placed upon San Francisco's future commerce and upon a generation not yet born. Every dollar beyond a reasonable rate of dividends upon the capital stock of a railroad corporation should be expended in betterments, but not a bond or a share of stock should be permitted to be issued against the betterments so made. Without efficient public supervision of stock and bonding enterprises this is exactly what will be done to the end of time. Is it not about time to move on the enemy's works?

Home Rule In Sight

All those in whose veins the milk of human kindness runs will rejoice in Home Rule being at last in sight for Ireland. It now seems as though it must soon come and an end be put to the age-long struggle. But what sort of home rule will it be? The American mind at once assumes that it will be that measure of home rule enjoyed by a state in the American union, but will that satisfy the men of Ireland? Are they at heart struggling for anything less than an independent national life for Ireland? It were unreasonable to expect that, but the Irish agitator has not always been reasonable. It would never do for England to allow Ireland to set up an independent national life. If home rule be limited to home affairs, regulated by the British common law and constitution, all will be well with Ireland and England. Just there the uttermost bounds of Irish ambition should, by common consent, be set.

Humans As Assets

The secretary of the state board of health recently created some popular interest in rearing humans as a gainful pursuit, and many and varied have been the comments thereon. That the thought should be at all novel is due to the fact that we, in America, have been unmindful of what the rest of the world is doing. In Europe generally, but particularly in Germany, every child is looked upon as being an asset of the fatherland, every workman is as certainly regarded as having a property value as every horse, ox or ass, inasmuch as the privileged classes know better than here by the sweat of whose brow come all their luxurious living and freedom from toil and care.

As an aside it may be observed that any family going into the business of rearing children for profit will find it expedient to rear girls rather than boys. They are marketed earlier, are not averse to devoting their earnings to the common good of the family, whereas the sons are later in being fitted for life and commonly want help from the old folks in establishing themselves in life until they are somewhere about thirty years old.

But there is a phase of this subject that we have not seen treated and that is the value of a human as an asset as a basis for commercial or industrial enterprise. In other words, for the capitalization of labor.

Dr. Snow places the cost of rearing an adult person at $4,000 to $5,000 by the time he has attained his majority. It is commonly expected that capital invested in industrial or commercial enterprises will yield 12 to 15 per cent. per annum. So rated, by the time a worker can earn $1,200 a year he should be valued as an investment at $10,000. If he can earn $1,500 a year his investment valuation would be $12,500.

Now suppose that a corporation is formed for any industrial or commercial enterprise. Some of the incorporators invest their cash in the stock while those who are to do the work invest themselves at their respective valuations as human assets, and stock in the corporation is issued to them proportionately. Their value as an asset can be as easily ascertained as their value as wage earners.

Thereafter the business is conducted, and the earnings are divided, in proportion to the several investments. The person who invests $10,000 or $12,000 in cash receives on his capital exactly what the laborer receives who invests himself at a similar valuation. How such a scheme would work out in practice is not here considered. That there might be some difficulties in the worker drawing down his dividends to live on as he goes along, and in making up losses if no profits are gained, is evident, but the illustration makes more clearly evident than the wages system the essentially co-operative nature of the employment of labor and capital in productive industry. If the man who puts in cash must assume all the risks of failure that risk must somehow be equalized in sharing the profits.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

[Note: The following verses are really very much worse than they sound if sonorously recited, but as they happen to say what their author had in his mind to say he has ignored the protests of his associates on The Staff and, "let them go Gallagher."]

WHAT WILL IT BE LIKE?

By Arthur J. Pillsbury

What will it be like to be dead, I wonder?
What will it be like to be dead?
Like a low, swaying cloud black with thunder
Is it something we have reason to dread?

When on my bed I am helplessly lying,
Sorrowing friends standing tearfully by,
With finger on pulse one whispers, "He's dying,"
What will it be like to let go and to die?

Will it be like the birth of a baby,
With a sputtering, mewling wail,
That we enter the door of eternity
Our lost loved and the Lord to hail?

Or will it be more like the landing
From a ship on a far distant shore,
On the quay friends expectantly standing
Crying, "There he is, heaven bless him, coming o'er?"

A gasp and a gurgle, a final convulsion,
A spasm, a tremor, the dread word has been said!
Oh, what at the instant succeeding transition,
God of the Universe, will it be like to be dead?

Will the transition be simple and easy?
Will we laugh when at last we've passed through
To find that what we so dreaded
Was ever and ever so easy to do?

Will the scenes be all strange, terrifying?
Will the shapes that take form in the gloom
Be such as we saw in our childhood
When the dawn struggled into our room?

Will it be as with one who's been dreaming
And awakes at a touch with a start,
To find some loved one radiantly beaming
A sweet message of love from the heart?

Shall the soul sleep on through the ages
Like a fossil embedded in clay
'Till the world has grown old and lifeless
Awaiting the dawn of the Judgment Day?

Will death in the guise of wise Prospero come
A soul to set free as Ariel from the pine?
Shall the universe be the spirit's wide home
And the stars stepping stones to the Empyrean?

Shall we be brought to the throne of Jehovah,
To stand naked, transparent, exposed to view
While the Angel of Record the pages turns over
And the eyes of the Lord search our souls, through and through?

It is not through fear this secret I'd know,
For ever in this have I placed my trust;
If for weal or for woe, above or below,
I can stand what my neighbors must.

Gehenna or Hades! Tartarus, Hell!
What are these to the weight of my spirit's dread
When the Sisyphus stone of my doubt rolls down
And I fear 'twill be nothing at all to be dead?

I would rather be sent to a lake of red fire,
In a literal hell be dumped heels over head,
Than be cast to one side like a punctured tire
To be nothing whatever at all when I'm dead.

All helpless came I into this world,
Yet sweet was the provision for my coming made,
Shall my weary-winged spirit across dark waters whirled
On pillow less downy be less tenderly laid?

And sweet were the words of the Savior of Men
When he told of the Father's wide house on high,
A niche to crawl into shall he not have for me when
In nature's due course I lay me down for to die?

Alack and alas! Heigh-ho and ah me!
In the mercy of God do I place my trust,
Especially so where I cannot see,
And for the best of all reasons—because I must.

What will it be like to be dead, I wonder?
Unknown spirit plumed for your flight,
Shall it be into the glories of morning up yonder,
Or out into the night, O my God! Out into the night?

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Organizing Leagues of Politeness

Largely owing to the efforts of one Fraulein Cecilia Meyer, the city of Berlin now has a League of Politeness, as it is termed. The name of the league indicates its character. It is formed for the purpose of practicing and disseminating the practice of politeness. Each member is vowed to be polite at all times and in all places, and an emblem worn in his (or her) buttonhole indicates to those with whom he comes in contact that this is his purpose. For example, a masculine member would give his seat in a street car to a woman, and a feminine member would thank him for doing so, either of which proceedings sometimes produces a nervous shock in the land of the free and home of the brave. It is intended that the league shall attain a worldwide scope in its operations. Rome had such an organization even before Berlin, and it is expected that England, France, Austria, America—in brief, the civilized world—will follow in due season. The reason why it is to be confined to the civilized world perhaps is because it is felt that that part of the world needs it most. At any rate, this part of the world is not so far from knowing such a need that a League of Politeness should not be welcomed here.

"There Is No National Humor"

The caption of this paragraph is a quotation from an address delivered by Prentiss C. Hoyt, professor of English in Clark college. Continuing, he says concerning humor: "It is not American, nor English, nor French, but individual and personal. It is not a real classification, any more than American literature proves to be American only on closer analysis. . . . We in America are too conglomerate a people to claim a characteristic development. We cannot expect from the Swede, the Englishman, the Irish, etc., a reincarnation into one distinct form of humor. . . . Unless the vegetable poetess who haunts the homes of our city shall be ranked with Longfellow and Emerson, Bill Nye must be lopped as a dead branch from our American tree of humor. His quaint spelling makes him a humorist in part, you may say. If so, five out of every fifty college men are unconscious humorists." The last sentence makes its point well, and has in it that which most essayists who deal with humor display not, that is, humor. Moreover, with much of the foregoing one may agree, but the professor blithely hastens to his downfall. Listen to him: "The late Samuel Clemens did not always reach the truest heights of humorous expression." Doubtless this is so, but, then, neither did any other humorist who ever wrote, nor will any humorist who ever will write. Beyond the utmost height, whether of humor or somewhat else, are higher heights to be attained. If Mark Twain did not reach the "truest heights," he reached such heights as to set that major fraction of mankind who are not up to professorial standards aghast with a gurgling laughter at his quaint mixture of humorous philosophy and philosophical humor; and outside of a lecture room probably that will suffice. Even if there were such a thing as distinctively American humor, Samuel L. Clemens was too big to be confined within its limits.

A Whipping-Machine Invented

A Frenchman, who evidently is a believer in corporeal punishment, has invented a machine for whipping convicted criminals. He claims in its behalf that not only will it do away with the brutal exhibition involved in the whipping of one man by another, but it will do the job more neatly and artistically than any man could do it, which is a point to be considered by people possessing artistic souls. The machine works in the following manner: The victim first is tied in the warm place; then an index needle is set at figures indicating the number of strokes to be given; after that a button is pressed, and then the manipulator may go away and split the kind-ling for his wife or do any little job about the house, for the machine will do the rest. A particularly pleasant feature, too, is found in the fact that the automaton distributes the strokes widely over the victim's body, so that it is difficult for him to decide which place hurts most. Fortunately little use would be made of such a machine in America, but a few particularly husky ones ought to be imported for wife-beaters.

"Inventors for the Common Good"

Now and then in the history of mankind an inventor has been found with so large a regard for public welfare that he has donated his invention to all men, refusing to receive financial benefit from it. Not strangely, perhaps, the number of such men is few, but these few deserve to be remembered with gratitude. Of course no list of them could be given here, but here are the names of a few, with brief descriptions of their inventions: Logan Waller Page invented an oil-concrete which is impervious to moisture, does not chip, endures the wear and tear of automobiles, and is not unlikely to revolutionize the concrete industry. He gave it absolutely to the public. Dr. Marion Dorset discovered a remedy for the dreaded hog cholera, patented it, and turned the patent over for public use. General William Crozier invented the disappearing gun used in coast defense, and gave all rights pertaining to it to the United States government, and his patents on a wire-wound gun also were given to the public. Major O. M. Lissack invented the cartridge machines used at federal arsenals, and gave the patents to the government. Harold H. Clark patented and dedicated to the public an invention that gives warning of impending explosions in mines. Warren E. Hinds gave to the public his invention of a cotton cultivator to help eradicate the boll weevil. These are but a few names on a not over-long list, but they are names that deserve inscription on America's roll of honor.

A Deadly Gas Well

A strange story, which may or may not be true, and accordingly is given for what it may be worth, comes from Tampico, Mexico. According to its original narrator, an American company has been boring for oil in that vicinity. It bored six wells with entire success, but after going down some hundred feet in the eighth well it struck, not oil or an ordinary gas, but a black vapor which, as several deaths have demonstrated, causes the death of all persons who inhale it. Its first victims were a man, his wife and daughter, who, in fleeing from the vicinity, were overtaken by the vapor and fell dead in their tracks. Since then, according to the story, there have been several other victims. It is asserted that scientists cannot satisfactorily explain the nature of the gas, it being a phenomenon heretofore not encountered in boring oil wells; but whatever its nature, it does its deadly work. So runs the story, and it is told with some appearance of veracity, but before fully believing it, it may be as well to await such confirmation as doubtless will come if it is true.

Boys' Club of Corn-Raisers

The boys' club of corn-raisers, an organization fostered by the federal agricultural department which heretofore was mentioned in this department, now numbers more than 45,000 members, all, or nearly all, from the southern states. Recently the eleven prize-winners for 1910, none of them more than sixteen years old, were declared. One boy from South Carolina raised 228¾ bushels on an acre of ground, but as the agricultural department had made the cost of production a condition, the first place went to an Arkansas boy who raised but 119 bushels on his acre, but did it at a cost of eight cents a bushel, whereas the South Carolina boy's corn cost him 43 cents a bushel. The record of the winners ran as follows: Hughey A. Harden, Banks, Ala., 120 bushels at 32 cents a bushel; Ira Smith, Silver, Ark., 119 bushels at 8 cents; Joseph Stone, Center, Ga., 102¾ at 29 cents; Stephen G. Henry, Melrose, La., 139 4-5 bushels at 13.6 cents; W. Williams, Decatur, Miss., 146 4-7 at 18 cents; W. Ernest Starnes, Hickory, N. C., 146 2-7 at 38 cents; Floyd Gayer, Tishomingo, Okla., 95½ at 8 cents; Jerry H. Moore, Winona, S. C., 228¾ at 43 cents; Norman Smith, Covington, Tenn., 125½ at 37 cents; W. Rodger Smith, Karnes City, Tex., 83¾ at 13 2-3 cents; Maurice Olgers, Sutherland, Va., 168 at 40 cents. In addition to these first prizes, second prizes were given to Archie Odom, of Bennettsville, S. C., who raised 177¾ bushels at 23 cents, and John Williams, of Tuscaloosa, Ala., who raised 83¾ bushels at 49 cents. All of these urchins were given a free trip to the nation's capital, and if you imagine that they were not a happy lot there is no doubt that you are mistaken.

MARK TWAIN'S GIRLS

The Ladies' World for December contains a very interesting article on "Mark Twain and the children," by Albert Bigelow Paine, who was for some years intimately connected with Mr. Clemens, who, like Lewis Carroll, never lost his interest in children, particularly little girls, and formed lasting friendships with them. It was Mr. Clemens's delight to devise new plays and games and join in them, to direct and take part in charades and plays. He also had a passion for forming clubs, all the by-laws of which were of his devising. It is now nearly 20 years ago, when in Europe, that he created a club which was to be made up of one girl for each country in the world, each member pledging herself to write occasionally to himself (the chief officer), he, on his part, promising and faithfully living up to his engagement to reply to all such communications, and though most of these little girls as they grew up forgot to write, at least the one who represented "France" kept her promise.

Another club of his forming began in Bermuda years ago and was named by him "Angel Fish club," after a particularly beautifully colored fish found off the island. This was composed of 12 members. When at home, members with their parents visited him, and the billiard-room named the "Aquarium," as a proper recognition of the members, was their great resort, where they played under the instruction of their chief. Among the amusing letters that grew out of the Angel Fish club was one he sent to a little member—one of whom he seems to have been especially fond. And here again he reminds one of Lewis Carroll, one of whose chiefest joys it was to write whimsical letters to little girl friends. Mr. Clemens wrote:

"I am already making mistakes. When I was in New York six weeks ago, I was on a corner of Fifth avenue, and saw a small girl—not a big one—start across from the opposite corner, and I exclaimed to myself joyfully, 'That is certainly my Margaret,' so I rushed to meet her. But as she came nearer I began to doubt, and said to myself, 'It's a Margaret—that is plain enough—but I'm half afraid it is somebody else's.' So when I passed her I held my shell so she couldn't help but see it. Dear, she only glanced at it and passed on. I wondered if she could have overlooked it. It seemed best to find out; so I turned and followed and caught up with her, and said, deferentially, 'Dear Miss, I already know your first name by the look of you, but would you mind telling me your other one?' She was vexed, and said, pretty sharply: 'It's Douglas, if you're so anxious to know. I know your name by your looks, and I'd advise you to shut yourself up with pen and ink and write some more rubbish. I am surprised that they allow you to run at large. You are likely to get run over by a baby carriage any time. Run along, now, and don't let the cows bite you.' What an idea! There aren't any cows on Fifth avenue. But I didn't smile; I didn't let on to perceive how uncultured she was. She was from the country, of course, and didn't know what a comical blunder she was making."

WITH BOOKS AND WRITERS

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

LOOKING BACKWARD

Looking over the field of contemporaneous literature, the most significant fact that strikes the writer's eye is the renaissance of the romantic ideal. This renaissance is visible in many parts of the world and in divers ways. In three aspects it has especially attracted this writer's attention.

First, in the decline in public interest of the strictly realistic school of writers, in the field both of fiction and of drama. The novelty of Ibsen's plays has worn off, and they are being less often presented. They will, probably, long be acted for the satisfaction of a cult and for the pleasure of the technically skilled. They have performed a tremendous service to the craft of dramatists, by showing the power of a more direct, repressed method of producing dramatic effects. But as literature or as artistic reproductions of life they are as villainously, as abominably, bad as they are brilliantly successful pieces of specialized craftsmanship. Humanity, we have faith to believe, will eventually cast them out as destructive poisons. They show only the morbid and discouraging aspects of life, so out of perspective with life because so unrelieved in their gloom, that they tend toward death rather than life.

Tolstoy is dead. Another pitiless realist he, who used the utmost power of speech to paint pictures of life so desolate and so desolating that the spirit of man can hardly endure to read them through. Life itself is never, to any one, so utterly void of compensations as this. Humanity has at least its intervals of nightly oblivion. Such writers as Tolstoy would have us believe that misery is even sleepless.

The world of booklovers is beginning to perceive that the Ibsens and Tolstoy placed themselves in an equivocal position. They were not constructive artists, they were moral pamphleteers, and they used literary art merely as a club to beat into the heads of humanity their idea of humanity's diseases. Readers have come to realize this; to see that, to the extent that Ibsen and Tolstoy were prophets of evil, they were properly outside the domain of imaginative literature, with no claims upon the serious consideration of those who love literature for its own sake—which is the same thing as saying for the sake of its sweetening and ennobling influence upon the human soul. But Ibsen and Tolstoy used literary forms, thus bidding for literary consideration. Where they did this, they played with lightning, for the bald truth is—and the book world is coming to realize it—that neither Ibsen nor Tolstoy is true enough to life to stand as a constructive literary genius of the first rank. They are false in their perspective and destructive in their method.

So our first reason for believing in a renaissance of the romantic spirit is the decline in authority of the realistic school.

Our second reason for belief in this renaissance is the birth of a great novel in France, entitled "Jean Christophe," and written by a hitherto obscure author by the name of Romain Rolland. We have not seen this book but the first critics of Europe compare it with "Les Misérables" and "Wilhelm Meister" in its power and profundity. And the descriptions of its contents class it as of the romantic school, a tremendous novel of ideas and the higher passions, written on a great scale.

But our third, and chief reason for believing in the renaissance of the romantic ideal in literature is our observation, in hundreds of casual references to book and plays and writers, showing a trend of public mind away from the cold and rigid formula of realism toward the warm and growing sun of romanticism. One of the most brilliant examples of this tendency is the tendency to accept a theory advanced by Gilbert Chesterton, the English essayist, whose writings more and more challenge the admiration of the world. He is fantastical in many ways, but he has at least formulated one philosophical proposition which applies to literature as well as to the political movements and institutions of the day where he particularly applies it. This proposition is, that our theory of Progress is an hallucination and must be thrown overboard by intellectual men; that any real advance is to be made by looking backward upon the history of the past and drawing upon its rich stores of experience and example, rather than frantically trying every new invention that we can devise. He even advocates, in political science, our trying out to the full of a fair experiment, such seeming failures of the past as the Greek republic, the Holy Roman Empire, and the Jacobite monarchy of England. He points out that these things were not necessarily wrong in principle merely because their trial in practice was interrupted by barbarous force.

Now the application of this seemingly fantastical idea to our literary discussion is this: it is by just this method that the great literary achievements of the past have been won, and it is the method of the romanticist rather than the realist. It may be worth while to prove this theory by somewhat extended observation of the great names in literature.

Homer, for example, gave no thought to the observation of customs and manners of his own day. He collected the folk songs and the folk lore of the Greeks, those ancient traditions that had grown up out of the very life of the people, adorned by their most intimate speech and colored, from generation to generation, by the thought of the people. These things, truly a symposium of Greek national thought and emotion, he wove into a homogeneous and harmonious fabric of song, making a masterpiece of literature.

The Greek dramatists, also, took for their subjects the gods and national heroes of Greece, characters that had grown up in the minds of the people by long usage and conventionalization of ideas, and on these they based their plays and exhausted the riches of their poetry.

The Roman literature, insofar as it is literature, is a reflection of this Greek body of tradition, colored only by the change of racial characteristics suffered in the transfusion of ideas from the originating race to a race that gladly received that bulk of ideas as a whole for its own.

Shakespeare, also, tried no invention in his plots nor in his ideas. He went for his plots to older dramatists and novelists, who, in turn, had gone back to older dramatists and novelists, who, in their turn, had utilized the folk lore of a people as the basis of their work. Thus Shakespeare is original only in his selection of ideas, in his arrangement of words, in the power of his verse. His substance was national and racial, of the people and of the soil. This is no abatement of his glory; rather the reverse, for through him a people gave voice to their profoundest thoughts and most moving emotions in a master cry. Shakespeare looked to the past, with its rich and varied and colorful life, its proven experiences, its great characters, its method of speech revealed by generations of usage. He did not look to an undetermined future, nor brood upon the prodigious possibilities of change. He used no new language, tried no new ideas, invented no new forms. These would have been to waste time in experiments upon the doubtful hazard of a race or a series of events which might grow into accord with the theory of those experiments, but which might more probably miss it by a million leagues of thought and experience.

Goethe, likewise, went back to the life of his race for his masterpiece. Himself an heir to the new science of material things, alive to its possibilities and eager to sound its depths, he turned back for a literary basis to the medieval legends of his race, the most profound disturbance of its spirit, its reaching after the truth concerning its soul. He chose a subject that many great poets had gilded ere he touched it, that many great minds had pondered on. He adorned it with the riches of the experiences of his race, resurrected the thoughts and emotions of dead generations, and built it into a temple of the Germanic race and soil and tongue that an empire has been founded largely on its universal attracting power for the people of whose race history it is the exemplification.

Now here is where the realistic theory falls flat. It proceeds upon the assumption that the present generation suffices to exhibit the racial life and thought and emotion and speech and potentialities, all in the manifestations of these things which at present appear before the eye of the individual writer. This is a fallacy. To catch the spirit of these things it is not enough that the writer see what now is; he must know whence what now is came, what is the racial background, how the present grew out of the past, how the institutions of today depend for their life and color upon the dead generations of custom and trial. The realist sees the huge bulk of evil and he sees the destruction that it wreaks, and he cries, "All, all is vanity." But the romanticist, who has seen good triumph generations after a particular evil seemed to threaten it with certain death; who has seen institutions not merely survive but grow; who has a long perspective on the uncertainties of fate, looks at life with a larger vision, a more composed mind, a buoyant and hopeful spirit. He is not afraid to paint an ideal portrait of a man after he has beheld the triumphant life of the most awesome failure of history, Jesus Christ. The realist, who should have watched that august death and written in his own day thereof, would have said, "Such a life; the good always so perish, evil always so triumphs." Not so the romanticists John and Paul. They saw a vision of life triumphant over Death. And they were right and the realists were wrong. Judas Iscariot was the original realist. He said, "What is the use? This is a failure. I, at least, will make something by it, save something from the wreck," and he sold his Savior for a few pieces of silver.

This is what we earnestly cry for in modern literature, for a view of life that sees life whole. Ibsen and Tolstoy and the realists see it in little sections—nearly all sad—and their method leads straight to despair. Romanticism sees on a larger scale. It sees that even in the most tragic human experience Nature supplies an anaesthetic to pain, provides recompenses for sorrow, fortifies the spirit even to meet inescapable doom. It sees that love breeds peace and reconciliation, even where love itself falls a martyr in the midst of strife. It sees that there are friends of the friendless, helpers of the poor, sympathy in the universal human heart. And over all it sees a divinity that shapes our ends better than we could shape them.

Now, our ground for encouragement lies in this, that in our miscellaneous reading we see every day evidences that this wholesome view of life is behind the criticisms of books, that men everywhere are looking eagerly for a writer with a soul expansive enough, a vision broad enough, and a sympathy inclusive enough to send his imagination beyond the obvious and sordid details of everyday life, out into the realm of faith and spiritual insight and back into the racial springs of experience, who then will write a book full of thought, full of rich emotions, full of hope and idealism, a book that will lift up its readers' hearts in encouragement and set before them a lofty and inspiring example rather than the low and discouraging facts of a narrow and petty view of the world.

When such a book is written—and we have no more doubt of its imminence than we have of our physical being—it will be hailed with the enthusiasm of the race. The corporeal Shakespeare is dead, his artistic manner is not for us, but the Shakespearean spirit and the Shakespearean ideal live strongly in the human heart, and someday again it will flower in a glorious literary expression. The time is ripe for it, and the poet to express it is, perhaps, already born. We shall listen for the sound of his approach with ears and hearts expectant of noble things.

OUR INVALUABLE SUPERSTITIONS

By E. FRENCH STROTHER

We may say at once that a potato carried in the hip pocket will ward off the only sort of rheumatism most people are likely to get. Thus, at the very start, we take issue with the popular fallacy that all superstitions are, per se, pernicious.

Of course, we do not prescribe hip-pocket potatoes as a specific cure for rheumatism. That would be somewhat too rash; but for those people who believe that a hip-pocket potato will ward off rheumatism, we will say that, in their application of a really useful idea, they antedated the psychologists and the Christian Scientists by some appreciable intervals of history.

And if we may digress here a moment, isn't it rather odd, after all, that our inquisitive and irreverent Nineteenth Century so heedlessly, nay recklessly, toppled over so many heirloom traditions handed down from immemorial ages without anything like a good hour's study of these beliefs in anything like a catholic scientific spirit? "Away," the scientists said, "away with this bosh: it is obviously false; our eyes and intellects condemn it; it's useless, idle, pernicious—mere superstition."

And away these beliefs were thrown, from faith in the hip-pocket potato up to faith in a living God. What happened? Gradually people began to say to the scientists, "Look here, you've taken away our God and our other beliefs, but you give us nothing to take their place. It's all very well to accept what you've learned about this material earth—you have set it in order, catalogued it, put it all down in a card index. This is excellent: it satisfies our heads completely. But, gentle sirs, you forget that we have hearts as well as heads: pray, now, with what shall we feed our hearts?"

And the scientists replied, "Bother your hearts. Take them to a specialist."

But the people found that what the heart specialists knew did not answer their present needs, so they began to fall back again upon their old faiths, and many of them find these faiths wondrously healing to the broken hearts and spirits.

Well, here we come back to our superstitions. May it not be, after all, that these old foolish beliefs are necessities, that they existed because man needed them, that they served a useful purpose that paid for their keep? Maybe the exact nature of this usefulness is obscure, but may it not be almost vital in spite of that? The third finger of Caruso's left hand is probably not at all necessary to Caruso's ability to take care of himself, but that finger undoubtedly is very necessary to Caruso's peace of mind. You may say, if he should lose it, that he would lose nothing of value, but you would with difficulty reconcile Caruso to your way of thinking. My appendix, the doctors assure me, is worse than useless, but I know I shall cling to it as long as they will allow me, and I know, too, that should they compel me to part with it, I should always feel that I had been cheated of something I was entitled to keep—no, more, something that really was part of the necessary equipment of my happiness.

So with our superstitions. I admit the obscurity of their origin and the equal obscurity of their function, but function surely they have, else why has mankind so long held on to them? We may see no logical connection between a man's faith in a pet rabbit's foot and the fortune that actually comes to that man, but I, for one, do not doubt that the rabbit's foot serves that man a useful purpose, none the less. I imagine that numberless times, when his courage was shaken, he has patted that foot and felt new courage flow into his veins, sometimes the courage that actually made the difference between success and failure for him.

"Bah!" you say, "think of the weakness of a man to whom such stuff could mean so much."

Well, what would you? We are all frail, the strongest of us; even our scientists clutch at their science as holding, for them, the fortifying power of faith. They put their faith in knowledge; the Christian puts his in his God; the superstitious man puts his in his fetish. And, to our mind, the vastly important thing is the faith, not the object of the faith. This is not saying that the question of the right object of faith is not important, for it is; but the faith itself is first in importance, at least in the order of time.

I know what you will at once object. You will say, "A man should build up within himself the resources of fortitude, not look outside for something to lean upon." And I can hear you quoting, with prideful unction, Henley's

"I am the master of my fate,
I am the captain of my soul."

Now nobody admires these splendid lines more than I do, but I think I know that Henley did not tell the truth when he wrote them. If he had been the captain of his soul he would never have said so; only the doubt that he was made him deny that doubt in ringing tones. As a matter of fact, Henley was busily whistling to keep his courage up. And in reply to your other objection, that man should be self-sufficient to his needs of courage, I can only reply that, with all due respect to your theory, men simply aren't built that way. Your self-sufficient egoist, if he has imagination enough to do it, ends in the lunatic asylum and, if he has not imagination enough, gets himself run over by a railroad train which has several shades the better of him in self-sufficiency. No, you will find your Stonewall Jacksons leaning pretty heavily for their brilliant courage upon sources outside themselves.

These superstitions react upon their believers in ways that would surprise the scientist. We call to mind a woodsman of heroic build and heroic mettle, too, who would no more dare to launch a new undertaking on a Friday than he would put his horse to a precipice. But Friday is the only day he fears. Every other day he is indomitable, irresistible, brave beyond the border line of recklessness. Now see what has happened in his case. He has a certain quantity of fear in his composition, just as everybody else has. What does the ordinary man do? Why, he spreads that fear out thin over the whole week, putting a touch of fatal irresolution on every act of his life. What does this woodsman do? He lumps all his fear into one day of the week: takes it all at a dose and has done with it, leaving him six-sevenths of his life to be lived in the inspiring freedom of an extraordinary and unpolluted courage. Maybe his reasoning is wrong, perhaps he is very foolish to give any room to baseless superstition, but when I judge him by the practical results I see certain compensatory advantages in his method. Certainly one will rarely find a man more brilliantly successful when one considers the other handicaps, unnecessary to mention here, under which he has achieved success.

This same man shudders with the fear of death when he hears a dog baying the moon. But I have, with my own eyes, seen him leap lightly aside from imminent destruction and laugh away the sudden fear of it with a jest.

Now may it not be that we have judged superstitions too hastily, that we have too abruptly snapped those invisible but powerful cords that bind us to the past? Remember, it was only in the nineteenth century that the effort was made upon any great scale to measure exactly and record permanently any of even the obvious, material facts of life. So great was the success of this method when applied to obvious and material things that the bulk of the brains of the world was employed on the task of measuring and recording them. Out of this novel and fascinating occupation and absorption arose a wholly unjustifiable, though at the time natural, assumption that there was nothing else in the world than the obvious and the material. And the natural result of this assumption was to kick unceremoniously out of consideration everything subtle or obscure or purely spiritual.

But it does not follow, merely because these things temporarily got no consideration, that they are non-existent. Neither does it follow that they are pernicious. All that does follow, logically and actually, is that mankind continued to be ignorant about them. But now that material science has advanced to a point where the overwhelming novelty of it has worn off, now that research in material science has been highly specialized and fewer minds are needed to carry on that research, we venture to predict that more minds of the first rank are going to attack the obscure problems of intangible things and seek to render them explicable, even if not tangible.

And why not? What could be more absurd, seemingly, than to postulate that a wheel revolved by falling water should generate an unseen power which, cast forth again to the viewless air, should project man's thoughts across the Pacific Ocean in an instant, without error in the receiving record? Yet that is done, daily, and we have ceased to wonder at it. Then why should we say, off hand, that it is absurd to postulate that those obscure beliefs to which mankind has clung blindly down the ages may not have a corresponding basis in truth, even though the mysterious source of their power remain a mystery?

Let me not be misunderstood. I do not plead for a return to indiscriminate faith in superstitions. I imagine that for those who do not believe in them they have lost their power for usefulness. Perhaps they have no power for usefulness for anybody. But I would like to see them respectfully and patiently examined, as carefully as the facts of material science are examined, just because I am loth to believe that mankind was ever so foolish as to hold indefinitely to anything that served it no good purpose. Nothing, I think, more confounded the material scientists of the latter nineteenth century than to find that there was, after all, a scientific basis of truth for most of the medical theories of the unlearned masses. A great deal of the work of medical research has been simply to find out this scientific basis for accepted practices. It is interesting, in this connection, to find that the most distinguished successor of Pasteur, Metchnikoff, has gone direct to the people who live longest and has taken their characteristic diet of sour milk as a basis for researches into the methods of inducing longevity. The earlier scientists—of say fifty years ago—would have dismissed sour milk with a scoff as a "superstition."

Perhaps there are other superstitions that may yield good results in ascertained truth when sifted properly.

If brevity is the soul of wit, one of the wittiest speeches on record was made by a woman. Mrs. Briggs lived in the northern part of Indiana, a long distance from any village, says the Youth's Companion. Hearing that the Rev. Mr. Goodwin was to preach in a township some twenty miles distant, she resolved to be present, and as no other way offered, she walked the twenty miles. The pastor heard of this, and was so pleased at the appreciation which it showed that at the close of the sermon he mentioned the fact to the congregation, and called upon Mrs. Briggs to tell them how she came. Rising slowly, she looked over the audience with great solemnity, and said: "I hoofed it." Then she sat down.

Parcells Safe Co.

SOLE AGENTS

DIEBOLD SAFES AND VAULTS

ALL-STEEL FILES AND
OFFICE EQUIPMENT

577 Market St.

San Francisco

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

At End of the Way

It is well to lay down or mattock or pen
With the thought, "I have striven as best I could;
The thing I have done I would do again,
For e'en in its failure were written the
good."
It is well to feel, as the sun sinks low Down the crimson west ere the day lies dead,
That the height's beyond, and the path we go Through the vale, to that height has the nearer led.

I hold that at last, in the long, long scale,
There is never a failure on right attends.
We strive, and we sink, to murmur, "I fail,"
But our deed to his purpose the wise God bends;
And there's ne'er a success, though it wear
a crown,
That holdeth life's tinsel supreme and dear,
But shall sink to its grave 'neath the might of
His frown,
While His angel shall write, "A Failure lies here."

Then if this be adieu, speak the word with a smile;
There is naught for a tear where there's naught to regret.
The stone that the builders rejected the while,
The angels of God may find use for it yet.
So here's to the right, and here is all hail
To him who is next in the race to be run
In the cause of the right which shall surely prevail,
For the white God of Justice, his will shall be done.

* * *

Concerning Philosophy

Philosophy, my dear Elnathan, is a garment we make and fit for the other fellow. Also, we guarantee that it is perfectly adjustable to all states and conditions of men, shrinkable or enlargeable to meet the individual need. It is evident, we assert, that it is just the garment for anybody and everybody, and if once in a while some son of a gun will not wear it without squirming, it is evident that he deserves scornful condemnation.

This is the way we invariably feel about the matter until, one day, there comes along a trouble or a grief and reaches its skeleton hand into our individual life. Now is the time for your cloak of philosophy to deaden the clutch of those chilling fingers. In your anguish you attempt to put it on, and, behold, it does not fit! There is your guarantee nicely stitched into its collar, but—it doesn't fit.

You go out into the night, and the burden of your sorrow is upon you. Your cloak of philosophy is at hand, its neat, smooth stitches of platitudes glistening in the moonlight, and you are surprised to note in yourself an inclination to dump it over a fence and have done with it. Occasionally you attempt to draw it over your shoulders, and after you have done so you understand why the other fellow complained, for it fits nowhere; where it should touch it is absent, and where it should not touch it nearly chokes the life out of you. It is a beautiful garment for all times and places, except when and where it is most needed.

Such is man's philosophy, Elnathan, and if you do not believe me ask someone who has supped with sorrow and joined right hands with grief. It is a beautiful garment to look upon; make the most of that fact, for it is a terrible misfit on any rainy day of woe.

* * *

A Suspicious New Year Wish

"You appear to be worried. What's the matter?"
"Old Squeezem wished me a happy New Year."

"Well, what of that?"

"Why, he holds the mortgage on my house and lot."

The Opinions of Rufus

I've heered that in the big book Up-stairs
the wust failure is debited to him that succeeds in doin' what oughtn't to be did.

If some of us had follered the advice we've given free to others we'd be consider'ble better off than we are.

Josh Bings says he's allers found the Scripchers satisfyin', but not es much so es they would be if they told who fed Noah's menagerie.

Some men figger that nothin' pays much better than a little garden—speshully if their wives are fond of gardenin'.

Speakin' of the religious hist'ry of Rockefeller, Morgan an' Carnegie, course I'm delighted to know they feel assured they're goin' to heaven, but I hope the pavement up there is nailed down middlin' solid.

Food an' creeds is some alike—useful, but if you swaller too much of 'em you're liable to git dyspepsy.

Ever notice a feller so unctuously good that you couldn't tell whether what ailed him was grace or grease?

The club that w'an't founded on the youtickle-me-an'-I'll-tickle-you theery had a short an' inglorious career.

There's a good deal of truth in the old sayin' that the race ain't always to the swift.
I reckon it's full es apt to depend on how the jockeys have fixed it.

Happy New Year!

On New Year's Day we folk all say, "A happy New Year, friend! May all good fortune bless your way and peace on you attend!" But when the cheery words are said we've business of our own; so if our friend should ask for bread his hand-out is a stone.
So blithely ring the words who'd flunk to pay their utmost price? And yet perchance were each a plunk we'd think about it twice. "A happy New Year!"—Then embark each on his separate way, and to some friend in need remark, "This is my busy day." "A happy New Year!" Words of weal, and yet too oft we vow, when some friend's vessel breaks its wheel, "He'll have to steer his scow." And, thinking of these divers things of human weakness blended, my Muse shall flutter once her wings, and then her song is ended; her wings shall flutter but this once, and ne'er another flutter, for though she's bred to many stunts she has but this to utter: The happy New Year! wish may do, but better worth our praising to help the chap we wish it to if he's in need of raising, for words are more than brittle things, to little they've amounted compared with deeds, for they have wings to reach the goal that's counted.

* * *

A "Good Cheer Dinner"

Thursday evening of last week James H.
Barry gave a "good cheer dinner" to his associates of the Star press. It deserved its name. I have attended a goodly number of banquets in my time, but none whereat the spirit of brotherly good will was so unequivocally in evidence as at these annual functions given by Mr. Barry, the "Jim" of our affectionate regard. As we sit about that board frills are superseded by fraternal love, and shallow pretence by good, red-blooded reality. The shoddy of life may be left to other and shallower occasions; it would be out of place in such a presence.

I might formally report the proceedings at that "good cheer dinner," but I will not do it, for what really counted there was the kindly feeling reaching from one to another throughout the assemblage, and formal reports have no art to transmit that sort of thing. About that table genuine good will bubbled over and so manifested itself that none could doubt its presence there, and this it is, and this alone, that makes any feast splendidly worth while.

Our Methodist brethren used to say, "I feel that it is good to be here," and as they felt, so felt we all about that richly laden board,
and at that we will let it go.

In Life's Moving Picture Show

It impressed me as peculiar that as the heavily draped figure paced to and fro before the entrance to the mighty hall, I could not distinguish his features. At times, indeed, I fancied that I was about to make them out, but even while I looked they became, as it were, misty and dim unto my sight. And yet another thing caused me to marvel, for although the great door stood widely open before me, I could see no whit beyond its portal; it was as if the power of sight suddenly and completely ceased at that magic line, and I knew by the actions of the multitude of people who stood about me that it was even so with them.

While I mused on a situation so surprising,
the draped figure spoke, and I listened to him.

"Walk right in, ladies and gentlemen, old men and women or prattling babes," he said,
"for the vast hall is for you; and therein shall you look upon such moving pictures as never yet were displayed in any cinematograph devised by man."

"What will we see?" someone inquired, thus giving voice to the question I had not ventured to utter.

"You shall see—ah, you shall see many things," the veiled figure responded. "Some you shall see drenched by the black rain of tears, and others you shall see bathed in the sunshine of glad laughter. You shall see the useless, glittering gems of wealth, and the grim, fluttering rags of poverty. You shall see men gambling for millions, and skeleton forms of neglected children toiling to help accumulate these plaything millions. You shall see Dives affronting God by his prayers, while the multifold Lazarus engendered of his greed scarcely may secure the crumbs that fall from his table. Churches and saloons, temples and dives, virtue that draws its skirts
aside from vice and vice that scoffs at virtue.
Bibles and rum, man-made heavens and man-made hells, religion italicized by warships and brotherly love emphasized by cannon-balls—all these things, ladies and gentlemen, you shall see or hear, and over each and all of them shall be displayed the significant banner with its proud proclamation, 'This Is a Christian Nation.' Walk right in, ladies and gentlemen; walk right in."

The multitudinous crowd began to move toward the door, but I desired further information before I entered, and at last, after some hesitation, I ventured to speak.

"What is the name of the mighty hall?" I inquired.

"It is the Hall of Life," the figure replied.

"And your name?"

"I am the New Year."

Then, as the mighty crowd still surged inward, I went with it, yet with some vague knowledge of the quality of the pictures upon which I should look.

* * *

"He That Overcometh"

When all the birds are singing,
And all the days are fair;
When blossom-censers swinging
Breathe fragrance on the air;
When every heart is cheery
With all the joy of life,
And e'en the ones who weary
Look upward from the strife,
Why, then 'tis easy, easy,
A deed of love to do,
When days are summer-breezy
And all the skies are blue

But when the birds are hidden,
And each sweet voice is dumb;
When souls, of joy forbidden,
In homes of clay are numb;
When every heart is drear;
And every night is drear;
When, looking to the morrow,
We see no ray of cheer,
'Tis then that nature summeth
Our sorrows, and all
But "he that overcometh"
Shall ruler be of all.

Birdseye View of the Proposed Waterfront Exposition Site

THE WATERFRONT EXPOSITION IDEA

The California Weekly is indebted to the courtesy of The Architect and Engineer for the use of the engraving shown herewith, illustrating the plan for a waterfront exposition in 1915.

This plan should not be abandoned until it has been proven not feasible after a searching study by engineers and architects who are familiar with the conditions in San Francisco. For a genuine danger confronts the exposition builders: in most of the discussion of the idea it seems to have been taken for granted that Golden Gate park would be the site chosen, and that the exposition itself would be a reproduction of the conventional expositions of the past. Now it is certain that this latter idea will not do at all; it is certain that no great body of people from the United States, not to speak of Europe and Asia, will make the long trip to see another Chicago or St. Louis fair. The world is sated with this bewildering and wearying form of entertainment, and it may safely be assumed that such a reproduction would be a failure.

What is needed is an original conception in exposition building, something striking to the eye, novel and appealing to the imagination. At least so far as one may judge from an untechnical investigation, the waterfront exposition idea has these merits. The plan to display the actual commerce of a great port as the leading motif of an exposition appeals strongly.

And the permanent quality of the investment is worth pondering. If the exposition could leave behind it enduring wharves and an improved water approach, it would contribute not only to the permanent attractiveness of the city but also to its facilities for handling a growing commerce.

Another advantage to be remembered is that the proximity of such an exposition to the permanent business centre of the city would assure to the permanent hotels and the established merchants the patronage of the multitudes who attend the exposition. The experience of those cities—notably St. Louis—where expositions have been held in outlying districts is, that ephemeral buildings were erected near the grounds for the accommodation of visitors and fly-by-night merchants caught the bulk of the trading done by the visitors, leaving little for the regular merchants or the regular hotel-keepers.

And it should just as well be frankly understood that the purpose of this exposition is to provide a temporary and extraordinary current of business for the mercantile houses of San Francisco, in the hope that such a windfall will help these houses over the hard times incident to the present reaction caused by the lull following the expenditure of most of the ready capital of the city in the work of rehabilitation. If the exposition fails to produce this unwonted current of business it will prove a failure in the eyes of San Francisco. It should, therefore, be thought out from the point of view of the greatest and most permanent advantage to the greatest number of permanent residents of the city.

PEOPLE

Liebler & Co. have decided to produce "Judith Zaraine," by C. M. S. McLellan, in Christmas week. Some time ago Miss Lena Ashwell, the English actress, was put under contract by Liebler & Co. to play the part of Judith. The management has now decided to make the production with Wilton Lackaye and Miss Ashwell in the principal parts. "Judith Zaraine" is a play written upon the labor situation in a Pennsylvania town.

Arthur Hammerstein's latest discovery is Samuel S. Schneier, a Jewish actor. He has been engaged to play one of the leading roles in his new music drama, "The Maestro's Masterpiece." It is said that he was really "discovered" by the late Yiddish author, Jacob Gordin. Mr. Schneier is a native of Russia and made his first appearance at the age of 12 years in an amateur production in that country. Mr. Gordin chanced to be present at the performance and was so impressed with the boy's work that he sought him out and encouraged him to adopt the stage as a profession.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

The Dawn of The New Era On Monday next the thirty-ninth regular session of the California legislature will convene at Sacramento. It were well if some means could be found for conveying to the mind of that legislature with what hope and fear the common people of this state are looking to it to do the right thing by the state and all of its interests. To what can we liken the feeling of the public mind and heart toward this new administration, executive and legislative, if not to witnessing the launching of a great transatlantic airship freighted with our nearest and dearest friends? Not since the advent of the Big Five who conquered the Sierras and subjected the people of a free state has so much been expected of any administration as of this. Well, we shall see what we shall see. No one should prejudice. Not even the men themselves, from governor down to the assemblyman from the remotest district, can absolutely foreknow how he will acquit himself. There is no telling except by trying, and trying times we shall have for the next few weeks.

On Monday the old officers of senate and assembly will call those two houses together, fortunately for no purpose more important than to turn those two bodies over to the new membership for purposes of organization, a process that will take two or three days, at the conclusion of which the legislature will canvass the returns of the late election and declare Hiram W. Johnson and A. J. Wallace duly elected governor and lieutenant-governor respectively, whereupon they will be sworn in and will assume the duties of their high offices.

To Governor Johnson A Heartfelt Greeting Almost with its expiring breath The California Weekly sends you greeting, godspeed and good cheer, Hiram W. Johnson. In the heyday of your manhood, with a courage equal to any demands, a clear brain and a true heart, you enter upon the duties of your high office with high hopes in the hearts of a great majority of the people of California, and yet with subtle, sullen schemers studying how they can trick you into error or, by marshalling all the forces of evil about you, thwart you of your purposes. Such men do not believe in free government, do not want equality before the law or laws that are just, or a square deal for all. They want special privileges and immunities, places for unfit men. Only one really good thing do they want: order, peace, the apprehension and imprisonment of those criminals who do violence without the excuse which only gentlemen may urge, "dementia Americana." They will help you to police the state, to strengthen its military arm, to prevent picketing when there are strikes and to suppress disorder, but they will not help you to so amend the criminal laws that men of their own class may be punished for crimes committed against all the people. It will not be one month before the virus of their poison will be detected permeating the press of the state to your injury and to the injury of your administration. In that hour you will need friends. Make friends. Invite the conferences and confidences of those that you know you can trust and then do as to you seems best answerable to your God and the commonwealth that has honored you. No man can live to himself alone, and certainly no governor with a great reform work to do and a great state to redeem from corporation domination. Consider well, not procrastinate, before you act, but when you act let the act stand unless there be overwhelming reasons why it should not.

And do not hesitate to do your part as part of the legislative branch of government. You are a part of it. The state will hold you to no small degree responsible for what this legislature does, just as the nation is now holding President Taft responsible for what the American congress has done and is to do. It may not be written into the scheme of government that this added burden should be placed on your shoulders, but there it is: One of the tests of a successful executive is to influence a legislature for good, to hold it to definite purposes and get good work out of it. Do not be afraid of assuming responsibility. It is side-stepping it that hurts; and do not delegate to any body of men those duties that belong to you to perform. Hear as much from all sides as is germane to the issue, make up your mind what needs to be done and do it. California wants things done, not a fine assortment of reasons why they can't be done. These things are not said through fear that these will be your faults, but because they have been the faults of other governors, faults that left their administrations sorely marred if not emptied of honor. God bless you and bear you up lest you dash your foot against a stone placed in your path from evil and cunning design. The influences you defeated in the election have not stopped fighting. They have merely taken their bolos and gone to the bushes.

Greeting To Wallace The office of Lieutenant-Governor is not as important as it should be, but its importance is not to be overlooked. Your influence upon legislation in the more important chamber of the two can be made very real. The Watchman knows that you will do no thing that your good conscience tells you is not right. On that side the most implicit confidence will be placed in you. But will you dare always to beard the lion in his den, the tiger in his lair? Will you never once stand as a spectator while you might usefully lend a hand? "To dare, to dare, always to dare," that is the way to meet the public enemy, those special interests that will beset this administration from start to finish. Not that you are by nature timid, but only that through that innate modesty that characterizes you you may miss a few good fights that you could have a hand in as well as not. This administration must be belligerent for the right or fail of measuring up to popular requirements, and you are a part of that administration. Success to you, and the hope of The Watchman is that you will be able to make yourself of so much service to the administration, outside the letter of the law, that the legislature and people will be disposed to invest your office with larger duties than now appertain to it. Good luck.

Hewitt For Speaker At this writing it seems likely enough that A. H. Hewitt of Yuba and Sutter will be elected speaker of the assembly. The candidacy of Schmidt of San Francisco is a joke, but that of W. D. L. Held of Mendocino may not be. Held is a bright fellow and a good man, but it is no injustice to him to say of him that just where he has lined up heretofore has been to a fraction of a degree uncertain. He has rather hovered in that twilight zone that has neither justified a suspicion nor made assurance very sure. We shall be surprised if the reactionary element in the legislature does not stand for Held. The position of Hewitt is more clear. Everybody knows where he stands and that is the sort of man to be elected speaker. The outlook is for the nomination and election of Hewitt, a fit selection from all points viewed.

The Best One Yet The thirty-eighth legislature was, all things considered, the best one the state had seen for many decades, but the state will be disappointed if this one does not prove the best ever, and mainly for the reason that, this time, the momentum and the confidence and the expectation of the public are all united on the good side. The weak brethren will not have to go over to the corporation side in order to find something to lean on to hold them up. The Watchman looks for a militant, confident, aggressive legislature. The greatest danger lies in falling into holes that the Herrinites dig in legislative paths when honest folk are not looking. Look out for bugs and bolomen.

The Work of Hercules The supreme obligation resting upon the legislature and the administration is to do all in their power to enable justice to be established in this commonwealth so that successful rascality may not snap its fingers under the nose of the Goddess Justice and demand to know what she is going to do about it. Many good things will be proposed, but how many will get themselves done? The Commonwealth Club sent up a fine lot of bills two years ago, but confided them to incompetent hands and nothing came of the effort. Furthermore, a good, big percentage of the Commonwealth Club is itself opposed to any such reform of our criminal procedures as would put higher-ups in stripes. The good men in that club will help, the bad ones will not, and not too much is to be expected of it.

Nor must the issues be left alone to the bar associations, no matter how good resolutions they may endorse. Physicians will, as a body, vote and act on behalf of those preventive and sanitary measures that will cut every member of the association off from fees, but there runs no such tradition through the legal fraternity. Rather are the members thereof inclined to provoke litigation than to prevent it. The low estate to which our jurisprudence has fallen is directly to be laid at the door of attorneys who have found it profitable to save from prison persons who ought to be in prison and, to that end, they have stripped the trial courts of power, promoted appeal on every conceivable pretext and "queered" the whole judicial system at every possible point. It is the undoing of what these unworthies have done that constitutes the "Work of Hercules" imposed upon the thirty-ninth legislature of California.

Program of Conference The conference of committees to present recommendations to the legislature, for the purpose of carrying out the Republican platform pledges, convenes just as The California Weekly goes to press, so it is impossible in this issue to give an account of just what happened. But a fair idea of the certainties of that conference is accessible in the program arranged for the two-day session. This program is as follows:

Thursday

Afternoon Session

"Conservation".....Dr. George C. Pardee
"Railroad Legislation".....Senator J. W. Stetson
"State Public Service Commission".....

.....Percy V. Long

Evening Session

"Election Laws".....Senator A. E. Boynton
"City and County Government and Amendment No. 1".....State Controller A. B. Nye

Friday

Morning Session

"Civil Service and Merit System".....
.....Senator L. H. Roseberry
"Direct Legislation".....Senator Lee C. Gates

Afternoon Session

"Revision of Criminal Procedure".....
.....Hon. W. J. Hunsaker
"Reform for First Offenders".....
.....Judge Curtis D. Lindley
"Employers' Liability and Injunction in Labor Disputes".....Mr. Harris Weinstock

Evening Session

"Woman Suffrage".....Senator Chas. W. Bell
"Reapportionment".....

.....Senator N. W. Thompson

These addresses, and their informal discussion, offer a rich field for bringing out the ideas of the leaders of the reform movement upon the practical details of embodying the general principles into statutes.

Unprofitable Disputation The Watchman has seldom found it profitable to hold disputation with a hired wrist. It is too much like kicking at a shadow in that it exhausts the kicker and makes no impression upon the shadow. Nevertheless, for the edification of the Candid "Fiend" of The Call The Watchman will venture to observe that, in the event that the advisory vote for United States senator proposed to be mandatory it may properly be held to be, what the law itself says it is, "advisory." Eddie, "advisory," nothing more and nothing less, the advice to be treated exactly as other advice is treated by legislators who belong to themselves, being neither owned by corporations nor bluffed by newspapers, but having a decent regard for what their constituents think, as well as for public opinion in general. Had there been, at the August primary, such a popular expression of opinion for United States senator as there was for governor, had either Judge Works, A. R. Spalding or Mr. Meserve received a popular vote bearing such a ratio to the vote received by other candidates as Hiram W. Johnson received as compared with what other candidates for the Republican nomination for governor received, there would not now be the smallest question as to the "mandatory" character of the advisory vote. The People of California would have spoken and every legislator would know his duty as representative of the people. As the vote was, it evinced no marked preference of the people for any of the candidates named. The race was a "dead heat."

Break loose, Brother Cahill. You are by your inconsequential jabbering discrediting the only department of The Call that has not been a just object of suspicion ever since the ownership of The Call intervened on behalf of Bill Crocker's ill-starred candidacy for making P. H. McCarthy mayor of San Francisco. That "queered" The Call for once and all.

When the Law Is Law The Sacramento Bee, And When It Is Not in the plenitude of its desire to be square, advises the legislature to accept the advisory feature of the primary law as it is written, notwithstanding the conceded truth that it was so written as the result of a corrupt and cunning job, elect Spalding to the United States senate and then so change the law that the same thing cannot happen again, declaring that "law is law" and to be respected no matter how it came to be law. The point is conceded that "law is law no matter how it is made," but statute is not law unless it is constitutional and within the power of a legislature to legislate. As we have many times set forth in these columns the district provisions of the direct primary law are null, void and of no effect, in that they are unconstitutional and ultra vires, the legislature having no power to prescribe how any member of that body shall be advised. The fate of Spalding should rest on the pledges which members may or may not have made to their constituents and not at all upon the district provisions in the primary law. That law should be read as though those provisions were not in it.

What Is The Presumption? Such of the properties of railroads, and other public service corporations, as are not used in the operations of those corporations are to be, and heretofore have been, assessed by county assessors. Inasmuch as the county assessors have, in recent years, been more "reasonable" in assessing than has the state board of equalization, these corporations have been solicitous to segregate as much of their property as possible into the non-operative class. Under the new system of taxation, provided for in amendment number one, whatever can be classified as operative property will be covered by the gross-receipts tax and whatever cannot be so classed, but must remain as non-operative, must be assessed by local assessors and pay a tax in addition to the gross-receipts tax. Now what is the presumption in the minds of all knowing persons as to what these corporations will do? Why, the presumption is that scoundrelism will characterize their conduct and that they will proceed with great diligence to transfer, by hook and by crook, into the class of operative properties what they have for several years been equally diligent in transferring into the class of non-operative properties. And yet people wonder why the public is suspicious of corporations and regret that they have not souls to be damned as well as bodies to be kicked! This presumption may, in the testing, prove unjust to the corporations. Heaven give them grace with one accord to take the public by surprise and do the level thing. It would be a solar-plexus stroke of policy as well as refreshing to the spirit, but the presumption runs to the other thing.

PERSONALIA

The New theatre announces that, following its policy of occasionally presenting plays in which "stars" may appear as "guest artists," with the regular company, the directors have invited Miss Marie Tempest to play the role of Becky Sharp in a revival of "Vanity Fair." This version of "Vanity Fair" was written by Cosmo Gordon-Lennox and Robert Ilichens and was presented in London ten years ago, with Miss Tempest in the same part. It has never been seen in this country.

Shakespeare's plays are to be translated into Italian by Diego Angeli and presented in Rome. The task has been under way for some time. The translation of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" has already been accomplished, and the work is said to be highly regarded by critics.

It is announced that Oscar Strauss, composer of "The Chocolate Soldier" and "The Waltz Dream," has finished a new opera entitled "The Little Friend," and this will receive an American presentation next year.

Miss Delia Sharp, for the past twelve years deputy circuit clerk in Jasper county, Mo., has been declared elected circuit clerk, after a strongly contested campaign. Miss Sharp's opponent on the Democratic ticket was one of the most popular farmers in the county, and the man whom she defeated for the nomination at the Republican primaries was against her, with his family connection of some 150 members. She gained the largest vote in the mining districts, where she visited the principal mines and where she went down in the cage and talked with the men at work. Miss Sharp is described as an attractive girl who has made her own way. She is keen in business matters, and was admitted to the Jasper county bar in 1901 with the highest grades ever given an applicant.

Rose Stahl, who has convulsed the continent in "The Chorus Lady," will appear in a new play by Charles Klein, the title being "Maggie Popper."

SHEAR WIT

When Baron Rothschild died, a poor Jew was found standing outside the Rothschild's residence, weeping bitterly. One of the porters tried to console him: "Don't carry on so, old man: it isn't as if you're one of the family." "Ach," answered the poor man, "that's why I cry."

It was at a concert, says the Washington Star. Several musical numbers had already been given, and the announcer had just risen to give the next selection. He was noticeably nervous, but so far had succeeded in filling the requirements of his position. "The next number on the program, ladies and gentlemen, is by Mr. Walter Jones." He paused and considered a second. "And is entitled 'When I Swallow Homesick Flies.' Needless to remark, there was a titter among the audience, but after the song had been rendered those familiar with music managed to recognize it as "When the Swallows Homeward Fly."

Colonel "Abe" Gruber, at a luncheon at Saratoga, paused in an eloquent address to tell a story, says the Cincinnati Enquirer. "Yes," he said, "those two factions are as inextricably opposed as Brown and Black. 'Brown and Black were always arguing. They could never see any question in the same light. "'Brown,' said Black one day, 'I wonder what would happen if you ever agreed with me on anything?' 'I'd be wrong; I'd be wrong,' Black answered hurriedly."

"How is the new filing system? Success?" asked the agent of the merchant to whom he had sold a "system" a few days before. "Great!" said the merchant. "Good!" said the agent, rubbing his hands. "And how is business?" "Business?" echoed the merchant. "Oh, we have stopped business to attend to the filing system."—San Francisco Star.

Dubley—Of course, every young man thinks he'd be perfectly happy if he could only have his own way. Wise—Yes, and the older he grows the happier he is to think that he didn't have it.—Catholic Standard and Times.

Bound Volumes of "The California Weekly"

A limited number of sets of the entire series of issues of "The California Weekly" (covering two years) have been bound in two volumes (three-quarters leather) and may be obtained for $5, express prepaid, upon application to

A. J. PILLSBURY,
222 Pala Avenue,
Piedmont Station,
Oakland, Cal.

Extra File Copies

Those wishing to complete their files of the paper can obtain copies of any issue, while they last, for 10 cents a copy, postpaid, upon application at the same address.

Binding for Private Files

Those wishing to have their own files bound for permanent keeping, can have this done for $2 a volume by

UPTON BROS. & DELZELLE,
144 Second Street,
San Francisco, Cal.

THE WOMAN SUFFRAGE AMENDMENT

ITS HISTORY AND PRESENT PROSPECTS

By LILLIAN HARRIS COFFIN

Fourteen years ago a promised constitutional suffrage amendment passed the legislature and came before the people. Years of effort had been devoted to securing that success. After its passage the state was immediately organized and districted, and an energetic campaign was carried on among the voters, with the result that when the votes were counted the majority to carry was lacking, but the size of the favorable vote was sufficient encouragement for further efforts. The southern districts gave a large majority; the northern districts did likewise, as did the interior portion of the state. The failure of the amendment to carry was due to the large opposition vote which came from San Francisco and vicinity, thoroughly organized districts controlled by great commercial interests.

Time for Resubmission

In desiring a suffrage amendment to our state constitution we begin with the premise that the voters of this state should be permitted, at this time, to express their sentiments as to whether the women of the state shall have the ballot. We hold that legislators should never be obstructionists. Constitutions should never be iron-bound or padlocked, but should be flexible instruments, framed for the regulation of government, and should be amended to meet the progressive requirements of a progressive people.

The word "male" was written into the article of our state constitution referring to the requirements for citizen enfranchisement when the state became a self-governing body, some sixty years ago—at a time when an ox team was a familiar sight, when vessels came up to Montgomery street, when the people exchanged gold dust for commodities. Now all of these primitive conditions have changed. We have become modernized. We have built a great metropolis, wonderful harbors, extensive railroad systems. To conform to all of our growing physical needs we have amended our constitution, and the voters have expressed themselves upon each change as the time seemed ripe for it to be made.

Women No Longer Primitive

Fifty years ago the women in this state were also as primitive in their industrial and property interests, and lacked knowledge and experience in civic affairs. This is not true today, yet when an attempt was made to meet the altered financial and industrial status of woman by an amendment to the state constitution, we encountered a stone wall—an antagonistic legislature. Year after year, session after session, the fight was waged with always the same result. It was not until 1896 that a suffrage amendment eliminating the word "male" was forced through the legislature, with the result stated.

Fully alive to the character of the forces which had united to defeat the adoption of the amendment by the people, and in no wise discouraged, the women renewed their efforts at the following session of the legislature. The fight was continued, and it became so persistent that one up-country senator, referring to the periodical appearance of the suffrage amendment, was led to remark: "The suffrage amendment is like the poor: it is with us always."

And like the poor, the amendment received scant charity, but great courtesy of a spectacular character, which was sufficient to cloud the issue. Yet it kept hope alive, and the weary fight was continued.

The Santa Cruz Convention

This was the unsatisfactory prospect after the close of the legislature of 1905, where we had received the customary close vote. But it was not until the memorable Ruff convention that the startling truth was driven home that the state government and our political parties were under the control of the most effective and powerful political machine, and that the people of this state, represented by the male voters, were as powerless to effect reforms as are the peasants of Russia today.

The women came to this convention with the hope and expectation of having a suffrage plank written in the platform of the Republican party. On the second day of the convention we were invited to present our case before the resolutions committee. At half past ten o'clock at night we finally appeared before the committee. They listened to our statement of the case, and without comment, with absolutely no assurance even that our plea would be considered, we were permitted to take our departure.

A feeling of suspicion and unrest pervaded the convention. There seemed to be considerable difficulty in arranging a program. The convention met and adjourned, met and adjourned again and again, while the leaders endeavored to frame up a satisfactory slate. A climax was reached when the endorsement of the report of the judiciary committee was called for. The chairman called for the ayes, brought down his gavel without calling for the noes, recognized a motion to adjourn, and in the midst of a storm of protests from the floor left the platform. Pandemonium reigned. Delegates sprang to their feet clamoring for recognition, but there was no one to whom they could appeal. The convention had adjourned. Gradually the excitement subsided and the delegates left the hall, thus closing one more incident in a reign of tyranny. With their usual philosophy when accepting the inevitable, the delegates took their medicine, an attitude of mind that women find it so difficult to understand and acquire. But we were now enlightened as to the real situation, and although we had been assured of the support of the leaders it was no surprise to us when the platform was read to find that it lacked the suffrage plank. From that moment we were not only suffragists but insurgents. This high-handed proceeding sowed the seed of revolt and rebellion in the hearts of all lovers of fair play, sentiments which were destined in the near future of our political history to play such an important part.

Legislative Defeat in 1907

The legislature of 1907 did not differ from its predecessors so far as methods were concerned. During nine weeks of strenuous lobbying we received the usual courteous hearings. We were studying the political system at close range and learning all of its devious ways. The proposed amendment was introduced simultaneously in both houses in the first week of the session. It passed the lower house on a reconsideration vote as a great surprise to everyone. In the upper house a constant effort was made to bring it to a vote and dispose of it, but we knew that we could not muster the necessary support, and through the vigilance of the senator introducing the amendment, the question was never forced to a vote, and did not come up for final passage until the second week in the extra session, where it was given every courtesy but went down to defeat with a vote of 25 to 16.

Our education in matters political was continued at the Republican convention in Oakland in 1908, when we marched 300 strong behind a suffrage banner to reserved seats in the front of the gallery of the Macdonough theatre. Here for the first time we began to see that we were becoming a political factor. We observed a difference in the treatment accorded us. We were invited by the chairman to appear before the committee at an hour which should suit our pleasure, and to take as much time to present our case as should seem to us necessary. We did so, realizing that it was the very best educational propaganda that we could put forth, and with the full realization that that would be the entire result of it—that under no circumstances would our plea receive favorable consideration. The following day we gathered and filled the boxes and galleries which had been reserved for us, to hear the reading of the platform. In lieu of a suffrage plank, the chairman stepped forth, and in his pleasantest manner thanked the women for their attendance, assuring them that by their grace and beauty they had contributed materially to the success of the convention. It did seem that he overreached himself in his tributes, for a woman in the audience who had lately come to California from Colorado, thereby losing her vote for President Taft, arose and replied to the chairman that the women were not there for bouquets but for justice. The situation was saved by the ready wit of the chairman who answered, much to the relief of the assembled delegates, that it had always been man's pleasure to give and woman's privilege to refuse.

Democratic Support

At Sacramento in 1906 the Democratic convention, under the splendid leadership of men who had consistently favored our cause, adopted a woman suffrage plank in its platform, and at the following session of the legislature we received the most loyal support from the Democratic members, and whenever a Democratic legislator seemed disposed to forget his pledge, the leaders of his party took occasion to refresh his memory, reminding him that he must live up to his platform if he expected further support from the party. The Stockton Democratic convention of 1908 also inserted a suffrage plank, and the resolutions committee passed it with but one dissenting vote.

At the opening of the next session of the legislature it was expected that something might be accomplished, the reformers being in the majority. But the reformers were stampeded for lack of organization, and we failed again.

But we were now an element to be reckoned with. It was no longer safe to give us the customary courteous rigamarole, and the liquor interest, which had heretofore been held in check, was let loose and permitted to give us as severe a blow as it could administer. They accomplished this result by putting the screws on the legislators, using every weapon at their command.

Interference of Liquor Interests

We have always recognized the fight which the liquor interests have made against us. We realize the fight they are making against us now. We protest against such a united effort of any commercial interest to prevent the government from enfranchising a class of its citizens. Why should any commercial interest be permitted to interfere in matters of this kind? There is no relationship whatever between the liquor interests and the woman question. The control of the liquor traffic is not an ethical subject, and has no relationship to the enfranchisement of the women of California, and it will never be settled by the women, as voters or otherwise. Our only menace today, the only thing we have to fear, is the united opposition of the liquor interests, and we make an appeal to every fair minded man to rise in revolt against this unfair interference. The issue is perfectly plain at this time.

Although the reform element in the legislature failed, through lack of organization, to carry through many of the measures they had introduced early in the session, they did enact a direct primary law, which, though distorted and mutilated by amendment, was seen to be an instrument capable of bringing about a condition of affairs favorable to our success. Through the operation of this direct primary law the people of California were enabled, for the first time in the history of the state, to speak for themselves. As a result, a man was nominated for the office of governor who has sufficient courage to carry out a reform program. In the nomination of Hiram W. Johnson the women played an active part, contributing to the success in not a few counties.

Stimulated and encouraged by the result of the primary election, the Republican state convention of 1910 met at San Francisco. The seed of revolution so effectively sown by the machine at the Ruff convention at Santa Cruz, stimulated by the direct primary law, now sprang into life, and the result was the immediate domination of the convention by the reform element.

The convention adopted a platform upon which could be erected a truer democracy for California. It outlined a system of state government through which the people can express themselves—a system which will give the government back into the hands of the voters. The people will now be the real actors in the drama instead of puppets and mannikins through which the special interests have been accustomed to express themselves. It also recognized women as "people," a most unusual procedure in politics, which has never considered "people" other than men. But these leaders believed in democracy. As one remarked, when asked to explain the incorporation of the suffrage plank, "I believe in democratic government, in a true democracy, and that means all the people, including women."

This altruistic platform was a challenge to the new sense of freedom which, they felt, was born in the minds of the voters of California; and its adoption was a justification of this confidence.

The good government forces had been successful in Los Angeles and had unanimously adopted a suffrage plank in their county convention. Santa Clara county had done likewise. It took considerable argument, and some little persuasion, to bring the San Francisco leaders around to a realization of the importance of the suffrage amendment. They had some fear of an overabundance of reform, and it needed the moral suasion of that solid front of 83 votes from south of the Tehachapi, and the militant arguments of the sturdy Santa Clara delegation, to bring them to time. But never did men yield more gracefully when once convinced of the wisdom of such a course, and thus awakened they became ardent supporters.

The amendment plank was taken up by the resolutions committee and given the same careful consideration accorded every other proposed plank. We had the new experience of not being required to make any arguments or appeals. We were not even asked to appear before the committee. But we were assured that if success should at any time appear to be in jeopardy we would be called in consultation. The amendment passed the resolutions committee unanimously, was incorporated in the platform, and was adopted as a part of the platform by the convention with three cheers for woman suffrage, given by one of the young political enthusiasts. It had thus become a man's measure, and a policy of the Republican party. The burden of carrying this amendment to a successful termination now rests upon the men, and it has been graciously and willingly accepted by them. One new convert, a successful candidate for membership of the board of equalization, who had been most energetic in his effort to secure votes on the floor for our amendment, remarked:

"This is as it should be. It is the work of the men to give you women the ballot. You have no right to be compelled to go about begging for this thing. I am glad that I shall never have to see you women of California going through the streets carrying a banner." It was evident that he had not seen us on that memorable day in Oakland in 1908, following our banners to the Republican convention.

Immediately after the close of the campaign, while the cheers of the victors were still ringing throughout the state, the chairman of the Republican state central committee called a meeting of the members of that committee and the members of the legislature of 1911, at San Francisco, and appointed a series of committees on proposed legislation, for the purpose of assisting the legislators in carrying out the promises of the Republican platform. The public gasped in amazement at this unique procedure, but we must commend the action of the Napoleonic mind that conceived and planned so honorable a course. It speaks volumes for the intentions of the leaders of the Republican party.

Example of New Zealand

A tremendous task lies before those men who are willing to undertake the remodeling and revising of our present obsolete political machinery and to make it into a practical and efficient system, through which we can work out our progressive ideas. At the present time our system is unwieldy and complicated, very expensive, and makes for misgovernment. We have much to learn from New Zealand, where women have voted for many years. This little island colony has succeeded in making for itself a government which might well be a model for many older nations. In regard to its direct primary law, the general election occurs two days after the primaries, thus removing that dangerous interval which is so productive of corruption. No candidate is permitted to accept any favors which will obligate him to any person or interest, so that he might forget his duty to the people. The wasteful expenditure of time and money and energy to carry on a campaign has been very forcibly brought to our minds during the past eight months of exciting political experience, with all its demoralizing influences. This is one of the many changes that must be put into effect before we can have a safe and sane government.

A perfected direct primary law, the initiative and referendum, and the direct election of United States senators are the other constructive measures now necessary effectively to put the government of the state into the hands of all the people.

The members of the legislature elected under the direct primary law are a representative body. If we have any criticism to make, let it be against the system of government which makes office seeking and office holding so difficult, and not against the men who have consented to fill these positions. When we have by law elected men to office let us establish their integrity. They are a part of the government. The offices of senator and assemblyman should be offices of honor, and the men who fill them should be honorable men. If we fail to maintain the honor of office, and fail to keep the men honorable to us, we ourselves have failed in our duty to the state. Men who have assumed the obligation of office are public servants. They are agents of the people who elected them. This relation has always existed between legislator and elector, but it has not always been recognized by the legislator. The people are now beginning to demand their own, and legislators are coming to the realization that the people, instead of the special interests, have now become the court of last resort. The power rests with them; the holders of office must look to them alone for approval or disapproval. I believe that the members of the legislature expect to live up to the platform on which they were elected, that they are convinced that a pledge is meant to be kept, and that they intend to carry through every plank in the platform not excepting the suffrage amendment.

We have said that there is no further argument worthy the name against woman suffrage, and this being true, the failure of our government to recognize its women is the great blot on the scutcheon of the nation.

Spread of the Suffrage

Australia, New Zealand, Sweden, Denmark, Norway, Finland (England and Canada municipally) have enfranchised their women, have gained them the privilege and honor of self-government. It has remained for America, the great republic, the land of freedom, the domain of equal opportunities, to ignore her women; the land where every man, high or low, rich or poor, native or alien, may be the sovereign ruler of his destiny.

But a woman, any woman, be she president of a bank or a ship's captain, the head of great manufacturing interests, or the highest in medical lore, or an authority in matters educational, or the mother of men, is not recognized by this government as the political equal of the lowest male wretch who rolls in the gutter, whose intellect is not equal to the spelling of his own name, or whose pocket does not contain sufficient to purchase a crust of bread. His only virtue is that he was born a man, her only fault that she was a woman. Let every man consider this intelligently. Let him lay sentiment and prejudice aside and with cool, calm judgment think of what government is and what it is for, and how his forefathers fought and died that the ballot should be put in his hand. Let him forget that women are women, and remember only that they are human beings, citizens of these United States, with all the duties and obligations to support and sustain this country and to obey its laws. No man can stand between them and the government in their obligations to this country. They are individuals before the law.

The foregoing is not an attempt to put forward an argument for woman suffrage. To argue the subject in this day and generation when women have proven themselves so valuable in all things commercial, civic and ethical to the country, seems an insult to women and to the intelligence of enlightened people. This is a plain statement of the fact.

We will make no attempt to convert our legislators to woman suffrage. The people are the court of last appeal in this. We will try only to prove to them the justice of permitting a vote on a measure which has not been before the people for fourteen years, which then lost by a small majority, and toward which there is a constantly growing favorable sentiment.

I do not anticipate that it will be a difficult matter to convince our legislators. So many of the old arguments have lost their force. I remember an assemblyman, an estimable physician from up-country, who felt very strongly on the suffrage question. He insisted that he would never drag woman down off her "pedestal" by giving her the ballot, which completely destroyed the power of the "pedestal" line of talk. The numerous stock arguments of the anti-suffragists are so obsolete, outworn and childish that no man of intelligence has the hardihood to advance them today.

As I look over the personnel of the senate I find much to encourage the belief that the light is won there. The ranks are full of splendid men who stand for a square deal. And such a senate, with an independent and brave presiding officer, promises great things for California.

(Concluded on Page 79)

Mutual Savings Bank

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco.)

706 MARKET STREET, opposite THIRD
The Cross Roads of the City

Capital Guaranteed	$1,000,000.00
Paid-up Capital	300,000.00
Surplus	400,000.00
Profits	45,000.00

DIRECTORS: James D. Phelan, President; John A. Hooper, Vice-President; J. K. Moffitt, Vice-President; C. Charles Holbrook, Randolph Spreckels, J. C. McKinstry, Rolla V. Watt, R. D. McIlhenny, J. O. Huntz, Attorney; J. C. McKinnis and D. C. Murphy, Geo. A. Story, Cashier; C. B. Hinhon, Assistant Cashier; A. E. Conner, Assistant Cashier.

The German Savings and Loan Society

Savings (THE GERMAN BANK) Commercial
(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of San Francisco, Cal.)
526 CALIFORNIA ST., San Francisco, Cal.

Guaranteed Capital	$1,200,000.00
Capital actually paid up in cash	1,000,000.00
Reserve and Contingent Funds	1,555,093.05
Deposits June 30th, 1910	40,384,727.21
Total Assets	43,108,907.82

Remittance may be made by Draft, Post Office, or Wells, Fargo & Co's. Money Orders, or coin by Express.

Office Hours: 10 o'clock A. M. to 3 o'clock P. M., except Saturdays to 12 o'clock M. and Saturday evenings from 6:30 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. for receipt of deposits only.

OFFICERS—President, N. Ohlandt; First Vice-President, Daniel Meyer; Second Vice-President and Manager, George Tourny; Third Vice-President, J. W. Van Bergen; Cashier, A. H. R. Schmidt; Assistant Cashier, William Herrmann; Secretary, A. H. Muller; Assistant Secretaries, G. J. O. Folte and Wm. D. Newhouse; Godfellow & Eells, General Attorneys.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—N. Ohlandt, Daniel Meyer, George Tourny, J. W. Van Bergen, Ign. Steinhardt, I. N. Walter, E. Tillmann, Jr., E. T. Kruse and W. S. Goodfellow.

MISSION BRANCH, 2572 Mission Street, between 21st and 22nd Streets. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. C. W. Heyer, Manager.

RICHMOND DISTRICT BRANCH, 432 Clement Street, between 5th and 6th Avenues. For receipt and payment of Deposits only. W. C. Heyer, Manager.

WHEN Jed had attained his three score years, he rated as one of the greatest misfortunes of his life his participation in an entertainment given by a strolling magician. Hank Woodley and he had scattered handbills all over town announcing the event and so had secured "free" admission to the entertainment.

During the performance a boy was needed on the stage, and Hank Woodley, never backward, promptly strode to the fore only to be laughed at heartily, for the magician "made a perfect man of him," as Jed tauntingly declared when Hank returned to his seat. He had taken eggs from Hank's nose, drawn a glass of wine from his elbow, had taken live rabbits from his pockets and had caught Hank in the act of trying to make off with a gold watch borrowed from a gentleman in the audience, much to Hank's confusion.

"What did ye let him fool ye fur?" Jed demanded. "Why didn't ye watch him instead of looking off somewhere every time he tried to attract your attention to something else? Ye might have known he was doing it for a blind."

"Well, you go up next time yourself if you think you are so much smarter than I be," was Hank's retort. "I'll bet you'll come back with half your teeth pulled out and not know the difference."

Presently the magician called for another boy and Hank fairly pushed Jed off his seat and into the aisle, so determined was he that Jed should answer the call, and up Jed went to the stage.

"Now, declared the magician as he grasped Jed by the arm and led him to the center of the stage, 'we'll do a little telegraphing, but first we must make an instrument. You take this little tin pill box and go down into the audience and borrow seven copper cents. I'll go your security for their return, else they may not wish to trust you with them. I am afraid the boys of York are a bad lot. The other tried to make off with a gold watch, you know. Hurry up now. I have an important message to send.'

Jed gazed up the small coins and, at the order of the magician, himself counted them, one by one into the little box and closed the lid.

"Now, declared the magician, taking the box from Jed's hand, throwing a handkerchief over it, tying one end of a long cord around it outside the handkerchief and handing it back to Jed, 'that is the instrument, this cord is the wire. I am the operator and you are the telegraph post. When I count seven I want the post to rattle the instrument so that the gentlemen who gave you their coins will know that there is there all right and that you haven't made off with them. Then when I count six you are to rattle the coins six times and so until you are counted down and out. See?'

Jed, since he had refused to take his eyes off the magician's hands for so much as a second during the whole performance.

"Are the coins in that box?" the magician demanded to know.

"Yes," was the confident reply of Jed.

"What then in?"

"I did."

"Whom then out?"

"No, didn't take them out," Jed affirmed. He rattled the box to prove it. With the magician turned to the audience and said: "Ladies and gentlemen, it will be impossible for me to complete this experiment with this boy. I hope you'll excuse me, but he is so smart for me. I had hoped to abstract some coins from that box while he wasn't looking, but he has eyed me so constantly he hasn't given me any chance at all. Of course all I do is the merest deception. I don't in fact do any of the things I seem to. I fool people, but once in a great while I get hold of a boy so smart that I can't win. It is so this time. Young man, you take your seat, and I'll call up another. No doubt you will be president of the United States some day."

Jed sat for his seat, his face fairly beaming with pride, clinging to the box, however. He hadn't only a step or two when the magician called after him, "Where are you going those coins?"

RECOLLECTIONS OF JED

MELANCHOLY CLAIMS JED FOR ITS OWN

BY
A. JUDSON

"Going to take them back to the gentlemen who gave them to me."

"Have you got them still in the box?"

"Yes sir."

"Rattle the box and let's see."

The coins rattled in the box all right.

"Well, on second thought," declared the magician ruefully, "there is just a chance that you are not as smart as you think you are and that the experiment might possibly succeed after all. My task is to call those coins out of that box one by one along this string and into my hand. As I count you rattle the box and watch that none of the coins get away from you. Hang on tight."

Jed did as required. The magician counted seven and Jed rattled the coins in the little pill box seven times; the magician counted six and Jed rattled the box six times, and so on. With each rattling there seemed to be less in the box to rattle. Jed gripped the handkerchief until his finger nails dug into his palm, the cold sweat started from his brow. When the magician counted one and there was only the faintest rattling in the box Jed's heart sank to zero. The next instant he was sternly bidden to rattle the box, but there was nothing in it to rattle. Jed undid the handkerchief, took out the box, opened it and peered in. There was nothing there. He turned it bottom up, but nothing fell out. His confusion was complete and when the magician stepped to his side and extracted the pennies from the back of Jed's own neck, Jed was so confounded that he stamped. The audience cheered the magician and jeered at Jed. The room was in a whirl. Hank Woodley stood up on his seat and danced and howled with delight at Jed's discomfiture. Jed grabbed his hat and rushed from the hall, so chagrined that he dared not look anyone in the face.

For days he kept out of sight all he could. All his waking hours were devoted to brooding over his humiliation and trying to conjecture how it could have happened, and to his dying day he never knew. One thing, at any rate, was clearly evident to Jed. One who could be so fooled before his own face and eyes just naturally was not smart. Hank Woodley was right. That magician could have extracted half of Jed's teeth, eye teeth with the rest, and he would not have missed one of them until it was all over.

The blight of this experience was not to be measured by days, rather by years of shaken self confidence and loss of courage to measure wits with all comers. It handicapped Jed like a palsy.

Jed's second hardest jolt came from Hank Woodley himself. The boys were now nearly grown and for some years had not been chummy. Old Captain Woodley had taken a government hay contract out on the frontier and he took Hank along to a run a horse-race. When not raking hay Hank was playing cards in some of the tents with the men. Some of these men were gamblers, and in Hank they found an apt pupil. Those long, tapering, supple fingers of his, too evidently the appurtenances of an artist or a thief, had found their use, and that stolid, immobile, butcher face of his betrayed no more of what went on within than did the steel gray eyes that habitually looked out, but never in, and always contemptuously.

At first Hank played cards only for fun, but gradually he began to play for small stakes, much to the consternation of the old Captain, until Hank made it plain that his winnings exceeded his losses, after which the enormity of the offense seemed not to be so appalling. When the coming of frost ended the haying, and the Captain and his son came home, Hank was eager to play cards with whoever would play, in part for the fun of it but especially for the practice. Jed had played cards from early boyhood and was esteemed a fair player. Hank taught Jed draw poker, giving Jed a hatful of shelled corn, beans or coffee grains as a bank, himself taking but a few kernels. The game sometimes went on half the night, always ending with Hank having the hatful and Jed the few grains of booty. If Jed tired of poker they fell back on euchre or seven-up, with the result in the latter game that Hank turned jack every time he dealt the cards and, watch as he might, Jed could not catch Hank in the fraud. If anything more were needed to convince Jed that he really was not smart it was his inability to catch Hank Woodley in the act of turning jack from the bottom of the pack, a conclusion re-enforced by Hank's contemptuous assumption of superiority.

As stated in a previous chapter, there came a time when Jed had to push himself out of the family nest to make his own fledgling way in the world, in which enterprise he was much aided by Helen's approaching marriage. He had not downrightly asked Helen to some day be his wife, lacking the courage, but he knew that she knew what was in his mind and he had long felt that if ever he were to do anything worth while in the world it would be for the sake of Helen. He knew little of what the world would be like to him without her, but of one fact he was sure enough: York would be intolerable with her living there as the wife of another man, so Jed took himself off before the fateful day of her wedding.

He had a few dollars in his pocket, was a fair compositor, had in his pocket a county certificate to teach a district school, had done some surveying, made about half to two-thirds of a hand at manual labor, and he bought a railroad ticket and went out into the dark. Seldom did any youngster set forth with less of buoyancy or self confidence. There was in the mind of Jed but one fixed purpose—to get out of York before Helen's marriage to Tobias Norwood.

The next three years of Jed's life are unnecessary to this story and may be dismissed with a few sentences. He taught school, worked at the printer's case, clerked on a Mississippi river steamboat, worked in a law office, read medicine with a young cub in a doctor's office across the hall, saw most of the states in the union and cities in the land and, wherever his steps led him, he went groping, groping, groping to see if perchance he might somehow find—himself. He even envied Hank Woodley in finding what his immobile face and supple digits were adapted to. Nothing that Jed had done had counted. He hung over the rail of the steamer, gazed into the greenish depths of the sea and watched the beckoning arms of the waving kelp inviting him, as it seemed, to make his bed there to sleep, in depths profound, till the Day of Judgment. Dreading the sin of self-murder he, with difficulty, resisted the temptation to leap overboard, but when on the swollen bosom of the Mississippi, in a frail skiff, the waves of a passing steamer bade fair to swamp him, he sat unmoved, not caring, so little had life to offer him, although the negro rowers were fairly beside themselves with fright.

Over and over again he reviewed his life from infancy. He sought out and visited all his kin folks that he might size them up and learn of their past and present, what, if anything, heredity had to promise him. He argued with whoever would talk in relation to all the problems of life, the ways of God and of men. He reviewed his own religious experiences incident by incident, finding in them nothing sure. The greatest books and the most noted ministers, he found, spoke with the largest hesitation and least of certainty, while only fools and fogies were cocksure.

One thing he would do. He would see the best within reach that civilization had done for itself. He visited the best art galleries, saw the great actors and plays, haunted the libraries, attended lectures, heard the great preachers and orators, indulged his wanderlust to the limits of his purse, replenished again and again as how he might, by teaching or typesetting, pushing a pencil or wielding an ax.

On the table of a relative he found Philip Gilbert Hamerton's "Intellectual Life," and devoured it. Then he walked miles through the snow digesting it. Yes, one thing he would do: He would live an intellectual life. It might be fruitful, or happy or long or short as heaven willed, but it should be intellectual. From that day forth Jed lived and moved and had his being with books.

Slowly the idea found lodgment in his mind that he also would some day write a book, a great book, a book that would tell other groppers like himself the things they needed to know to guide them into the light, so that they might walk joyously and confidently; but such a book must be written out of a profound experience, an ample store of the world's ripest knowledge and with a full heart. If it were needful, in order to fit him for this task, to quaff the cup of bitterness to its dregs, Jed would joyously drink damnation dry and, like some Dives, send his warning message back from a lost world that the feet of others might not walk that way.

Evidently the writing of Jed's "Guide for Groppers" was a long way off, for, although the son of an editor, Jed had written little and had acquired little facility for written expression. Of the science of composition he knew nothing, penned an illegible hand, spelled execrably and, the moment he sat down to write, the agony of self delivery of ideas suggested nothing else so much as the pains of parturition.

But Jed wrote, wrote to the home paper, to any paper that would publish what he wrote and to many more that would not. He essayed poetry and story, "tear-jerkers" all of them, if we may employ the uncouth but expressive idiom of the "print-shop." He wrote essays and editorials, but what took best of all he wrote were poor little news items for the daily press, efforts that Jed despised because so hopelessly inconsequential, but by one means or another Jed got to see more or less of his written stuff in cold print so that he could read it in some degree apart from the personal element in its authorship and so judge of it with something akin to an impartial mind. Slowly he attuned his ear to detect the awkward statement, the false note, the discordant key, and so, as it were, learned to judge of himself from outside himself as well as to make his written thoughts revelations of himself.

It was about this time that Jed received a letter from his father. "Jed, son," it ran, "could you come home and help with The Ajax and, if anything should happen to me, help to keep our little family together? I think I must be about all tired out. By the way, perhaps you haven't heard that Tobias Norwood has been closed out by his Chicago and St. Louis creditors and that he and Helen, having scraped together what they could out of the wreck, have gone to the Pacific Coast somewhere, with their baby, to begin life anew. They say that it was whisky drinking that did it, although, being a secret drinker, few knew that he drank at all. When he was in his cups he could not refuse credit to anyone and the first he knew everybody owed him and he owed everybody. He was such a promising young man, too, only three short years ago and appeared to be doing quite the best business in town."

Poor old father! Little joy had he ever had in Jed, only anxiety, perplexity and grief. Would Jed heed the call?

A week later Jed was hunting local items for The Ajax; a year later father slept in the silent, wind-swept little city on the brow of the hill back of town. The cudgel for things decent, and against the things that were not, that father had laid down Jed had taken up. Men were saying that the young man who slunk back and forth from home to office and office to home through the alleys, in order to avoid controversy, would fight at the drop of the hat and that he pushed a pen that fairly stripped the hides off those who needed stripping. The family was kept together until each member of it went to a home of her own, leaving a wide house for Jed alone, and then the young woman who had made herself so invaluable in the office force was installed in the old home and made herself invaluable there, too, the more so as sons and daughters came to her and Jed with the years.

Nevertheless Jed, though prosperous, was not happy, that is not aggressively, positively, consciously happy. The concept of the great book, "The Guide for Groppers," dwelt in his mind, the book that should be a beacon light to groping, melancholy youth who found it hard to take hold on life, but how could such a book be written except it be out of the light of a rich experience, an ample knowledge and a full heart, and the life of Jed had been so narrow, his experience so mean, his knowledge so meagre. The heart of Jed was sore.

All day and every day he had to run down the local item for his country paper, chase delinquent subscribers and advertisers with unwelcome bills that he might hold his own family together, accumulate something for approaching age and, in fine, do as other folks do in a work-day world—toil early and late, save and get on, in order to make provision for an old age that may never come and to hold together a family that won't stay together anyway one can fix it, a day after they have grown up. As often as Jed could find time to indulge in melancholy he kicked against conditions that harnessed him down to a treadmill life, to part of an endless repetition of endless generations of bondmen striving to get a living, living it, and dying out of life leaving the world little the wiser or richer or happier for all their fuss and struggle.

So went a round quarter of a century and more, when the family physician prescribed half a year of rest and a winter in California for Jed himself, or else the lowly lintel and narrow house might come to him as it came to father, almost any slushy, blizzardy March when the white plague is out seeking somebody to devour.

"You must go to see Helen, indeed you must," declared Ruth. "You know she asks about you nearly every letter she writes, and there is nobody in the world, no, not even me, that she will be so glad to see." Jed promised and in the course of knocking about over our golden state, went to see Helen. That is how the writer of this came to know Jed and to work these "Recollections" out of him, for the writer also has a friend in Helen.

"What, no! It can't be! You don't mean it! You, Jed? Is it possible that a little matter of thirty years or so can make all that difference?" demanded the fair, little, white-haired lady, half laughing, half crying, as she dragged Jed into the prim little parlor. "And won't you let me kiss you? I can remember when I would not have been the one to ask such a favor." Somehow they found each other in each other's arms for one blissful instant, then she was holding Jed off at arms' length gazing into his drawn and deeply lined face. "Oh! I shall get you out of the dumps in no time," Helen rattled on, "you know I am a famous nurse. Ruth has told you, I know. Ruth says that you have asked her about me every time you have met her, even if the times weren't more than two days apart, so I know and you know and what's the use of either of us playing that we don't know?"

They did not play that they did not know, and all that winter their walks and talks, car rides and carriage drives, their visits to the sick and the poor, the joyous and the rich, were taken in a frank abandon of pretense that they had not known since early childhood. As for the soul of Jed, Helen ran at will the gamut of its range, but, womanlike, she drew out rather than poured out and it seemed to Jed, as the time drew near for his return to his own and to The Ajax, to the local item and the delinquent subscriber, that he would go back leaving Helen as inexplicable at fifty as she had been at fifteen. And then, the day before the parting, she overturned the consecrated cup and poured all its contents out.

"Now, Jed," Helen said, as the latter ascended the steps to the little cottage home, "you sit here in the sun a little while and read The Ajax. It has just come and I am sure you haven't seen it. It was so good of you to send it to me all these years when you knew that we were too poor to pay for it. I have read every line of every number and have watched you grow so high, so high, and so high," measuring imaginary heights with her hand, "but my hero must measure away up there," standing on tip-toe and reaching as high as ever she could, "nobody higher except The Christ. Do you understand? Well, just wait here until I run down the street and help that poor little mother dress her baby. She doesn't know the first thing. How can mothers be so careless with their daughters? And why will they treat having babies in wedlock almost as they would having babies out of wedlock, a thing taboo, when it is the naturalest and blessedest thing in all the world. Let's see, how many have I helped into life, yes, this is the thousand and sixty-oneth and, bless them! I love them all, every one."

Presently, when Helen had returned from her errand of mercy, "Now, Jed," she said, "I want you to tell sister Ruth, and make her understand it if you can, that I am supremely, ecstatically, blissfully happy. She thinks that I have lived a wrecked, miserable life and that the reason I have is the influence she and mamma brought to bear to induce me to marry Tobias Norwood. Mamma went to her grave grieving, and Ruth has not ceased to lament. They thought he was such a catch, by all odds the best in town, and that I would be so fortunate, that you never would amount to shucks. It was not their doing it was Almighty God's and every night of my life I thank him for what he has done for me."

"I always cared a great deal more for you, Jed, than I ever did for anyone else I ever knew. Perhaps as a Christian woman I ought not to say it, but it is said. My judgment told me I ought not, but I did. I knew what drove you away from York and I cried night after night, but I married Toby just the same and would have done so if you had staid. He was such a good catch, exemplary, as far as we knew, the most ardent lover that ever was, and is yet, for that matter, and low me to distraction. He was doing the best business in town, had a nice home to take me to and was perfectly lovely every way, besides doing the biggest dry goods business in town. All this while he was kissing me goodnight at our gate at 10 o'clock every night, going home, locking himself in his room and drinking himself dead drunk before going to bed. Jed, it was not a week after we were married until he was doing the same thing—because he could not help it, and he has been doing it ever since for the same reason."

"But he loves me, Jed; there is only one thing in the world that he loves her, and that is whisky. He cries over me, sees my hands, grovels at my feet, hugs me out the ankles, pats my feet and, if I wet him, kisses them, too, imploring my forgiveness for the wrong he fancies that he has done; but when I think of what manner of woman I might have become if he had gone as we all thought he would, becoming her and more prosperous, making me the leader of fashion and the smart set in York, as promised to do—Jed, when I think of the things I almost fall on my knees to thank him for being the poor, driveling sot he is, Jed, but for that, I might have lost my immortal soul. I have seen other women: theirs under no greater temptation than came to me. I have seen their faces grow hard and cruel, their flesh grow gross and their souls die out of their bodies in unloving, bitterness and pride, their last gasp a whine and snarl."

"Oh! yes, I suppose that I have what the world calls a hard life," continued Helen as she looked down at her bony, sir hands. Jed reached over and took one of them in his. "Not much as they were, Helen," he said. "Not much as I have seen them in memory ten thousand times since, fingering wax candles, tapering to the pinkiest libails, for all the world like the hands of any. But for those hands I might have roposed, Helen," he continued. "I had s enough to know that those hands were meant for other than a lady with servato come at beck and nod, and when I tho of their toiling for me as more than lik wife of mine would have to toil, my herew sick and I took myself off for a mise tramp along the river bank, only lackin courage to throw myself in."

"Yes, I remember how you us look at them and often wondered what's going through your silly head. Toco, pets them, if I will let him, and s scalding tears over them, but, Jed, they been put to better use than to be fondled, kissed, looked at and grieved over. They do say that my simple changing of the pillow under the head of a fever stricken patient will sometimes induce sleep when opiates fail.

"Well, Jed, when I found out the truth about Toby and knew that there was a ship upon the sea that would bring to him and me a baby I had but a single thought—the fear that our babe would inherit the ungovernable appetite of the father. I reasoned that there was never yet a sin that was not somehow, somewhere, expiated, and I read again and again of the sins of fathers being visited upon the children. Throwing myself before my God as a Hindu before his juggernaut I prayed that the sin of the father be visited upon me instead of upon my babe. Spare me not, oh! Lord I cried. Show me no mercy for I am a sinful woman and have given my heart to one and my body to another for riches. Put the cup to my lips and I will not push it aside. I will drink, drink to the lees. Lay the lash upon my back and I will not quail. Show me what thou wouldst have me to do and I will not falter.

"Jed, God answered my prayer. When our baby came he was a bouncer, hearty and well, never cried and grew like a pig. I was not afraid then to have others, notwithstanding the condition of their father, for there was no hereditary taint of drunkenness in his family any more than there was in ours. He picked up the habit while away at school hardly half grown. Our four sons are athletes and one could no more get liquor by their lips than arsenic or strychnine.

"No, Jed, we were never meant for each other, you and I. I thought it all out years ago. How, for instance, could it possibly be that my four stalwart sons, born of Toby and me for all eternity, should not have been at all, no such beings looking at me out of their big, honest eyes? How could it possibly be that your sons and daughters should not have been, but, in the places of our two families, born to you and me, there should be children that never were and never can be? No, no, my imagination balks at the insurmountable obstacle and refuses to take the leap. No, no, from the foundation of the world it was ordained otherwise, anyhow for this world. As for the next, sometimes I think on that, Jed, but there again my imagination balks, for it is not given to the mind of man to conceive what our heavenly father has there in store for those that love him.

"But, Jed, that need not prevent your being my hero all the days of this life, that is, if you reach your full stature and measure up so high," standing again on her tiptoes and measuring as high as she could reach. "You have been carrying a brick or something else heavy around in your hat all your days and it has stunted you. I know what it is. It is s-e-l-f. You haven't wholly forgotten self, your ambitions, your unattained yearnings. You have not said, 'Lord, here am I. Use me where Thou wilt for what Thou wilt.' You haven't lost your life that you might find it. Go home and lose it. Lose it in that family of yours and that community. Lose it in The Ajax, the last vestige of it. There isn't so much of it left. Turn the urn upside down and lose the rest. Then you'll be joyously, ecstatically, blissfully happy and you'll measure up so high (suited the act of tiptoe measurement to the word) and be my hero. Jed, you freckled-faced, sunburnt, mischief-brewing imp of five-and-forty-years ago!

"And as for your 'Guide for Gropers,' here it is, a keepsake from me. It was written nearly eighteen hundred years before you were born. See? I have marked all the sayings attributed to Jesus himself. He, and none other, is our guide. Peter and Paul and the rest—they were all preachers, qualifying what The Christ thought by what they thought. Go straight to him and to him only. I do not mean to pray to Him, but he is the only true guide to God. It is to God the Father that we must pray. And see, I have marked in red ink the sayings that especially fit the gropers. Keep it by you. Read it in dark moments. Lose what's left of you. My prayers shall help you every day and many times during the day. Believe me, Jed, I shall be with you in love and sympathy 'till the end of our world.

"And I want your prayers, too, Jed, want them every day; for there is one cold, clammy, dead hand that still touches my heart. Pray that it may be taken away. It is this: I can't feel glad when Toby comes home. You know how immaculate his store always looked. Well, they keep him around just to keep the stock up, dress the windows and all that, although he is never allowed to wait on customers. He is still the best judge of goods in town and the proprietors take him to the city with them when they go to buy goods. When I hear his staggering step on the stair I fly to meet him. I throw my arms about his drooping, hang-dog neck and I kiss his parched lips with all the affection I can muster, but down in the bottom of my heart I can't feel glad. And, Jed, when he comes to die—it can't be long, it must come soon—I am afraid I shan't feel sorry.

"There, now, goodbye, Jed. Tell Ruth all but that. Pray God to help me to feel glad when Toby comes home and to feel sorry when he dies. This has been the blesseddest winter! And you are going home so well! To lose your life so soon! All you ever needed, Jed, to bring you out, all that anybody ever needs, if they will but answer it, is the call to love and duty. When your father wrote to know if you could come home to help on The Ajax, and help to keep the family together, and you went, the crisis in your life was safely passed. Your redemption was only a question of time."

And so Jed went back to his own, to The Ajax and to York, to the local news item, the item that proves that people are interested in other people and that there is hope for the world, back to the delinquent subscriber and the reluctant advertiser. The York folk said: "What a wonderful country that California must be! It has made a new man of Jed in half a year. Why, the old grump is actually the happiest man in town!"

("SUFFRAGE AMENDMENT"—Concluded)

In the assembly good men are largely in the majority. Here and there, all through the assembly, I find staunch friends who are aggressive supporters. Districts all over the state are sending men who will support the amendments. Although it will be a Republican measure we have good, loyal friends among the Democrats—men who have consistently supported us. Taking it all together, the outlook is most favorable, and it will be what Governor-elect Johnson would call "a bully fight." Heretofore it has always been a sham battle.

There is a growing sentiment all over California for woman suffrage. Santa Clara has always been particularly strong. San Diego invariably sends a solid delegation. Riverside is now in line. And whereas heretofore the southland delegation has been our strongest opponent, at present almost the entire delegation south of the Tehachapi is to be counted on. Good government and insurgency are the friends of woman suffrage. When men are making their fight for freedom they appreciate the injustice of the woman's position. Washington has just given her women the ballot with a two-to-one majority. California will do better. Many states will enfranchise their women when we elect our next president. Woman suffrage is going to sweep over the country like a tidal wave. It will force a plank in the national constitution at the constitutional convention which is expected to be called in the near future. Woman suffrage is coming in the wake of insurgency, and it will come through the efforts of the men, as it will come to us in this state. The men realize that the country needs its women most woefully—needs their hope, their counsel, their courage. And it is because the men are seeing the light and are giving themselves as a sacrifice to the service of their country that America is to be saved from the spoilers and permitted to fulfil her destiny.

We men and women are making our fight together. The day is passing when our interests can be separately handled and considered independently. Human problems have no sex, and in the last analysis they all go back to government. The public conscience is awakening, and although we have suffered we see the sun of a brighter day breaking on the horizon.

DIVIDEND NOTICE SAVINGS UNION BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of California)
After January 3, 1911, Market Street, at Grant Avenue and O'Farrell Street.

For the half year ending December 31, 1910, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four (4) per cent. per annum on all savings deposits, free of taxes, payable on and after Tuesday, January 3, 1911. A dividend not drawn will be added to the deposit account, become a part thereof and earn dividend from January 1, 1911. Money deposited on or before January 10, 1911, will earn interest from January 1st.

R. M. WELCH, Cashier.

DIVIDEND NOTICE THE GERMAN SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY

(Member of the Associated Savings Banks of California)
526 California Street
Mission Branch, 2572 Mission Street, near 22nd.
Richmond District Branch, 432 Clement Street, between Fifth and Sixth Avenues.

For the half year ending December 31, 1910, a dividend has been declared at the rate of four (4) per cent. per annum on all deposits, free of taxes, payable on and after Tuesday, January 3, 1911. Dividends not called for are added to the deposit amount and earn dividends from January 1, 1911.

GEORGE TOLRNY, Manager.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

Department No. 3.

ERNEST H. CLARK CARY,

Plaintiff,

vs.

All persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof.

Action
No. 23805

Defendants.

ERNEST J. MOTT,

Attorney for Plaintiff.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Ernest H. Clark Cary, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the northwesterly line of Brannan Street, distant thereon eighty-four (84) feet and nine and seven-eighths (97/8) inches southwesterly from the southwesterly line of Zoe Street; running thence southwesterly along said line of Brannan Street sixty (60) feet and two and one-eighth (2 1/8) inches; thence at a right angle northwesterly eighty (80) feet; thence at a right angle northeasterly sixty (60) feet and two and one-eighth (2 1/8) inches; thence at a right angle southeasterly eighty (80) feet to the northwesterly line of Brannan Street and the point of commencement; being a part of One Hundred Vara Lot Number 1.

Together with the appurtenances of each and every part thereof.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple as absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be met in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 28th day of October, A. D. 1910.

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
By M. Kragen, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly newspaper on the 14th day of November, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff:

City and County of San Francisco, a municipal corporation, whose address is San Francisco, California.
The German Savings and Loan Society, a corporation, whose address is Number 526 California Street, San Francisco, California.

Nov. 11 1910

TITLES RESTORED

TITLES RESTORED UNDER McFARNEY ACT, complete for $35.00. Burnt Records Title Co., 951-953 Monadnock Building, ninth floor, Market street, near Third

JULIUS CALMANN NOTARY PUBLIC

Office,
30 Montgomery St.
Phone Kearny 4491

Residence,
1297 McAllister St.
Phone Park 4590

SAN FRANCISCO

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

By Way of Taking Leave

The writer of this paper has been for many years a regular contributor to the United States that has undertaken to set before its youthful readers, from week to week, in orderly form, those facts in relation to government that every citizen must become familiar with in order to be fit for citizenship. The reason why this service has not more generally been attempted may be because it is not an easy thing to do in a way to make interesting reading. The commonly received opinion among journalists is that sober consideration of sober questions is dead matter; that only those subjects that can be treated with a touch of sensation, or humor, or with fact converted into fiction, can be treated at all.

The writer of the School For Citizenship is sensible of the limitations of his work. There has been little of the spectacular in it. The criticism of it has been that it has been lacking in that vital interest that should make the science of government read as entertainingly as the "Arabian Nights Entertainments." Do the best he could he has not been able to strike that vein.

But the writer has felt it worth while to keep up the department during the entire life of The California Weekly for some such reason, perhaps, as inspired Paul the Apostle to be "all things to all men that he might by all means save some," and if even a few have, through these lessons, come to feel a keen interest in the affairs of their own government, neither the effort nor the space in the columns of The California Weekly can be looked upon as wholly wasted.

Our schools are doing much in the way of instruction in the science of government, but the tendency is to instruct with reference chiefly to the structural side of government, whereas the soul of government is almost altogether outside the structure and has no more relation to government as it is than the skeleton of a horse has to an intelligent, swift footed roadster or saddle animal. In these lessons the writer has striven, with what success others must judge, to afford the reader an insight into the spirit of government rather than into the mere skeleton formation. The shadow of the reproach of partisanship in teaching civil government in the schools well nigh prevents teaching anything more than the skeleton and, besides, there are many teachers who are not unlike those scientists who think that they have learned all about a bird or a plant when they have dissected and classified it, whereas it is the life of the bird and the utility or beauty of the plant that is important.

We are, here on this American continent, undertaking the most stupendous experiment, save one, that the world has ever witnessed. The effort of The Christ to unionize the human race by means of a religion founded on purity of heart and human fraternity is the only other undertaking in all human history comparable with this experiment in free government, and ours is not working out as satisfactorily as many could wish. We seem to be evolving a form of government making for inequality rather than for equality, a government of and by the few rather than of and by and for the many. We have given up neither the fight nor the hope of winning the fight, but few observing citizens doubt that there is less of freedom of government now than there was fifty years ago; few can deny that society is stratifying into classes or that purely material interests have made headway against those ideals for which the founders of this republic fought and bled.

There is no Providence to stand between the citizenry of America and the consequences of their own acts or failures to act. As we sow so shall we reap. If that citizenry neglects to inform itself, to think hard and to strive to know what were best to be done, and do it, those who are not neglectful will have their way, and the way of those who seek their own rather than the common good is the way which leads to special privilege, oligarchy, autocracy, the degradation and final servitude of the many and the ultimate destruction also of those who are esteemed to have been successful in their designs, which means that all are involved in a common ruin and another civilization resolves itself into chaos and failure.

The remedy for these evils, or, rather, the preventive measures which may be taken against them, are Schools of Citizenship, schools so good and so numerous that the entire citizenry of the country shall become an informed citizenry valiant to defend the interests of the common good, both knowing what should be done and having the will to do it. In no other way can this experiment in free government work out successfully. The writer of this betrays no secret when he affirms that so-called successful men in industrial and commercial life have no deep seated faith in either the power of the people to govern wisely or their willingness to govern justly. Scarcely one successful business man in the hundred, except he avail himself of the arts of the demagogue for a selfish purpose, has, away down low, anything more than a pitying contempt for the ordinary work-day citizen or any faith in his abilities as part of a governing mechanism.

Per contra, the writer believes in the power of the people to govern wisely and well and that if we can have "Schools of Citizenship" enough, the twentieth century will witness as great strides toward a perfected popular government as the nineteenth century witnessed in invention and the centralization of industrial and commercial power. With regrets for the shortcomings of this department in The California Weekly the writer of it bids it adieu, feeling that, anyhow, he did what he could.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE

A full line of Theosophical Literature from Point Loma, California, the headquarters of the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society, under the leadership of Katherine Tingley, is now on sale at A. M. Robertson's, 222 Stockton St., S. F., and at Smith Bros., 462 13th St., Oakland, California.

PUBLIC MEN

USE

Allen's Press Clippings

to help them keep in touch with every publication in the State. Send your order to 88 First Street, S. F. IT PAYS TO KEEP POSTED.

Day School---Night School

Electrical, Mining, Civil

AND

Automobile Engineering

Architectural Drawing

Wireless and Morse Telegraphy

BOOKKEEPING : SHORTHAND

Our Graduates in Every Department Secure Good Positions

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE

425 McALLISTER STREET, SAN FRANCISCO

16th and SAN PABLO STREETS, OAKLAND

W. D. Fennimore A. R. Fennimore
J. W. Davis

Makers of the new improved

KRYPTOK

Invisible Bifocal Lenses

181 Post Street, near Grant Ave.

Hartford Fire Ins. Co. Atlas Assurance Co.

TAYLOR BROS. CO.

REAL ESTATE
INSURANCE

Tels. Oakland 950
Home 3950

OAKLAND
1236 Broadway

